Peace, Jobs, Civil Rights Top 1964 Goals—Meany

CIVIL RIGHTS SOLUTION is the key to meeting other problems of the South, Ralph McGill, standing, told recent follow-up meeting of participants in the Southern Staff Training Institute for trade unionists held last March. Seated next to the Atlanta Constitution publisher is George T. Guernsey, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, who arranged the three-day program. (Story on page 7.)

Message Cites Ideals Of Kennedy

The United States in the coming year "must demonstrate the resiliency and strength of a free society" by advancing the program begun by its slain President, John F. Kennedy, to achieve lasting peace, full employment and civil rights for all, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in his New Year's statement.

Meany praised Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson for "promptly and forcefully" moving to carry forward the Kennedy program and renewed the AFL-CIO's pledge of support to the new Chief Executive.

"The nation will never cease to mourn the loss of John F. Kennedy," he said. "But even in sorrow, all Americans can be proud of their country. Never in history has there been so brutally abrupt, so wholly unanticipated a change in national leadership; yet never was such a transition handled so effectively.

"Without fear or hesitation, Americans stood united behind the new President; and he in turn took the helm swiftly and firmly. The people grieved but the nation did not falter . . .

"A brilliant and beloved leader has been taken from us; but his program, his hopes, his ideals survive. They must be achieved."

The AFL-CIO president noted that Johnson has made it evident he will continue Kennedy's "far-sighted" foreign policies, policies which he said had brought the "dramatically successful" solution to the Cuban crisis, the nuclear test-ban treaty, the possibility of further progress toward disarmament, and the opening of the Berlin Wall during the Christmas season, if only for a few days, a step which Meany himself urged in July 1962 as an experiment in humanitarianism.

"This does not mean that peace has been secured or that the nature

Congress Quits, Starts Right Back

By David L. Perlman

Congress will take up on Jan. 7 where it left off at adjournment just one week earlier, with a heavy agenda of unfinished legislative business.

Pres. Johnson has already set his Administration's priorities for second session action—passage of the tax cut bill and enactment of civil rights legislation. The President is expected to present his program in greater detail on Jan. 8, when he delivers his first State of the Union message to Congress. This will be followed by a budget message, an economic report, and, as the session progresses, a series of special messages.

The first session came to a formal close on Dec. 30, after 70 of the 98 senators returned from an abbreviated Christmas holiday to complete action on the foreign aid appropriations bill.

The heavily-slashed $3 billion compromise measure, which had a turbulent passage through the House, sailed smoothly through the Senate, 56-14. The Senate gave voice vote approval to a provision allowing the President to authorize normal credit guarantees through the Export-Import Bank for trade with Communist nations. This is expected to remove an obstacle to the sale of surplus U.S. wheat to Soviet Russia.

As the Senate wound up its first session, Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) took the floor to reply to criticism of the slow pace of Congress.

'Profound Achievements'

Three "profound achievements" of the past 12 months—enactment of aid-to-education bills, passage of a mental health program, and Senate ratification of the limited nuclear test ban treaty—will "stand as a monument" to the work of Congress, Mansfield declared.

He said the Senate has passed 68 percent of the presidential legislative proposals submitted this year, representing "an achievement for which no member need apologize."

At the same time, Mansfield took note of the major measures awaiting action, declaring:

"We have made a beginning but it is just a beginning. Ahead of us during the second session lies some of the most difficult decisions" including tax policy, civil rights, health care for the

Headed for Supreme Court:

Musicians to Challenge Bar on Per Capita Voting

New York—Musicians' Pres. Herman Kenin has announced the AFM will carry to the Supreme Court its fight to preserve the union's system of weighted voting at conventions on dues increases and observed that the issue concerns not only the Musicians "but countless other labor organizations devoted to union democracy."

Kenin's announcement followed a 2-1 decision of the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals here upholding a ruling by U.S. District Judge Richard H. Levet which voided a membership dues increase adpoted at the AFM convention last June by a rollcall vote of 158,069 to 113,752.

Levet ruled that the Landrum-Griffin Act must be interpreted literally in its requirement that dues increases be approved "by a majority vote of the delegates voting at a regular convention." This is "clearly mandatory," Levet ruled.

The Musicians maintained that the union's constitutional system of weighted voting on changes in its laws, allowing delegates from each local to cast as many convention roll call votes as the local has members in good standing, is even "more democratic" than the law requires.

This argument was brushed aside by both the district court ruling and the appeals court majority opinion of Judge Harold R. Medina, in which Judge Sterry R. Waterman concurred.

Judge Thurgood Marshall dissented, declaring the appeals court should have rejected the district court's doctrine and ruled that the intent of Congress was simply to protect union members from "arbitrary" or "irresponsible" dues increases.

Medina agreed that "weighted voting is to all appearances the most 'democratic' method, in the sense that each member is duly 'represented,' and it is a method of voting widely recognized as fair and proper by a number of unions."

With that said, however, he nevertheless ruled that the language of the law means one vote for each delegate, "no more, no less."

Action 'Disastrous'

The broad significance of the case to the labor movement was pointed up by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in an affidavit to the district court. Meany warned that invalidation of the per capita voting system "would be disastrous to a substantial number of international labor unions whose constitutional procedures would thereby be invalidated and would violate democratic principles."

He added that the AFL-CIO "has been vitally interested in promoting democracy in its constituent unions" and told the court that the AFM's roll call procedure "clearly furthers intra-union democracy."

The appeals court majority opinion rejected the AFM argument that to affirm the lower court ruling would "virtually disfranchise" thousands of union members. It noted

Presidential Election Year Opens; GOP Contenders Take Off Wraps

By Willard Shelton

The political pot boiled vigorously as January of the presidential election year rolled in with Republican potentials hitherto coy and reserved about their plans allowing it to be apparent at last that they might be most definitely interested.

Sen. Barry Goldwater (Ariz.), whose backers have put together a substantial organization to push his candidacy, scheduled a Jan. 3 meeting with the party's state leaders to "announce my plans." Goldwater is in the last year of his second six-year Senate term. Arizona law apparently would allow him to run for both his Senate seat and the presidency next November if he should win a national nomination; he has indicated in the past that he would not seek two offices at the same time.

Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York revealed that he will run in the Oregon presidential primary in May as well as the March New Hampshire and June California primaries. His advisers indicated Rockefeller was considering a campaign to cut down a generally unfavorable public reaction to his divorce and remarriage but that plans had not matured. The governor and his second wife announced that she is expecting a baby next June.

Gov. George Romney of Michigan, still insisting he is not an active candidate for the Republican nomination, revealed that he plans a vigorous campaign to

New York Transit Pact Reached on Strike Eve

New York—Thirty-five thousand transit workers here won a 35-cent hourly wage-and-benefit package in a new two-year contract and 8 million New Yorkers found their subways and buses running as usual after nearly 24 hours of continuous bargaining which left everyone involved tired but pleased.

Pres. Michael J. Quill of the Transport Workers said the contract will mean a higher standard of living for TWU members. Joseph E. O'Grady, chairman of the Transit Authority which runs the subway system, said the settlement was "large and costly" but "not improvident."

Mayor Robert F. Wagner, who helped keep the negotiations moving, was pleased as was Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, who joined the mayor in developing a financing plan designed to retain the city's present 15-cent transit fare.

The Democratic mayor and the Republican governor praised each other's assistance and all joined in saluting the mediation skills of David L. Cole, chairman of the mayor's three-man Transit Labor Board, and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the city's Central Labor Council, who helped work out the settlement.

TWU members will receive these benefits:

- An immediate 11-cent hourly wage increase.
- An additional 8.5 cents on Jan. 1, 1965.
- Seven cents per hour to be used for improved health, welfare and pension benefits, effective Jan. 1, 1965.
- An additional 8.5 cents in wages on July 1, 1965.

The TWU dropped its original demand for a four-day, 32-hour workweek.

Dues Pact Signed With Post Office

Nearly 500,000 union members in the postal service will be able to pay their dues through payroll deductions under an agreement negotiated with the Post Office Dept.

The voluntary checkoff plan, the largest in government, will go into effect in April, although some unions have indicated they will wait until later in the year before participating in it. The department, on the basis of individual authorizations, will deduct dues for members of 13 national organizations at a service charge of 2 cents a month.

Postmaster Gen. John A. Gronouski said the arrangements worked out with the unions mark a strengthening of the "close and fruitful cooperation" between the department and the labor organizations representing its employes.

The two biggest unions taking part in the program are the Letter Carriers and the Postal Clerks, AFL-CIO affiliates having exclusive national recognition for their crafts. Other affiliates with members eligible for the dues checkoff include the Special Delivery Messengers, the Post Office Motor Vehicle Employes, the Machinists and the Mail Handlers.

Under the agreement, the department will forward the dues monthly to the national organization which, in turn, will remit to locals their share of the total dues.

Sugar Up 20% in Year:

Living Costs Reach Record in November

The Consumer Price Index edged up two-tenths of 1 percent in November to a new high, the Labor Dept's. Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. Higher housing and food costs pushed the cost-of-living index to 107.4.

At the same time, the take-home earnings of factory production workers rose to a record for the month as average hourly wages moved up to $2.49—a 2-cents-an-hour gain.

For workers and their families, the change in the price index meant that the market basket of goods and services which cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period carried a $10.74 price tag in November. This was 13 cents above the same month in 1962.

The 1.3 percent rise over the 12-month period was described by Assistant BLS Commissioner Arnold Chase as "reasonable price stability," although he predicted a further jump in December. This would put the 1963 price increase well above the one-half of 1 percent recorded in 1962.

Food prices pushed up 2 percent in November, largely because of a 7.8 percent rise in fresh vegetables, principally lettuce and tomatoes, and a 6.7 percent increase in sugar prices. Sugar sold for 20 percent more than a year ago.

The housing price index for the month was up three-tenths of 1 percent and stood 1.4 percent higher than the previous year.

As a result of collective bargaining agreements tied to the November price index, 70,000 workers in the meatpacking industry will recieve 3-cent hourly wage increases based on semi-annual adjustments, and 6,000 chemical workers will receive a 1-cent hourly raise in a quarterly adjustment. Some 4,000 food processing workers in the Detroit area will receive 1 cent an hour less, based on a drop in the Detroit price index.

The rise in factory wages brought the take-home pay—after deduction of social security and federal income taxes—to $88.77 for persons with three dependents. This came to an increase for the month of 46 cents and for the 12-month period of about $2.50.

Despite the increase in the cost of living, BLS reported, the purchasing power of factory workers rose by almost 2 percent from November 1962 to November 1963.

Report to FTC Hits Phony 'Labor' Paper

A Federal Trade Commission hearing examiner has cracked down on a New York monthly tabloid known as "Trade Union News," ordering its owners to stop misrepresenting their paper as endorsed by, affiliated with, or an official publication of a labor union.

Hearing Examiner Loren H. Laughlin also ordered the firm, Trade Advertising Associates, Inc., and its officials, Joseph Lash and Eugene Serels, to stop inserting unauthorized advertisements in any publication and seeking payment for them.

The paper was brought to the FTC's attention starting in mid-1961 by the Intl. Labor Press Association, the organization of official publications of the AFL-CIO and its affiliates. ILPA throughout its existence has conducted a vigorous drive against unethical advertising solicitations in the name of labor and against "racket" papers which purport to be connected with the labor movement, but which exist actually to high-pressure businesses into buying unwanted advertising. Advertising solicitation by ILPA's member-publications is governed by the organization's own strict code of ethics.

The FTC examiner's order calls on Lash and Serels to stop misrepresenting that their publication has won any national advertising or international editorial excellence award, or that the quality or merits of their publications have been determined in competitive contests conducted by impartial and qualified individuals.

The initial order may be appealed, stayed or docketed for review.

Laughlin rejected the argument of Trade Union News owners that the line "independent labor newspaper," appearing on the paper's masthead, was enough to acquaint its readers with the fact that it has no trade union connections. Besides, he noted, the "initial sale of advertising" is always made by telephone and the prospective advertiser has no chance to see the line.

The FTC hearing examiner reported that Lash and Serels grossed $100,000 from advertising alone in the operation of the 24-to-36-page Trade Union News. He noted that both men once worked for the "Trade Union Courier," which was hit with an FTC cease and desist order enforced by the U.S. 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals in 1960.

NLRB Examiner Limits Liability of New Owner

Nashville, Tenn.—A new owner who buys a plant under contract to a union is not necessarily bound by the agreement even though it contains a "successor" clause, NLRB Trial Examiner Alba Martin ruled.

The purchaser, Martin maintained, is not obligated to bargain with the union under contract to the seller, nor need it retain employes of the original owner at their existing wage rates, unless they become employes of the new owner at the time of the take-over.

The ruling was handed down in a recommendation for dismissal of a complaint of unfair labor practices filed against the Chemrock Corp., the purchaser, on behalf of five members of Teamsters Local 327 employed as truck drivers.

Chemrock bought the plant from the Tennessee Products & Chemical Corp. effective Aug. 1. A few days before the deadline date it offered employment at the original wages to maintenance and production employes, but at lower wages to the truck drivers, whose union contract had six weeks to run. The drivers rejected the offer and on Aug. 1 Chemrock put new drivers to work.

The NLRB general counsel contended Chemrock had a duty to deal with Local 327 on behalf of the drivers under the existing certification; and that by talking to them without the presence of a union representative and by cutting wages, it violated the Taft-Hartley Act.

"As a new organization hiring its first employes," Martin said in his decision, "Chemrock has a right to set the original wages it was willing to pay.

"Until they became its employes Chemrock had no duty to negotiate and bargain with their bargaining agent the original wages it would pay the old drivers. Here the five old drivers never became employes of Chemrock because they insisted upon setting the initial wages they would accept as employes, and stood upon their presumed right to be represented by their union in their pre-hiring relations with their prospective employes."

In previous comparable cases before the NLRB, Martin said, "the employes involved actually became employes of the successor and the cases involved problems based upon the fact that they were employes."

"Here the five old drivers never became employes," he asserted. "Hence the successorship cases are not applicable . . ."

He said that the NLRB has never found a Taft-Hartley violation by a purchaser despite the existence of a successor clause in the existing union contract where the purchaser in the sales agreement did not specifically assume any obligation of the seller.

"If such were the law," he added, "the legal position of every third-party successor could be controlled, regardless of all other factors, by a successorship clause he had no part in making."

IBEW, Mason Honored For Aid to Handicapped

An AFL-CIO union and a veteran union representative have been chosen to receive the 1963 Distinguished Service Award of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

Walter J. Mason, legislative director of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. was one of four individuals honored for "continuous outstanding service, national in scope, to the hire-the-handicapped program."

A similar award went to the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, one of three organizations so honored.

Both the IBEW and Mason were cited for their assistance in the development and production of the film, "They Have What It Takes," which was sponsored by the AFL-CIO last fall to help promote job opportunities for handicapped workers.

Mason was also honored "for his articles written for national labor publications and exhibits promoting employment of the handicapped" and "for his work in preparing a handbook on employment of the handicapped used by organized labor." Mason has served on the presidential committee for 16 years.

The citation to the IBEW praised "the numerous editorials and articles which have appeared in the union's magazine, The Electrical Journal," the union's role in "planning and participating in President's committee events; preparation and distribution of bulletin board posters, and pocket calendars carrying the hire-the-handicapped message." IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman is a vice president of the President's committee.

Other recipients of the award were Sen. Lister Hill (D-Ala.); Mrs. Esther Van Wagoner Tufty, Washington, D. C., newspaper correspondent; Kenneth King, president of the Columbia Savings & Loan Association of Denver, Colo.; the Joseph Bulova School of Watchmaking, Woodside, N. Y., and Gallaudet College for the deaf in Washington, D. C.

Ottawa, Ont.—The Labor Gazette, monthly publication of the Canadian Dept. of Labor, reports that 50 years ago the Royal North West Mounted Police Act was amended to raise the pay of constables from $1 to $1.25 a day.

Report Cites Lag in Demand:

OECD Sees Tax Cut Needed To Spur Jobs, U.S. Growth

Paris—Enactment of the $11.7 billion tax cut measure now before Congress would give "a significant expansionary stimulus" to the lagging U.S. economy and help it solve pressing problems of unemployment, slow growth and the balance of payments deficit.

This was a major conclusion of the 20-nation Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development in an analysis of the U.S. economy, one of a continuing series by the OECD on each of its member countries.

While fiscal and monetary measures taken in 1962 "have had an effect in the right direction," the OECD study observed, "it is clear that the policies so far applied are not making sufficiently rapid inroads on the problems of employment, growth and the external balance; hence the importance of the proposals which . . . are being considered by Congress."

Noting that joblessness has averaged 6 percent in the U.S. over the last six years and has remained above 5 percent in every month of that period, the study declared that "this performance compares unsatisfactorily with that of the earlier post-war years and with the experiences of most European countries."

As in its report on the U.S. a year ago, the OECD found that the major factor behind the rise in unemployment since 1957 has been insufficient demand for labor resulting from an inadequate growth of aggregate demand for goods and services."

It noted that real gross national product per head of U.S. population rose only 1.2 percent a year in the 1957-62 period, whereas the rates was 2.1 percent a year during the previous decade.

It saw no indications that in the absence of budgetary stimulus such as the proposed tax cut, "private demand will strengthen sufficiently in the near future to take up the slack in the economy."

The main purpose of the proposed tax cut, the analysis went on, "is to reduce the heavy drag which the fiscal system now exerts on personal and business purchasing power, thus stimulating faster and more appropriate expansion of the economy."

It "would represent a significant step toward a more appropriate budget policy, correcting the existing imbalance between the propensities to save and invest both by reducing government saving and by strengthening incentives to invest," the report continued.

The OECD observed that while the tax cut would lead to a temporary increase in the budget deficit, this would be partly offset by the growth of the tax base it would generate.

"Indeed," the report said, "it is through expansionary policies leading to faster growth and to a larger tax base that the budget deficit can be eliminated. . . . Since the budget is a major policy instrument, its balance should not, by itself, be regarded as a policy objective. The true test of the success of fiscal policy is not whether the budget is in surplus or deficit, but whether the economy as a whole is in balance."

Balance of Payments

Regarding the deficit in the international payments balance, the report noted improvement in the trade surplus enjoyed by the U.S. "has been more than offset by increased outflow of private capital" into all types of investments abroad.

The report also pointed out that Congress has been asked to approve a special tax on purchases of foreign securities by American nationals, but said "there are grounds for believing that a more satisfactory approach to balance of payments equilibrium will lie in measures to ensure faster growth."

The effect of expansionary budget policies, through the proposed tax cut, might result in an initial period in which imports rise faster than exports, the study observed.

But faster expansion, it went on, also probably would have a favorable effect on exports, since it would be accompanied "by strong advances in productivity and technology," would likely generate higher exports to countries from which imports rise, and "would bring a new dynamic element into the world economy, leading to faster growth of international trade and greater possibilities for U.S. exports."

ATTEMPTED RAIDS by the ousted Teamsters, such as the current bid to split New York's telephone employes, are giving the Communications Workers wide experience in dealing with such harassment. Here members of CWA Local 6360 in Kansas City, Mo., employed by the Western Electric Mfg. Co., are shown as they picketed a meeting called recently by the Teamsters. CWA officials said the militant spirit of the members kept the Kansas City raiders from filing an election petition by deadline time.

CWA Suspends Three For Teamster Dealings

New York—The executive board of the Communications Workers has suspended three officers of New York Local 1101 for "dual unionism" on the basis of charges filed by CWA members with the union's secretary-treasurer.

The three officers of the big local, which represents about 10,000 plant workers employed by the New York Telephone Co., are Pres. Henry F. Habel, Vice Pres. Arthur V. McGovern, and Sec.-Treas. Carmine V. Mazzarella. The union appointed Walter W. Herrmann of the CWA staff to administer the local's affairs.

The action was announced at about the same time that a meeting of the local called by Habel was voting to "disaffiliate" from the CWA. Last November, at the time of the AFL-CIO convention here, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne charged that Habel was engaged in secret plottings with James R. Hoffa, president of the ousted Teamsters, to split the ranks of New York telephone workers.

On Dec. 26, the Teamsters asked for a National Labor Relations Board election among the New York plant group. A similar petition also was filed by an independent Brotherhood of Telephone Workers, which the CWA charges also has had close contacts with Habel.

Two top officers of the brotherhood recently resigned, charging that the so-called independent union was in effect a puppet.

A Jan. 6 labor board hearing will determine a date for the election, expected to be set later in the month. The NLRB poll will be conducted among some 24,000 plant department employes throughout the state. CWA's contract with the New York Telephone Co. was negotiated and signed by the national union, rather than by any one local.

Clothing Workers Win Weldon Pajama Fight

Williamsport, Pa.—A 25-year fight to unionize the Weldon Pajama Co. ended in triumph for the Clothing Workers when 750 employes ratified a first contract giving them wage increases and improvements in working conditions and fringe benefits.

The pact was the climax of organizing drives that date back to 1935 and included an unsuccessful year-long strike for recognition by the cutters in 1951 and a National Labor Relations Board election lost by a small margin a decade later.

Victory was partly attributed to a campaign by the ACWA Union Label Dept. to inform consumers in all parts of the country of the substandard wages, working conditions and benefits at Weldon, one of the nation's largest manufacturers of pajamas.

The anti-union former management sold the business in 1962 to the Harwood Manufacturing Co. The organizing campaign was pushed again and in November 1963 the employes finally won recognition of their union on the basis of a card check.

"The success of the organizing campaign is another proof that the Amalgamated's consumer-education program is successful in awakening public protest against purchasing non-union products," said ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky.

The contract will take effect Jan. 6, 1964, and remain in effect until Dec. 31, 1966, with a reopener in 1965. The standard contract negotiated under the ACWA national cotton garment agreement, it also includes life insurance, sick pay, medical coverage and similar benefits.

The contract was negotiated by ACWA Vice Pres. David J. Monas, manager of the Pennsylvania Joint Board.

CWA Votes to Ratify New Pact at AT&T

Members of the Communications Workers have voted, 5,917 to 4,823, to ratify a new 38-month contract covering the long lines department of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.

The agreement, covering workers in 43 states and the District of Columbia, provides wage increases of $2 to $4 a week for operators and $2 to $8 for plant personnel, with two wage reopeners during the life of the pact.

Job Training Rushed for South Bend

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze announced jointly the assignment of a three-man team of specialists to South Bend, Ind., to help set up new job training courses for 1,000 to 1,600 workers idled by the closing of Studebaker automobile production there at a cost of some 6,000 jobs.

Wirtz said preliminary estimates suggest that the jobless rate in South Bend, as a result of the Studebaker shutdown, would go from a 10-year low of 2.1 percent last October to more than 11 percent in the first quarter of 1964.

The tightness of the city's labor market before the closing, he said, indicates that proper training would enable many of the laid-off auto workers to find jobs locally.

The three-man team includes two HEW training specialists, E. L. Dye and Leroy Cornelson, and a Labor Dept. manpower specialist, Ed Salner.

The joint announcement said the task force will have complete authority of both departments to approve training projects on the spot, obtain necessary space, procure needed equipment, and assist the local school district in recruiting instructors.

The two cabinet members said assignment of the task force was in response to a directive from Pres. Johnson, which also ordered stepped-up distribution of surplus foods to the displaced workers, called on the Commerce Dept. to work with the community in attracting new industry, instructed the Defense Dept. to press for fulfillment of Studebaker defense contracts in South Bend and ordered assignment of a full-time federal official to coordinate all federal activities.

Railroads, 3 Unions Agree on Welfare Plan

Three railroad operating unions have reached a tentative agreement for an employer-paid health and welfare program, subject to ratification procedures.

If approved by a membership referendum of the Switchmen, a meeting of general chairmen of the Trainmen, and the executive committee of the Conductors & Brakemen, details of the benefits to be provided will be worked out in further bargaining.

The pact, as initialed by the negotiators, provides that benefits furnished shall be "substantially similar" to that presently provided members of non-operating unions, which include hospital and surgical insurance of employes and dependents and life insurance covering employes.

Pres. Neil P. Speirs of the Switchmen told the AFL-CIO News that the amount of the employer contribution for each member of the SUNA would be $23 a month. The referendum ballots on ratification will be counted Jan. 16, he said.

The ratification meeting of Trainmen general chairmen will be held Jan. 14 and 15 in Washington, D. C.

Negotiations on a health-welfare program were begun in 1962, when the unions submitted a series of proposals. Following the procedures of the Railway Labor Act, the final agreement was reached in national negotiations between a committee representing the nation's principal railroads and the unions.

The bargaining was separate from the concurrent negotiations in the work rules dispute involving the same parties.

Political Pot Bubbles as '64 Tests Near mold GOP opinion toward "the right programs to meet the nation's needs."

Gov. William W. Scranton of Pennsylvania, who also has rejected suggestions that he become an open candidate, said he would take no action to remove his name from the Oregon primary ballot if it should be placed there. Oregon law allows the secretary of state to place on the ballot names of party leaders without their consent, if he considers they are generally recognized or advocated as presidential potential. A potential can remove his name by filing an affidavit that he is not a candidate.

Public opinion polls taken after the death of the late Pres. Kennedy and the first few weeks of Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson showed a sensational drop in the number of GOP county leaders supporting Goldwater and an even sharper drop in those believing he would be the nominee. Former Vice Pres. Nixon, on the other hand, showed a spectacular gain in supporters among these party organization men.

Goldwater remained the possibility with the largest number of committed supporters for the July Republican National Convention in San Francisco, drawing the bulk of his strength from the South.

Nixon has taken no public step indicating active interest in a second presidential nomination. His name may be placed on the Mar. 10 New Hampshire ballot, without his acquiescence, in the form of a slate seeking election as convention delegates "favorable" to Nixon.

A Worldwide Concern

IN THE NEXT FEW WEEKS Pres. Johnson will spell out his economic program for 1964 in a series of messages to Congress, including the budget and the economic report, focusing attention anew on the state of the nation's economy.

The state of the U.S. economy is a matter of international concern in view of our role as leader of the free world. Political leaders and economists around the globe are watching closely the steps the U.S. will take to stimulate and invigorate our currently fair but far-from-good-enough level of activity.

The 20-nation Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development, the economic voice of the free world, has indicated the depth of the worldwide concern in its latest analysis of the U.S. economy. The study is one of a continuing series by the OECD on each of its member countries.

Anticipating to some extent the coming budget message, the OECD goes to the heart of the budget discussion with this statement:

"Since the budget is a major policy instrument, its balance should not, by itself, be regarded as a policy objective. The true test of the success of fiscal policy is not whether the budget is in surplus or deficit, but whether the economy as a whole is in balance."

In its survey of the U.S. the OECD finds in effect that the economy is not in balance, that the policies applied in the past two years "are not making sufficient rapid inroads on the pertinent problems of employment, growth and the external balance."

It points out that the failure to achieve satisfactory economic growth and employment rates "reflects a structural imbalance" and cites the fact that a 3 to 4 percent increase in the gross national product has no impact on reducing unemployment. It adds:

"There are . . . no indications that, in the absence of budgetary stimulus, private demand will strengthen sufficiently in the near future to take up the slack in the economy."

THIS MEANS, simply, that unless government programs to meet acute social needs and deal with chronic unemployment and poverty are enacted, the slack and drift in the economy will continue.

The OECD study, looking ahead to 1964, declares that the pace of advance in 1963 was essentially moderate and that "in the absence of further stimulus, prospects for 1964 would be uncertain."

Among the possibilities for invigorating the economy, the analysis declares that enactment of the $11.7 billion tax cut pending before Congress "would provide a significant expansionary stimulus."

This is the way the U.S. economy looks to the top economists of the free world, economists who are concerned that failure to correct its weaknesses would have global repercussions.

It is the concern also of American labor both in domestic and international terms. Only an economically strong and vigorous U.S. can provide the leadership to overcome the Communist thrust. That strength begins with a full employment, full production economy.

Let's Get Started

Attack Shaping Up:

Americans Beginning to Notice Nation's Pockets of Poverty

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE are beginning to show an awareness that there are deep pockets of poverty in the United States; that a minority of Americans—a pretty big minority—is poor in every sense of the word.

They don't have jobs and they can't find them. They don't have adequate education or job skills and they can't get them. They live in rat-infested slums and pay high rents to exploiting landlords. And if the color of their skin is wrong, they are discriminated against up and down the line.

To meet the problems of these people, organized labor has called for job opportunities, better educational facilities, better housing, hospital insurance for the aged through social security, better jobless insurance . . . all the social measures that are desperately needed by the millions of men and women in our affluent society who are all but forgotten.

Now, however, other voices are being added to the cry for the elimination of poverty in the U.S.

Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson has made poverty a top priority target, and he is prepared to lead a crusade to stamp out its cause.

The late Pres. John F. Kennedy, at the AFL-CIO convention in New York just a few days before his death, declared that unemployment was the No. 1 problem of the country.

Gunnar Myrdal, hard-hitting Swedish economist who has never hesitated to tell his American friends what he thinks, only recently warned that there are millions of Americans who live at the bottom of U.S. society, cut off from the good life that others enjoy.

"There is a smell," he says pungently, "rising from the cellar of the American mansion."

That "smell" was highlighted in a recent report of the National Policy Committee on Pockets of Poverty, the material for which was prepared by Dr. Oscar Ornati, professor of economics at the New School for Social Research in New York City.

"Our analysis shows the existence of a new class of Americans," said Committee Chairman James G. Patton, "people who form a group split off from our affluent society. These people live in poverty even though the nation generally prospers and the gross national product increases. They constitute a shocking paradox in American life. When the economy dips their plight worsens, but when it rises they benefit little, if at all."

Ornati said that 20 million Americans now live in abject poverty with incomes below minimum subsistence standards. Who are they?

They are the non-whites, families with no earners, families whose heads are women, men aged 14 to 25 or over 65. They are those with less than eight years of education, inhabitants of rural farm areas and families in which there are more than six children under 18.

ON THE OTHER HAND, if you want to escape this helplessly poor group, you ought to develop the following "formula for not being poor":

- Be white.
- Be between the ages of 25 and 45.
- Be married with two children, but not more.
- Live in a northern city.
- Have as much education as possible.
- Be in good physical and mental health.

Some of these things we can't control, but education is one area where much can be accomplished.

Dr. J. K. Galbraith, author of "The Affluent Society," recently warned that "the greatest need of the moment is not a decision to be tender to the well-to-do." What is needed is help for those who really need it, he said.

"If the head of a family is stranded deep on the Cumberland Plateau, or if he never went to school, or if he has no useful skill, or if his health is broken, or if he succumbed as a youngster to slum environment, or if opportunity is denied to him because he is a Negro," he went on, "then he will be poor and his family will be poor and that will be true no matter how opulent everyone else becomes."

To meet the needs of the poor, Galbraith made a startling proposal that has caused much editorial comment.

"Why don't we select, beginning next year, the 100 lowest-income counties (or in the case of urban slums more limited areas of equal population) and designate them as special education districts," he proposed. "They would then be equipped (or re-equipped) with a truly excellent and comprehensive school plant, including both primary and secondary schools, transportation and the best in recreation facilities. . . . It seems likely that the system should also include modest educational grants to families to feed and clothe children for school and to compensate for their earnings." (PAI).

Morgan Says:

Some Americans Are Beginning To Move in Direction of Reason

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

SUCCESS STORIES are usually a satisfaction to hear, especially if they are true and especially if they measure something besides material gain.

During the 1960 Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles which nominated John F. Kennedy for President, I got a telephone call from a man who said he thought I would be interested in the story of his business. It turned out that this fellow, whose name is Bernard D. Richter, and his mother owned a car-wash establishment in Reseda, Calif., in the neighborhood of Pasadena.

Morgan

As Richter described it in a broadcast I did at the time, washing cars was known as the "low end" of the service trade with a high turnover of "winos, bums, derelicts and transients" in hard work at about a dollar an hour.

The Richters started this way, too. . . . Then suddenly they changed their approach with the double-edged belief that the work was not unskilled, indeed required really competent personnel and that these people "are human beings who want their full share of the good things of life and above all social equality."

The Richters spent $50,000 on special equipment, raised pay as much as 60 percent over the prevailing wage, organized beach parties, sports nights and award dinners for the staff. Many of their employes are Negroes whom the community does not welcome as residents. Some of them drive 70 miles round trip daily to work. When local barber shops (which happened to be non-union) wouldn't serve them, Richter protested, asked the Reseda Chamber of Commerce to take a "moral position." He got no action. He resigned from the chamber.

Well, by the summer of 1960 Richter's service was grossing half a million dollars a year, had cut personnel turnover from 650 per annum to 60, reduced damage from negligence to zero and increased productivity to more than 50 cars per man per day, double the national high.

The story doesn't end there. Last week I got a letter from Bernard Richter. Since our last contact three and a half years ago, he wrote, "our organization has doubled in size and we have been very active in community affairs. . . . I would like to tell you of a great transformation that is taking place in the business community as a result of Pres. Kennedy's death."

Then he went on to trace the efforts of himself and some others, dating back a couple of years, to rebut hate groups and minimize the appearance of what he called "hate speakers" before service and community organizations to which he belonged. He complained this was difficult because of the organized accessibility, gratis, of speakers eager to denounce the Supreme Court and Chief Justice Warren, to indict our schools as teaching communism and/or "one-worldism," to link ex-Pres. Eisenhower with the "Communist conspiracy," etc. But whereas such propagandists were readily available, speakers with supposedly more balanced views, Richter said, too often wanted to know what their fee would be.

"Understand this," Richter wrote, ". . . I'm not trying to take away the right of the haters to hate. In a free society this is the price we pay for liberty. . . . I'm not suggesting they don't have a right to speak, but I am suggesting that we have a right not to listen."

Then he described an experience he had on Dec. 3 when he made a speech before a joint meeting of a service club.

"AS I LOOK BACK at the events of recent weeks," Richter told his associates, "I realize that I have not done enough, in my own house, in my own business, in my community, in my state and in my country, to promote, protect and defend the great American institutions that I love so much." And he pledged he would "never again sit through a hate speech without a protest to and a confrontation of the disseminator of that hate."

What Bernard Richter is plainly saying is that unless responsible citizens speak up, irresponsible ones take over. This is of the very essence of the open society which too many of us appear to have forgotten.

But he opposes dissension sowed in ignorance, fear or bigotry. Due in part to his action of protest the Reseda Chamber of Commerce broadened its view. He rejoined and became a board member.

Bernard Richter is saying, too, that what we've been engaged in too long is too much diatribe and not enough dialogue of responsible controversy. For at the end of his letter he said, "to show you how things have changed my speech (at the service club) received a standing ovation. . . . Apparently from all the reaction to it and to other events I believe we are beginning to move in the direction of reason."

What a bright embellishment for our sobered celebrations, what a splendid augury for the New Year if that is so.

Washington Reports:

U. S. Leading All Other Nations In Peaceful Use of Atomic Power

THE UNITED STATES leads the world in the peaceful use of atomic power, Representatives Melvin Price (D-Ill.) and Craig Hosmer (R-Calif.) reported on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on almost 700 radio stations.

"At the moment there are 32 reactors producing power throughout the world and 37 more under construction," Hosmer said. "Almost half of these, both in being and under construction, are in the United States."

Price and Hosmer are members of the Joint Congressional Atomic Energy Committee and were among the representatives of the U. S. at the seventh general conference of the Intl. Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna. Seventy-five nations took part, including countries from both sides of the Iron Curtain.

Price said that Soviet Union delegates were much more friendly and cooperative in the recent conference.

"They used to fight over everything," he said, "the election of the president of the conference, the selection of the director-general, seating of the delegates and every item. None of this was evidenced this time."

Hosmer said that the Soviet bloc also withdrew its "previous opposition to international inspection of reactors around the world to make sure they are being used for peaceful purposes. They did not give permission for inspectors behind the Iron Curtain, but they removed the roadblock" preventing inspections elesewhere.

ACCORDING TO agreement at the Vienna conference, inspections teams now visit countries with reactors outside the Iron Curtain. Price mentioned Great Britain, the Soviet Union, France, Japan, Germany, and Italy as now having reactors, with India planning one in cooperation with the U.S.

Progress in the desalinization of sea water so that it can be used for drinking, cooking and industrial purposes was reported at the conference, according to Hosmer. He said the Arab nations, Israel and other countries in arid parts of the world are much interested in this program.

Price stressed also the increased use of isotopes.

"We have already saved American industry and agriculture over $1 billion through the use of radioisotopes in safety controls and in the manufacture of tires, steel and other products," Price said. "A sterilization program for preservation of food is another example of such use."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE HARD HOUSE BATTLE over the foreign aid money bill and its "rider" purporting to forbid Export-Import Bank guarantees of any wheat sale credits to Soviet bloc countries is now represented, in some circles, as an "unnecessary" fight that Pres. Johnson should have avoided.

The President could have let the struggle go over to the new session of Congress, it is suggested, without any real harm. The effect of pushing the Republicans, who formed the solid core insisting on the wheat "rider," was to embitter them and perhaps to endanger bipartisan attitudes toward other pending bills including the civil rights measure, it is urged.

This is all very well except that it ignores what was in the President's mind and ignores the common tendency of the House GOP floor leader, Rep. Halleck of Indiana, to operate with full partisanship in situations where he sees a temporary opportunity for scoring a point in the game of one-upmanship.

It can be authoritatively reported that the President viewed the wheat "rider" as exceedingly unwise on at least four grounds and that he believed the House revolt against his constitutional authority as director of foreign policy an issue that had to be settled decisively.

A SOURCE INTIMATELY acquainted with the President's thinking pointed out that, in Johnson's view, the rider was nonsensical, since it could not really impose controls on his authority, and besides the Soviet Union probably would buy more wheat from Canada than from the U.S.

More significantly, the President felt it improper of the House to make him appear as a "weak" Chief Executive, unable to get legislative consent to manage affairs he is supposed to manage, at a time when he is still new in office and the world is watching every development in his conduct of foreign policy. He also thought the House was aiming a gratuitous kick in the teeth at the Soviet Union at a time when as the new President he is seeking to explore the possibility of easing tensions.

House Democrats let tactical control get away from them, thus giving Halleck his chance to assail any foreign aid bill without the "rider." But he also knew that in the end he would not be able to have his way; he knew that the rider would be removed when a full membership was present and that the Senate would never accept it, in any case.

It can be argued endlessly who is to blame for "partisanship," and it can also be said that if Halleck feels so aggrieved over his defeat that he will retaliate in the civil rights field, the responsibility will be his.

No significant rights bill can go through without bipartisan support; the House Judiciary Committee bill was framed to secure such support and did in fact receive it from leading Republican spokesmen. The bill should be handled on issues of principle, not of angry vengeance on an extraneous and foolish sideshow quarrel.

THE PRESIDENT'S sensible sensitivity to congressional encroachments on executive powers was revealed again when he signed the $4.4 billion public works appropriations bill only with a specific statement that he would ignore as "invalid and unconstitutional" another rider—this one forbidding sale of Panama Canal Co. property without direct advance approval by House and Senate Appropriations Committees.

This rider goes to the heart of the President's authority to negotiate with Panama over possible changes in existing arrangements on the canal and to direct the canal company, a government agency, through normal executive processes.

Mr. Johnson considered a veto, it was revealed, but was reluctant to kill the big money bill. He notified Congress that he would treat the rider "as a request for information" from the committees—not a bar on his authority as President.

A Chief Executive who does not resist legislative encroachments would soon find himself overwhelmed with all sorts of riders on money bills purporting to checkrein him, to tie him to the whims of committees or even of powerful committee chairmen.

Headed for Supreme Court:

Musicians to Defend Weighted Dues Vote

that the Landrum-Griffin Act provides an alternative method of raising an international union's dues—by a majority vote of the membership in a referendum.

It saw no analogy to voting of corporation stockholders or in various systems of electing public officials, nor did it find any significance in the Landrum-Griffin Act's apparent sanction of weighted voting in the election of union officers.

"We hold that the simple, unambiguous requirements set forth in Sec. 101(a)(3)(B) [of the Act] were intended to mean just what they appear on their face to mean," the majority opinion declared, "and that in this way the Congress intended to prevent future skullduggery of every possible character and description in the fertile field of increasing dues, initiation fees and assessments, even if no particular abuses in the matter of weighted voting for such increases had been proved."

Marshall Disagrees

In his vigorous dissent, Marshall voiced sharp disagreement with the majority's literal interpretation of the language of the law and declared that "it seems to me clear that Congress intended merely to assure that dues increases could not be imposed by irresponsible or arbitrary union leaders not answerable in any way to the membership at large."

Congress, he said, did not set out to "dictate" to unions a particular method of convention voting and had no desire to foreclose unions from giving more weight to their large locals on dues questions.

"The term 'majority vote of the delegates voting,'" his dissent concluded, "is susceptible to a construction which would allow delegates' votes to be weighted in accordance with the strength of the different locals they represent. We ought to accept that construction and reverse the summary judgment herein."

In announcing plans to carry the case to the Supreme Court, Kenin said that meanwhile the union's local officers had been instructed to comply with the lower court interpretations of the law.

"Many of our locals already have conformed to the voting procedures required by federal statute," he said, "and we shall continue to devote our energies to carrying out the fiscal policies so responsibly ordered by our last convention, in spite of a few would-be 'union busters' who seek to harass the federation."

The suit to void the convention-voted dues increase was brought by a group of members of New York Local 802, represented by Attorney Godfrey P. Schmidt. Some members of the group also had been plaintiffs in an earlier suit which led to invalidation of a tax on the earnings of traveling musicians.

A spokesman for the union noted that the federal court's modified ruling enjoins only two of 11 fiscal union laws adopted by weighted-voting procedures at the 1963 convention. One of these sought to legislate an increased schedule of initiation fees and the other provided a $6 a year increase in membership dues to locals.

The court's ruling does not affect the $6 per capita obligation of locals to the AFM, the spokesman said.

Italian Labor Group Aids Slide Victims

New York—The United Italian-American Labor Council, at its 22nd annual conference here, turned over a $10,000 check for the survivors of a disastrous mountainslide at Vajonti, Italy, and presented a bronze bust of former Pres. Truman to Israel.

Pres. Luigi Antonini declared that both gifts were in line with the council's dedication to "the cause of freedom and of humanity."

The bronze bust of Truman will be placed in the new building of the Israeli Parliament. The check for relief of the Vajonti disaster victims was presented to the managing editor of Il Progresso Italo-Amercano, the daily paper which started the drive for contributions.

Speakers at the luncheon session included Mayor Robert F. Wagner, City Council Pres. Paul Screvane, Dir. Jay Lovestone of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs, Adolph Held, manager of the Jewish Daily Forward, and officials from Italy and Israel.

The council, at its business session, urged enactment of reforms and modernization of immigration laws which had been proposed by the late Pres. Kennedy and called for establishment of Columbus Day as a national holiday.

aged and the future of the foreign aid program.

From GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) came a defense of the congressional record from another angle, a claim that in moving slowly and cautiously Congress "has assessed the needs of the times and responded accordingly."

In the wake of the most bitter battle over the foreign aid program in many years, Pres. Johnson ordered a top-level Administration review of the objectives and organization of the program. He asked a five-member committee, headed by Under Sec. of State George W. Ball, to report to him by Jan. 15. The group's recommendations are expected to serve as the basis for the President's foreign aid message to Congress early this year.

While sharply cutting the foreign aid fund bill—$700 million below the amount authorized by Congress and $1.5 billion under the total requested by the late Pres. Kennedy—Congress attached an unrelated extra appropriation for legislative expenses.

An additional $3.3 million was provided for congressional housekeeping costs, including larger allowances for House and Senate members for postage, stationery and long-distance telephone calls.

Building Service Union Backs Medicare Bill

Social security financing of hospital care for the aged is the only method compatible with human dignity, Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes declared in a statement to the House Ways & Means Committee.

Sullivan pointed out that many retired people are unable to carry adequate private health insurance and that the "dole-like system" embodied in the Kerr-Mills Act has proved to be "an inadequate approach to the great national problem that we face."

The nation's experience with the social security principle, he declared, "shows that it is effective and adequate in producing a method of orderly savings by which working men and women during their productive years can help contribute to their needs in their later years."

He noted that "of those who opposed the social security system when it was first considered in the 1930's, there are few who would oppose it today."

The same financing mechanism, he stressed, "can be applied to help assure care for the aged" and thus "make an orderly, useful contribution to the distribution of hospitalization and other health services."

Congressional action is necessary, the BSEIU president said, because:

- "Older people are less able to pay for medical care at a time when they are most likely to need it." Three out of every five elderly citizens have incomes under $20 a week, he noted.
- "Medical costs have been rising and are continuing to rise . . . Health care has become much more effective, but it also has become more expensive."
- "Public welfare programs are overtaxed through the high level of unemployment."

Sullivan summarized his union's support for the King-Anderson bill by declaring that "it will be the most effective, it will aid the largest number of persons, and it will offer benefits to citizens as a matter of right."

Insurance Voiding Banned in Strikes

Boston—The Insurance Workers achieved a major legislative goal when the legislature passed and Gov. Endicott Peabody (D) signed a new law prohibiting cancellation of a policy for non-payment of premiums during a strike of insurance agents. Enactment will set a precedent for other states, IWIU Pres. George Rollins predicted.

The law prevents companies from cancelling policies for failure to pay premiums until 31 days after a strike has ended.

IUE Announces Recall of Official

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers announced that locals representing a majority of the members have voted to recall Al Hartnett as secretary-treasurer.

Hartnett was previously suspended by the IUE executive board, which named George Collins as acting secretary-treasurer.

Met Tenor 'Recruited' by Cement Local

New York—Back in 1950, when he was 22 years old, Flaviano Labo was singing—opera, of course—as he worked in his native Piacenza, Italy, when the director of the world-famous La Scala Opera Co. happened to hear him.

The world lost a skilled cement worker, but the Metropolitan Opera Co. eventually gained a tenor. Now Labo has completed the cycle: He's again a cement worker, an honorary member of Cement & Concrete Workers Local 20 here.

At a luncheon he was presented with a framed engraving giving him honorary membership, signed. by Pres. Dominick Tancredi and Sec.-Treas. Silvio D. Battini. A claque of opera lovers applauded with gusto. Among them was another onetime building trades worker — Giovanni Martinelli, former carpenter and Metropolitan tenor.

Labo also was presented with a cake on which was inscribed "Flaviano Labo—Excelsior."

When the tenor was pulled off the job in Piacenza 13 years ago, he was taken to the La Scala school in Milan and in 1955 returned to his native heath to make his debut as Cavaradossi in "Tosca." He joined the Metropolitan for the 1957-8 season and has remained with it since then.

Participants Evaluate Southern Staff Institute

Atlanta, Ga.—A three-hour discussion with Ralph McGill, publisher of the Atlanta Constitution and syndicated columnist, highlighted a follow-up meeting of participants in the Southern Staff Training Institute, which was held last March at the University of North Carolina under the auspices of the National Institute of Labor Education.

The three-day meeting drew some 20 delegates and national AFL-CIO staff members, including 14 of the 16 original participants in the training institute. The pioneering four-week course enabled union staffers from eight states and nine international unions to study the labor, political and economic history of the South, explore civil rights problems and delve into community relations.

Both the Chapel Hill institute last spring and the follow-up meeting here were arranged by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, in cooperation with the federation's Dept. of Civil Rights.

Assistant Education Dir. George T. Guernsey, who guided the evaluation, reported that all participants had found the training extremely valuable. He said a number of suggestions for improving the course will be considered in developing future southern training institutes.

McGill's discussion centered on his recent book, "The South and the Southerner," copies of which had been distributed to the institute participants in advance of the follow-up meeting. The Atlanta publisher laid heavy stress on the need for a solution to the civil rights problems as the key to solving other problems of the South.

Other topics discussed at the meeting were "New Problems of Collective Bargaining," led by Irving Beller of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research and James Noe of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and "Challenge of the 1964 Elections," led by COPE Area 5 Dir. Daniel A. Powell and Pres. Claude Ramsay of the Mississippi State AFL-CIO.

Seattle Newsman Joins State AFL-CIO Staff

Seattle, Wash. — Kenneth R. Fleming, newly elected president of the Seattle Newspaper Guild, has been appointed administrative assistant to Pres. Joe Davis of the Washington State AFL-CIO.

Fleming has taken leave from his post as a reporter on the Seattle Post-Intelligencer to join Davis' staff. He will seek to develop a better exchange of information between labor and communities within the state, will establish a newsletter for press, radio, television and others concerned with news of labor, and also will work on a bulletin to be sent local unions. In addition he will do research and report writing.

Meany's New Year Message:

Peace, Jobs, Rights Head 1964 Goals

and ultimate aims of the Soviet empire have changed," Meany observed. "America must maintain unrelaxed vigilance and maximum military strength even as new paths toward permanent peace are explored. But we can find comfort in the certainty that Pres. Johnson will follow that course with firmness and determination."

He noted, too, that Johnson had shown "a clear grasp" of the nation's number one domestic issue—unemployment—and had declared the objective of his Administration to be 75 million jobs.

"Full employment, full economic opportunity," Meany asserted, "remains the one indispensable element if America is to maintain its leadership on the world scene and correct its social shortcomings at home.

As Pres. Kennedy eloquently pointed out in his address to the AFL-CIO a week before he was slain, jobs are the key to all forms of equality—in employment, in education, in housing, in public accommodations."

Jobs, however, will not be created by "wishful thinking" or by any "single piece of legislation," the AFL-CIO president said, declaring:

Multiple Program Asked

"There must be a multiple program on many fronts" that embraces a tax cut in the low and middle income brackets, more public works of all kinds, a more liberal monetary policy, and "finally . . . a reduction in the standard workweek and an increase in the penalty pay for overtime."

No less important, he emphasized, is the civil rights bill, which he said "must be enacted promptly" to provide enforceable fair employment practices, guarantee to every American the full rights of citizenship and access to public accommodations, bar the use of federal funds in any undertaking where discrimination is practiced, and make school desegregation "a reality in every community in the land."

In education, however, as with employment, "desegregation itself is not enough." Meany declared, calling for "more and better schools, more and better teachers, far more effective measures to insure that ability is the only ceiling on educational opportunity."

He noted that "historic" gains had been made by the last session of Congress in legislation aiding higher education and vocational training and called for application of "the same vision" to meet the "desperate" needs of elementary and high schools—"by any measure the most vital components of the educational system."

Medicare Needed

Meany also urged continuation of social progress in other areas.

"Hospital insurance for the aged as part of the social security system, federal standards for unemployment compensation, fair minimum standards for workmen's compensation—these are just a few of the socially-necessary measures that will have helpful economic effects," he said.

To assure consideration of this multi-pronged program, the AFL-CIO president called on Congress to revise the rules of both its houses to eliminate barriers that are "better designed to impede than to enact legislation."

"While provisions to delay the impulsive actions of a reckless majority are wholly proper," he said, "such provisions should not—as now—make it possible to frustrate the considered decisions of the American people and their elected representatives.

"Congressional rules must be so revised as to permit the will of the people to prevail with all deliberate speed."

SYMBOLIC OF THE YEAR just ended is this recent scene at the grave of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy, as Adlai E. Stevenson, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, places a floral tribute on behalf of the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation, of which he is chairman. Standing behind the saluting officer are, from left, H. H. Bookbinder, executive director of the foundation; Sidney Glazier, executive director of the Eleanor Roosevelt Cancer Foundation; Rep. Automation Meaningless Without Buyers—Jodoin

Ottawa, Ont.—Vastly expanded means of production created by automation "have little meaning if there are no customers to buy," Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress warned in his New Year's message.

"Our rapidly expanding scientific and technical knowledge can be the means of providing material goods in much greater abundance," he said. "The true benefits will only be gained, however, if we apply equal skill to assuring their fair distribution."

He expressed the hope that the newly-established tripartite Economic Council of Canada may be able to utilize "original thinking" and "courageous" action to meet the challenge of unemployment.

Jodoin also called for "reassessment" of the bicultural base (French and English) on which Canada has developed, with the remedying of any inequalities that may have developed over the years.

"We must have a Canada which unites all our people, regardless of their race, color or creed," he said, "and Canadian workers can make a great contribution to this objective."

In international affairs, he noted a "marked easing" of tensions during the past year, but said the "fundamental problems remain."

"It would be difficult," he added, "to let the year end without making particular reference to the untimely death of Pres. John F. Kennedy.

"But time never stands still, and we must move forward with time."

Fired for a Kiss, Wins Reinstatement

Sacramento, Calif.—Arbitrator Sam Kagel may have won himself a permanent niche in labor history when he ruled that discharge was too severe a punishment for a security officer who sometimes kissed the plant nurse while strolling through the dispensary.

The Aerojet General Corp. fired the guard on the grounds of neglect of duty and conduct unbecoming a protection officer and suspended the nurse for two weeks.

Machinists Lodge 812 agreed the bussing was a breach of company rules but took the case to arbitration when the firm refused leniency. The arbitrator agreed that the punishment for the breach of decorum was excessive and ordered the guard's reinstatement with restoration of part of his lost wages.

RCIA Local Lightens Yule For Suffering

Buena Park, Calif.—A dozen business representatives of Retail Clerks Local 324 took off from union headquarters a few days before Christmas to help make the holiday a merry one for members neglected by fortune.

They drove to the homes of 27 members who had suffered serious disability, extended unemployment or other hardships and delivered well-filled baskets of Christmas foods, carefully selected toys for the children, and gifts for others in the family.

The beneficiaries lived in all parts of the local's territory, which includes southeast Los Angeles County and all of adjoining Orange County.

"It's only a small expression of the Christmas spirit," said Sec.-Treas. Arthur Z. Berland, "but we know it makes the rest of our 10,000 members enjoy Christmas more knowing their fellow-members haven't been forgotten. It's the best way we know to show the fraternal spirit that has always been an integral part of Local 324."

The local also held its annual Christmas Party for the children of union members, with Santa Claus to distribute gifts, marionettes and a clown to entertain, candy to eat and toys and ballons to play with.

Competition Opens For Hillman Prizes

New York—The Sidney Hillman Foundation has opened its annual competition for achievement in the communications arts, according to Howard D. Samuel, executive director of the foundation and assistant president of the Clothing Workers.

Entries are judged according to their contribution to a better understanding of contemporary political, economic and social problems and their perpetuation of ideals promoted during his life by Sidney Hillman, ACWA founding president.

These would include the advancement of civil liberties, improved race relations, a stronger labor movement, the advancement of social welfare and economic security, greater world understanding, and related problems. Entries must have been published or produced in 1963. Deadline is Feb. 1.

Wirtz Urges U.S. Goal Of Full Employment

"Full employment, nothing less," should be the nation's goal for 1964, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz declared in a New Year's statement.

"We cannot tolerate the development of a separate nation of the poor, the unskilled, the jobless, living within another nation of the well-off, the trained and the employed," he said.

For most Americans, Wirtz noted, 1963 was "a year of unprecedented prosperity," yet the unemployment rate remained above 5.5 percent—"as high as in the recession year of 1954."

He attributed this to the combination of an "enormous" population growth and an accelerated technology which threatens to create "a human slag heap" of the unemployed and unskilled.

Despite the "strain" on collective bargaining caused by technological change and theatened unemployment, Wirtz described the past three years as the "most peaceful" period for labor-management relations in the 30 years the Labor Dept. has kept records on disputes.

To meet Pres. Johnson's announced goal of 75 million jobs, Wirtz said:

- "There must be better training and retraining of people for the jobs which are available."
- "We must strengthen the economy so that ability to consume keeps up with the ability to produce."
- "We must strengthen ourselves—and particularly our children—by eliminating the poverty and prejudice that kill their motivation, by wiping out the slums and substandard schools that make unemployment too often their inheritance."

Wirtz expressed the hope that 1964 will be "a year when the great majority of Americans who are secure and busy think of the minority who are not."

Hearing Set for Jan. 13 On Walsh-Healey Pay

A public hearing will be held Jan. 13 in Washington to receive testimony on a proposed minimum wage determination of $1.25 an hour for all industries subject to the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act except those where the present pay floor is higher.

The proposed determination is based on experience under the Fair Labor Standards Act. A $1.25 minimum became effective under this act last Sept. 3 for most employes in interstate or foreign commerce. The Walsh-Healey proposal would allow wages under the $1.25 rate to the same extent.

Labor, Cornell Study Impact Of Automation

New York—An automation study aimed at evaluating future manpower needs and employment trends in the city's industries has been launched jointly by the New York City Central Labor Council's Shorter Workweek & Automation Committee and the Cornell University School of Industrial & Labor Relations.

Thirty-five local unions affiliated with the CLC are participating in the study, which is under the direction of Prof. Jerry M. Fosenberg of Cornell in cooperation with the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics and other expert agencies.

The study was kicked off at the first of a series of monthly meetings at Cornell's offices here.

Principal speakers were CLC Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., BLS Reg. Dir. Herbert Bienstock, Prof. Rosenberg, Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes, who is chairman of the CLC committee, and Walter Sheerin, committee coordinator.

Participants were asked to seek answers to a series of questions on such subjects as automation's expected effect on the workweek, retirement and workers' attitudes, methods of cushioning job displacement and new approaches to vocational training.

Johnson Wars on Poverty; Meany Pledges Labor's Aid

PRES. JOHNSON delivers his first State of the Union message to a joint session of Congress. Also present were members of the Supreme Court, the President's Cabinet, the diplomatic corps and packed galleries of guests.

Message Viewed as 'Challenge'

Pres. Johnson has challenged the nation "to make the American way of life more meaningful to more people" and organized labor "is ready and willing to do its part in meeting this challenge," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in commenting on the President's State of the Union message to Congress.

Meany described the message as "warm and human," bespeaking "an Administration of warmth and humanitarianism."

(Text of Meany statement, Page 12.)

The President, he said, "obviously intends to judge the prosperity of America only by the well-being of all her people. That can only be achieved when we outlaw the pockets of poverty, the inhumanities of discrimination and segregation, the illiteracy, the exploitation, the suffering that are today the lot of too many of our citizens."

The AFL-CIO president and other members of the Executive Council had been given a preview of the State of the Union when they were Johnson's guests at a White House luncheon the day before he addressed a joint session of the House and Senate.

Meany's statement praised Johnson for calling for a high-level commission on automation and for giving the highest legislative priorities to the proposed tax cut, civil rights and old-age social security hospital care.

"We are with him 100 percent in these fights," the AFL-CIO president declared. "America can brook no further delay by the Congress

President Cites Goals Of Kennedy

By John M. Barry

Pres. Johnson laid before the second session of the 88th Congress a broad legislative program giving top priorities to civil rights, a tax cut and "unconditional war on poverty in America," while pledging "a progressive Administration which is efficient, honest and frugal."

The President, in his first State of the Union message, urged a joint session of the House and Senate to "carry forward the plans and programs" of his slain predecessor, John Fitzgerald Kennedy, "not because of our sorrow or sympathy, but because they are right."

'Best Session' Asked

He reminded Congress that its last session had been the longest in peacetime history and called on it "to make this year's session the best in the nation's history."

"Let this session of Congress be known," Johnson declared, "as the session which did more for civil rights than the last hundred sessions combined . . . which enacted the most far-reaching tax cut of our time . . . which declared all-out war on human poverty and unemployment . . . which finally recognized the health needs of all our older citizens . . . which reformed our tangled transportation and transit policies . . . which achieved the most effective, efficient foreign aid program ever . . . and as the session which helped to build more homes and more schools and more libraries and more hospitals than any single session of Congress in the history of our Republic."

Johnson told the senators and House members that such a pro-

BLS Report Shows:

Contract Talks Set For 2 Million in 1964

Contracts involving more than 2 million workers in major industries will expire this year and will be up for negotiation of new terms, the Labor Dept. has reported. More than 1 million additional workers may benefit also from deferred wage increases, the report said, under union contracts negotiated in previous years.

The industries include automobile, construction, meat packing, apparel, machinery, fabricated metal, maritime and others, the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said in a report on the status of contracts involving 5,000 or more workers in all fields except government employment.

The report, published in the December issue of the Monthly Labor Review, said areawide contracts also will expire this year in various industries.

Data on Contracts Given

The BLS report on major agreement expirations and reopenings in 1964 gave these statistics:

- Information on 353 collective bargaining agreements covering 5,000 or more workers each, represents "virtually all contracts of this size" in the United States and covers nearly 6 million workers—about one-third of all workers covered by contract.
- Due to expire are 307 agreements involving 4.5 million workers. For an additional 46 agreements due to terminate by Dec. 31, 1963, settlements had not been reached when the report was printed.
- Of the 307 agreements terminating this year, more than two-thirds, covering more than 3 million workers, provide for possible wage adjustments in the form of deferred wage increases, or cost of living escalation clauses, or under wage reopenings specified in the agreement.

More than one type of wage adjustment is possible in the latter category, the report pointed out.

Citing 212 agreements covering 3.1 million workers, it said con-

Davis-Bacon Fringes Backed by Meany

A bill to include fringe benefits in determining prevailing wages under the Davis-Bacon Act should be passed "without irrelevant or crippling amendments," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in a letter to each member of the House.

The fringe benefit bill, expected to come to a vote later this month, is "essential to protect local wage rates and local community living standards," he declared. At present, he said, an employer who does not pay such fringe benefits as health, welfare and insurance plans "clearly has an unfair advantage in bidding."

Overtime Seen Costing 919,000 Jobs

Johnson City, Tex.—Elimination of overtime work in industry would open up the equivalent of 919,000 full-time jobs—nearly a fourth of the present level of unemployment—Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz observed here.

"I would suggest consideration of whether the present overtime rate is correct," he said after conferring with Pres. Johnson.

The President was then preparing his State of the Union message to Congress, in which he urged industry-by-industry studies of overtime practices and possible establishment of higher penalties where excessive use of overtime contributes to increased joblessness. (See story this page.)

In his remarks to reporters, Wirtz stopped short of specific endorsement of the AFL-CIO's proposal that the current time-and-one-half rate for overtime work beyond 40 hours a week be increased to double time under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

In a resolution setting forth the proposal, the AFL-CIO convention recently declared:

"The serious problem is the tendency of employers to resort to overtime work for existing employes, rather than hiring additional workers. Almost 7 percent of all the paid manhours in manufacturing in 1962 were overtime hours. A considerable amount of overtime is scheduled even during recessions. As a result, hundreds of thousands of additional full-time job oppor-

Runaway Firm Loses Fight to Avoid Damages

Judy Bond, Inc., runaway blouse maker, has lost its third and final attempt to avoid paying $83,561 in damages to the workers it stranded two years ago in New York City by moving production to Alabama.

The U.S. Supreme Court refused to review lower court decisions ordering Judy Bond to pay damages and delinquent health and welfare fund contributions to the Ladies' Garment Workers.

The blouse manufacturer withdrew from the employers' association in 1961, closed its New York operation just as negotiations on a new contract were concluding, and moved all production to a plant in Brewton, Ala.

ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky said union members are "pleased with the Supreme Court action which upholds our position that a firm cannot wrap itself in the anti-trust laws" to evade its union obligations and "undermine the hard-won standards" of the workers.

The anti-trust law reference was to Judy Bond's assertion that the agreement between the union and the employers' association, of which it was for many years a member, violated the Sherman Act. The AGREEMENT ON new two-year contract providing a 35-cent wage and benefit package for 35,000 New York City transit workers is sealed with a handshake by Transport Workers Pres. Michael J. tracts provide these types of adjustment—wage reopening only; escalator clause only; deferred wage increase only; wage reopening and escalator clause; wage reopening and deferred wage increase; wage reopening, escalator clause and deferred wage increase.

Over half the workers scheduled to receive deferred wage boosts in 1964, the report noted, are in aircraft, shipbuilding and construction. The transportation equipment industry, including autos, accounts for more than three-fifths of the workers whose wages may be affected by changes in the BLS Consumer Price Index.

The report said possible wage adjustments during the year may result from contract reopenings provided in 79 agreements. Of these, 43 agreements covering 553,000 workers have guaranteed wage reopeners and 36 pacts, involving 529,000 other workers, have possible reopeners under stated conditions.

Major contracts up for 1964 negotiations include those of the Auto Workers, expiring August to October, for employes of General Motors, Ford, Chrysler, American Motors and the Budd Co. In aircraft, the UAW contract with the Bendix Corp. has an October termination date.

Other Expirations

Other expiring contracts involve the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers employed by Sperry Gyroscope and General Motors; Steelworkers at American Can Co. and Continental Can Co.; the UAW and farm equipment firms; Carpenters at Hughes Aircraft Co.; the Flint Glass Workers and the Glass & Ceramic Workers.

Also the Papermakers & Paperworkers; the Pulp & Sulphite Workers; Ladies' Garment Workers; Boot & Shoe Workers; United Shoe Workers; Packinghouse Workers; Meat Cutters; Tobacco Workers; Transport Workers; Railway Clerks; Street & Electric Railway Employes; Seafarers; Longshoremen; Communications Workers; Commercial Telegraphers; Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Retail Clerks; Insurance Workers; Building Service Employes; Hotel & Restaurant Employes, and others.

Deferred Pay Hikes Reach 7-Year Low

Approximately 2 million workers under major union agreements were covered by cost-of-living escalation clauses as of January 1964—an increase of more than 100,000 in one year, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics has announced.

In a report on deferred increases and wage escalation published in the Monthly Labor Review, the bureau also noted that fewer workers are scheduled to receive deferred wage increases, under union contracts negotiated in previous years, than in any year since 1957.

It put the total at 2.3 million workers, including construction workers. The report covered contracts affecting 1,000 or more employes in all areas except finance, government and the service trades.

The BLS said nearly 1.5 million of those scheduled to receive deferred increases in 1964 are in food, lumber, metalworking and retail trade. Another 773,000 are in the construction trades, where wage hikes of 3 to 25 cents an hour are scheduled.

Outside of construction, the most frequent raises are from 6 to 8 cents an hour due to be received by 690,000 employes of aerospace, glass, lumber, plywood and rubber firms.

The low 1964 total of deferred increases was attributed by the BLS to the expiration of agreements in the auto, farm equipment and trucking industries. These were treated in a separate report in the same department publication.

Refugee Group Names Porters' Aide to Board

NLRB Rules Unanimously:

What's the 'Public Interest'? —Not Necessarily Low Pay

The National Labor Relations Board, declaring that it cannot "turn off or turn on" its contract bar rule to meet employer arguments of special economic circumstances, has dismissed representation petitions challenging the Packinghouse Workers' bargaining rights at Swift & Co.'s Hallstead, Pa., plant.

The petitions for new elections had been filed by the company and an unaffiliated union after UPWA refused to make contract concessions in the face of a management warning that otherwise it would close the Hallstead facility.

"Will the employer do so, or is this threat . . . merely a bargaining tactic?" the board asked in a unanimous decision which noted that the plant still is in operation despite the company's original announcement of plans to close it last June 29.

In any event, the decision continued, "the questionable wisdom of permitting a threatened plant closing to influence a board decision whether to direct an election in the face of an existing contract is self-evident, especially in this day of increasing automation and substantial unemployment."

The ruling also rejected the arguments of the State of Pennsylvania, which intervened in support of the company and the unaffiliated union, the National Brotherhood of Packinghouse & Dairy Workers. State Atty. Gen. Walter E. Alessandroni had named Robert H. Kleeb as special assistant to present the state's argument in an amicus brief that the "public interest" warranted setting aside the contract bar rule to keep the plant operating.

Alessandroni was appointed to his state post by Gov. William W. Scranton (R), who has been increasingly mentioned as a possible Republican presidential nominee.

The NLRB said it was a "cognizant that there are other dimensions to this multifaceted phrase—the 'public interest.' "

Possible Ills Cited

It cited the possibility, which had been suggested in testimony, that if Swift succeeded in getting lower wages at the Hallstead plant, it might expand operations there instead of suspending them and shut down one or more plants elsewhere.

It also raised the question as to whether a wage cut at Hallstead might not lead to "a downward spiral" in wages paid under its nationwide contract with UPWA.

In other words, the board said, to bypass its established contract bar doctrine "might well be tantamount to shutting our eyes to other long range, yet perhaps more vital, aspects of the public interest—as reflected by the interests of employes covered by the employer's extensive nationwide contract or, more generally, by the ultimate public interest in preserving favorable terms of employment on a nationwide basis and encouraging free collective bargaining."

In essence, the board's doctrine is that an existing union-management contractual relationship serves as a bar to another representation election for its duration, up to a maximum of three years.

UPWA currently has a three-year master agreement covering employes at about 20 Swift plants across the country. At Hallstead, however, it agreed to a separate one-year guaranteed annual compensation plan in the face of management arguments that it could not operate the plant profitably under terms of the master agreement. Despite the company's threat to close the Hallstead plant unless the separate guaranteed-wage agreement were renewed, the union refused to do so, and the terms of the master agreement were reinstated as of Apr. 1, 1963 under express provisions of the special Hallstead contract.

Swift then notified the 40-50 employes that it planned to close the plant on June 29. UPWA Local 457, after failing to persuade the international that wage concessions were necessary, voted to disaffiliate and to form a local of the unaffiliated union.

Petitions Followed

The representation petitions of the unaffiliated brotherhood and the company quickly followed.

The NLRB, however, rejected the petitioners' arguments that execution of the local guaranteed-wage plan removed the Hallstead plant from the scope of the master agreement, that a schism existed within the UPWA, and that the board had discretion to waive the contract bar rule when this was dictated by the so-called "public interest."

The board, instead, agreed with the union that the master contract still was in effect at the plant and constituted a contract bar, that the disaffiliation action of one local did not amount to a schism, and—with respect to the public interest argument—that the Taft-Hartley Act precludes the board "from placing reliance on the 'ex parte' economic-oriented statements submitted, at least in part, by persons with special interests."

Because of the widespread interest it said the case had aroused, the board added these observations:

"If the negotiation, the making, the application and the revision of the substance of collective-bargaining agreements are to be left in the hands of the parties, where Congress clearly intended them to be, the board cannot properly turn off or turn on its contract bar doctrine depending on its own evaluation of the economic situation of the parties and of their community.

"Were the board to endow itself with such powers over the substance of collective bargaining, it would introduce uncharted instability into the application of a doctrine, contract bar, basically designed to endow the agreements made by the parties themselves with a reasonable, predictable stability."

Wirtz Sees 919,000 Jobs Cost of Overtime Work

tunities have been dissipated and will continue to be dissipated, unless extra compensation for overtime work is required—to discourage employers from scheduling unnecessary overtime work."

Labor Dept. reports show that factory workers averaged three hours of overtime a week in November, a level which has persisted for six months.

One particularly serious aspect of the unemployment problem, Wirtz later observed at his news conference in Austin, is the rising rate of joblessness among youth.

He noted that in a little more than a year unemployment among persons under 20 years of age had gone from 12 percent to more than 17 percent, whereas the rate for older workers had improved, going down to 3.1 percent. For all workers combined, the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment was 5.9 percent in November and has remained above 5 percent for more than six years.

Wirtz urged a large-scale expansion of "the education industry" to help reduce teen-age joblessness by encouraging young people to stay in school longer and better equip themselves for the skilled work demanded by technological advances.

Commenting on his discussions with the President on the Labor Dept.'s budget for the next fiscal year, he declared that "the human needs programs will not be cut back." Such activities as manpower retraining and the promotion of greater job opportunities for youth, Wirtz said, will go "full speed ahead."

The secretary said that 1.6 million youths will enter the labor market this year and urged enactment of the Administration's tax cut program to provide "at least 2 million more jobs than we would otherwise have."

The tax cut, he added, also would enable the nation to reach the President's goal of 75 million jobs within a year or two.

Wirtz Sets Up Davis-Bacon Review Board

The Labor Dept., adopting the suggestion of a congressional subcommittee, announced it will establish a board of public members to hear appeals from prevailing area wage determinations made under the Davis-Bacon Act.

The three-member Wage Appeals Board, to be appointed by the secretary, will have authority to raise or lower minimum hourly wages which must be paid by contractors on federal or federally-financed construction.

Such a board was recommended in 1962 by a House Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.). It is regarded as an alternative to a judicial review procedure which has been urged by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The Labor Dept. announcement by Sec. W. Willard Wirtz came a few days before the House was scheduled to vote on a labor-Administration-sponsored amendment to the Davis-Bacon Act which would include the value of fringe benefits in determining area prevailing rates.

Chief opposition has come from supporters of the judicial review procedure who were expected to seek to block the bill unless a court review provision was added.

The new administrative review procedure is scheduled to go into effect Feb. 3.

Royalties Won:

Musicians to Share In Sale of Records

New York—Musicians in the recording industry, where the job-destroying effects of automation have been felt for many years, have won a new five-year contract giving them direct participation in the sale of records.

The agreement, subject to a secret-ballot referendum ending Jan. 21, provides that the phonograph record industry will continue to pay royalties to Music Performance Trust Funds, which provide free music for worthy causes. But half the royalties will now be prorated among the players who make the record.

The contract was negotiated by the AFM executive board, headed by union Pres. Herman Kenin, and the AFM counsel, with a score or more industry spokesmen. Representatives of rank-and-file recording musicians also attended the sessions during several weeks of intensive negotiations.

The union has fought for many years to get a share of the income from recordings for the players who make them. Its first achievement was establishment of the trust funds, used to pay the salaries of musicians who give free concerts.

Last year the Musicians won an agreement giving royalties to the makers of television and radio "jingles" and spot announcements.

10,000 Covered

The new contract applies this idea to nearly 2,000 players, arrangers, orchestrators and copyists who work full-time for the industry, and another 8,000 who work part-time making an occasional recording.

The new agreement will become retroactive to Jan. 1, 1964, upon certification by the Honest Ballot Association of a favoring vote by affected members.

Kenin said the new pact also contains several other "firsts" for recording musicians—premium wage payments for Sunday, holiday and after-midnight work; premiums for "doubling" on more than one music instrument and for re-recording music by "tracing," "dubbing" or "sweetening" techniques.

Also it calls for mandatory rest periods, for hiring of music contractors under stated conditions; payment of cartage costs for transporting heavy instruments, and penalty payments for tardy reimbursement of musicians.

Members of major symphony orchestras, who make most serious music recordings, will get substantially the same gains in wages and working conditions that go under the new contract to the larger category of "commercial" recording musicians, the union noted.

The agreement for the first time recognizes the right of players to collect individual royalties. In the past, the right of composers to collect royalties has been widely recognized but musicians have been denied that right on the ground that those who reproduce music but do not create it should not get individual benefits. The first breach in this wall of objections has now been made, the AFM said.

courts rejected that argument, and also the employer's claim that the directed payment of damages for contract violations was a penalty, and not damages.

Loser in three court proceedings and an arbiter's hearing, Judy Bond also was found guilty of unfair labor practices Nov. 22 in a National Labor Relations Board decision. The board ordered reinstatement, with full back pay, for 10 workers forcibly expelled in 1962 from the Brewton plant. It found also that Local 422 of the United Garment Workers was guilty of unfair practices in causing the company to violate the rights of ILGWU members in the plant.

After Judy Bond bolted the employer's association and moved South, the ILGWU struck the runaway firm and began a nationwide consumer boycott campaign which still continues. Also it filed a claim for damages which was upheld by George J. Mintzer, impartial arbiter of union-industry disputes.

The firm refused to accept Mintzer's ruling, made in July 1962, that it pay $108,862 in damages. It lost successive appeals to the Supreme Court of New York State, the court's Appellate Div. and finally the U.S. high court.

During the lengthy court battles the company sent a check for $25,301 to the union in partial payment of the arbiter's damage award but refused to pay the balance—$61,000 for work channeled to non-union firms in violation of the contract, and $22,561 owed the industry-union health and welfare fund.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council in 1962 voted unanimously to uphold a claim by the ILGWU that it was justified in attempting to organize at Brewton though the plant was under contract to the UGWA. The council's action was the first under the justification provisions of the AFL-CIO internal disputes plan.

The UGWA had represented the 300 workers at Brewton plant before and after its purchase by Judy Bond. The ILGWU asked the UGWA not to make blouses at Brewton because of the ILGWU strike but the other union signed a three-year agreement while the strike was in progress.

SAVE THE SHIPYARD delegation from the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Council at the Boston Naval Shipyard won assurances of ship conversion work to keep the yard in operation after meeting with Navy officials in Washington, D. Macdonald, seated, Washington representative of Massachusetts Gov. Endicott Peabody.

New Mediation Effort Set in Rail Rules Fight

With rail operating unions and management deadlocked after nearly five months of negotiations on working conditions and rules, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz announced that he will lead a new top-level federal mediation effort to bring an agreement before a Feb. 25 deadline.

Congress last August ordered arbitration of two key issues in the work rules dispute—the employment of locomotive firemen and the composition of train crews. It left other major issues to direct negotiations between the parties, with a six-month bar on strikes or unilateral changes by management.

The arbitration board has handed down its decision—and a federal district judge rejected a legal challenge brought by four operating unions.

There has been little progress in direct negotiations dealing with such matters as the wage structure, union proposals for night shift differentials, paid holidays and expenses away from home, and management demands for longer inter-divisional runs and a freer hand in road and yard job assignments and operation of self-propelled equipment.

Wirtz, Assistant Labor Sec. James Reynolds and Chairman Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., of the National Mediation Board met with union and management negotiators, both separately and together.

In a comment on the progress of negotiations, Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen said in Chicago that the railroads are demanding "a complete change in the wage structure, which contemplates severe wage reductions" and "unbridled authority to move employes at will."

He said there had been a tendency to label the wage and other issues in dispute as "secondary," but stressed that these are "basic bread-and-butter issues.

If there is a move by the railroads to bring about compulsory arbitration by Congress on these issues, Gilbert said, "Congress should understand that the issues are different from those of last summer."

"It is bad enough to deprive a man of his job and seniority by law, but this time the railroads will ask Congress to help cut wages," he said.

Taking part in the Washington, D. C., negotiations are the Trainmen, Switchmen, Locomotive Engineers and Conductors as well as the Firemen.

Four operating unions which have challenged the arbitration award and the constitutionality of the law requiring arbitration plan to appeal an adverse decision by U.S. Dist. Judge Alexander Holtzoff, who ruled that the award is valid and the law "clearly constitutional."

RESOLUTION OF TRIBUTE to the late Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.), adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council after his death, is presented to his widow, Mrs. Nancy Kefauver, by AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Joseph A. Beirne and George M. Harrison. They brought the leather-bound, engrossed resolution to Mrs. Kefauver at her home in Washington, D. C.

California Union Rolls Set Record

Sacramento, Calif.—Union membership in California reached an all-time high of 1,776,000 last July, State Dir. of Industrial Relations Ernest B. Webb disclosed in his annual report showing lost net membership in some categories.

The new top compares with a previous high of 1,756,000 members reached in July 1960.

Webb's report also showed that in the year ended July 1963, unions gained a net total of 23,700 members, an increase of 1.4 percent at a time non-farm wage and salary employment in the state was rising by 3.6 percent.

In non-manufacturing industries, an estimated 29,100 workers were added to union membership rolls during the year. Major gains were in construction, wholesale and retail trade, and government, while losses were chalked up in rail and water transportation and motion picture production.

In manufacturing industries unions lost 5,400 members while factory employment increased by 1.6 percent.

Naval Shipyard Unionists Win Work Pledge

A trade union delegation from the Boston Naval Shipyard reported "success" in its goal of obtaining additional work to keep the historic shipyard in operation after two days of meetings in Washington, D. C., with high-ranking government officials.

The "Save the Shipyard" operation was launched by the Charlestown Metal Trades Council, AFL-CIO, in an effort to avert large-scale layoffs and possible closing of the Boston yard.

Council Pres. Nicholas Pizzella said Navy officials gave the union group assurances that two major ship conversion projects will be assigned to the Boston yard this spring and summer and that consideration will be given to other work assignments.

The delegation included Council Sec. Henry Wozniak, Bedros Dostoomian and George Hause. They worked closely with M. J. Macdonald, Washington representative of Massachusetts Gov. Endicott Peabody, and the state's congressional delegation.

Dispute Stalls School Pact In New York

New York — Members of the Teachers here have voted approval in a citywide referendum of a two-year contract with the Board of Education, but signing of the pact was held up because of a dispute on terms of a first contract for attendance teachers.

The United Federation of Teachers, Local 2 of the American Federation of Teachers, represents 43,000 teaching employes and 400 attendance teachers in a newly-organized unit. Neither contract will be signed, the UFT told the board, until agreement has been reached on both. The union has charged that board negotiators want to renege on four contract items which they had agreed to.

The vote on the classroom teacher contract was 12,623 yes, 1,882 no, with 850 ballots voided and 3,000 not counted because they did not arrive by deadline time during the Christmas mailing rush.

Both union and management are observing the contract terms, which include salary increases up to $580, improved grievance procedures, new arrangements for consultation with school officials, limitation on the size of classes, and other improvements in what the union says is the first contract of its kind in the nation.

Special Projects Set for Veteran

Portland, Oreg. — Pres. J. D. "Rosy" McDonald of the Oregon AFL-CIO has reduced his activities to part time under a special provision of the state labor body's constitution enacted at the last convention.

He stressed that while he will no longer be working on a full-time, full-pay basis, he is not retiring from the labor movement but "tapering off." Under the constitutional proviso he will be available for special assignments under the direction of Executive Sec.-Treas. J. T. Marr. The clause permits an officer to cut down his activities at age 65 with retirement pay of $10 per month for each year of service up to a maximum of $150. McDonald is 68.

A member of the Meat Cutters, McDonald has been president of the State AFL-CIO and the predecessor State Federation of Labor for 20 years.

AT LBJ RANCH, Pres. and Mrs. Johnson welcomed Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson, newly-named special assistant to the President for consumer affairs, and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz. In naming Mrs. Peterson to the new post, the President said he wanted the voice of the consumer to be "loud, clear, uncompromising and effective."

Retains Labor Dept. Post:

Johnson Picks Mrs. Peterson As Consumer Affairs Adviser

Pres. Johnson has named Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther F. Peterson to be the "loud, clear, uncompromising and effective" voice of the consumer in the top echelons of government.

He appointed her to the newly-created post of special assistant to the President for consumer affairs and then followed up the appointment with an executive order establishing a high-level interagency Committee on Consumer Interests and a companion Consumers Advisory Council of private citizens.

The President, who brought Mrs. Peterson to his Texas LBJ ranch to announce the appointment and stress the significance of the move, pledged an "unrelenting fight" against those "who deceive or defraud the consumer, who exact unfair prices or level unfair charges."

Establishment of "stronger machinery for consumer representation in government" had been urged in a resolution adopted at the November AFL-CIO convention in New York City. The federation said the ultimate goal should be "establishment of a full-scale Dept. of Consumers."

Mrs. Peterson, who will retain her Labor Dept. post, was legislative representative for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. when she was tapped for high-level government service by the late Pres. Kennedy at the start of his Administration. Previously she had served as legislative representative of the Clothing Workers after a period as the ACWA's assistant director of education.

She worked actively with labor and women's groups in Sweden and Belgium when her husband, Oliver Peterson, a foreign service officer, was labor attache at U.S. embassies there.

Backs Pending Bills

In accepting the "tremendous challenge" of representing America's consumers at the White House level, Mrs. Peterson emphasized her support of the "truth-in-lending" bill sponsored by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) and the "truth-in-packaging" bill proposed by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.).

Consumers, she said, "shouldn't have to take a slide rule" into a supermarket to figure out the best values among an assortment of odd-sized food and household packages.

Interest and credit charges should be stated simply, she said, remarking that "some of the most pitiful letters I get are from people in the low-income groups who really just mortgage themselves away."

Johnson's executive order set up the President's Committee on Consumer Interests made up of officials, at the assistant secretary level, from nine government departments and agencies, plus private citizens who will also serve as members of the Consumer Advisory Council.

He instructed federal agencies to "seek the advice" of the committee and the advisory counsel on matters affecting consumers and to consider recommendations made on behalf of the consumer interest.

Responsibilities Outlined

The President charged the committee to consider how "unmet consumer needs can appropriately be met through federal action, either under existing laws or new legislation." He asked advice from the council "on issues of broad economic policy of immediate concern to consumers."

A Consumer Advisory Council was set up under the Council of Economic Advisers under the Kennedy Administration. Its first annual report last fall expressed the hope that the experiment would lead "to a more firmly based, more effective, and more permanent organization in the future."

The new machinery upgrades the consumer advisory role in government by bringing the new committee and council directly into the presidential chain of command.

Newspapers, Unions Get Bid to 'Summit' Parley

New York—The American Arbitration Association has invited newspaper union and management representatives to a "summit" conference on publishing problems Jan. 20-22 at Tampa, Fla.

The conference, second of its kind in recent months, will follow the "ground rules" and format of the top-level meeting of publishers and union officers held Sept. 17-19 at Santa Barbara, Calif.

AAA Pres. Donald B. Straus announced that he has invited six union officials and 27 publisher representatives to meet at Tampa's International Inn.

The purpose, he said, is to help unions and management set up continuing bilateral and tripartite discussions of matters that cannot usually be dealt with during the short time available" for negotiation of new collective bargaining agreements.

Straus added that the association, responding to "requests of leading publisher and union representatives" to provide another conference like the one last fall, agreed to act as sponsor "as a new service . . . consistent with the AAA's traditional role in participating as a neutral in dispute settlements."

The second "meeting at the summit" is not intended to produce a "panacea for settling strikes" but as an occasion for discussing matters that do not lend themselves to a solution at the bargaining table, Straus asserted.

The union heads invited by Straus are Pres. Elmer Brown, Typographers; Pres. A. J. DeAndrade, Pressmen; Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson, Newspaper Guild; Pres. William J. Hall, Photo Engravers; Pres. James H. Sampson, Stereotypers; and Vice Pres. Harold J. Gibbons of the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Invited to represent newspaper owners and managers are Chairman Miles P. Patrone of the Special Standing Committee, American Newspaper Publishers' Association; officials of the Hearst, Scripps-Howard, Ridder, Gannett, McClatchy and other chains; and non-chain publishers.

Presiding officer again will be Dr. Clark Kerr, president of the University of California. David L. Cole, arbiter, heads an advisory committee.

Straus's letter of invitation said all discussions will be off-the-record and without attribution; no reference to the proceedings may be made in future arbitration or negotiations; and there will be no public statements other than one that has been agreed to by all participants.

He said the association is willing to hold similar meetings for other industries and that its services will be made available to interested groups of employers and unions on request.

$3 Million in Backpay Recommended in Strike

A backpay award of approximately $3 million has been recommended by a National Labor Relations Board aide for 381 members of the Auto Workers at the American Metal Products Co. plant in Union City, Tenn.

Upholding UAW Local 1889, Trial Examiner Horace A. Ruckel said what started as an economic strike on Nov. 14, 1961, was converted to an unfair practice strike by the firm's refusal to bargain with the union when it unilaterally hired strikebreakers at less-than-contract wages and paid women replacements less than male workers.

Ruckel concluded that it was "difficult to imagine a step better calculated to destroy the prestige of a bargaining representative."

He said management not only hired replacements for the strikers at lower wages but also cut the wages of a few employes who returned to work. Both actions were carried out without notifying or consulting the union, said Ruckel, adding that this was an unfair labor practice.

He found also that the firm's hiring of non-union workers, particularly after the union members offered unconditionally on Jan. 18, 1962, to return to work, was undertaken with the air "not only of destroying the union's majority but of destroying the union."

The union "obviously could not accept this situation without a protest and survive," the examiner said in recommending reinstatement of the workers with backpay.

The union's method of protesting was to vote for another strike, and its members reinstated their picket line Mar. 1, 1962, when management refused to provide a list of the rates paid to strikebreakers.

Ruckel pointed out that the strike started originally when, after 19 meetings, management refused to change its demand for abolishment of a cost-of-living provision.

R. Muehlhoffer Dies After Short Illness

New Philadelphia—Ray Muehlhoffer, president and secretary-treasurer of the Metal Polishers, died Jan. 2 in a Dover, O., hospital after being stricken at his home here on New Year's Day.

Muehlhoffer, 60 years of age, had headed the 20,000-member union, with headquarters in Cincinnati, since 1949. He was also third vice president of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.

After joining the Cleveland local in 1934, he immediately became active in union affairs, serving as both president and business agent of his local before being elected president of the national organization.

In addition to heading the union, he was active for many years in Democratic politics in Tuscarawas County, O.

He is survived by his widow, Rose, to whom AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler wired condolences, saying, "We are shocked and grieved to learn of the death of your beloved husband. He moulded a lasting monument in the labor movement by the good work he accomplished for his union brothers."

Jesse Gallagher, director of AFL-CIO Reg. VI, represented the federation at funeral services.

Anti-Litter Group Re-Elects McDonald

New York—Pres. David J. McDonald of the Steelworkers was reelected a trustee of Keep America Beautiful, Inc., at the organization's annual meeting this week.

California Consumers Give Honor to Brown

Millbrae, Calif.—Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown, who launched a pioneering consumer protection program four years ago, told the Association of California Consumers that "there is still a lot of tough, hard work to be done."

Brown, who received a special award from the association, called for "a people's lobby" in Sacramento and in Washington to press legislation requiring truthful disclosure of interest and credit charges and honest packaging of goods.

Mrs. Jackie Walsh, president of San Francisco Waitresses Local 48 of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, re-elected to her fourth term as head of the statewide consumers' association, presented the award to Brown. The citation praised the governor for "initiating a bold program to assure to all consumers their basic rights" and for steering through the legislature the bill establishing the Office of Consumer Counsel, to which he appointed Mrs. Helen Nelson.

Brown told the organization's convention that "business has not been hurt by consumer legislation, in California or nationally." In fact, he said, it has protected "reputable sellers who do not rely on tricks or shady practices to make unfair profit."

Taking note of criticism of the consumer counseling by some business spokesmen, Brown declared:

"I say this to those businessmen: government is doing its part to provide you with a good business climate.

"We are building schools and colleges and training your workers.

"We are providing water, highways and recreation facilities. We protect your property from fire, floods and thieves.

"We guard you against unfair competition."

Brown noted that "if there is any imbalance of forces in the marketplace, there is nothing to indicate that the balance has swung in favor of the consumer."

"If anything," he said, "there is plenty of evidence in the other direction."

PIONEERING CONSUMER program launched by California Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown wins him an award from the Association of California Consumers. The presentation is made by Mrs. Jackie Walsh, president of Waitresses Local 48 in San Francisco and head of the statewide consumers' organization.

2 Others Set for Review:

Unions Win 3 Cases Before High Court

The U.S. Supreme Court has handed down three decisions reversing rulings of state courts and upholding union arguments on seniority lists, arbitration on work assignments and informational picketing.

The court agreed also to review lower court decisions in two major areas of labor relations: an employer's right to subcontract work without consulting the union and the right of non-struck employers in a joint bargaining unit to lock out union members and use replacements when one of the bargaining units is struck.

In the seniority case, the court reversed the Kentucky Court of Appeals and upheld a union-employer joint conference committee agreement that the way to deal with job problems in the merger of two auto-hauling firms was to merge their seniority lists. Employes at one of the companies had challenged the agreement as beyond the scope of the contract and as a violation of the union's duty of fair representation.

Justices Arthur J. Goldberg and William J. Brennan agreed with the ruling but opposed the implication in the majority decision that union members could freely sue their unions under the Taft-Hartley Act on the presumption that the union had not properly represented them.

In the arbitration case, the court reversed the New York Court of Appeals and approved the request of the Electrical, Radio, & Machine Workers for an order requiring Westinghouse to arbitrate a dispute involving work assignments. The court said that arbitration may advance peaceful settlement.

State Injunction Reversed

In the informational picketing case, the court reversed a Tennessee state court injunction against peaceful picketing of a shopping center construction site where a non-union contractor was engaged, declaring that issuance of such an injunction was beyond the power of the state court and frustrated federal policy on labor relations.

The case involving the Chattanooga, Tenn., Building Trades Council and the Laborers union posed also the question of whether the issue was moot because the construction job had been finished by the time the case came before the court. The justices found that the case was held legally alive by the existence of a bond posted by the construction company for possible indemnification of the union if it were found to have suffered damages because of the injunction.

The subcontracting case will come before the court this term involving two questions: whether the employer was required by federal labor law to bargain with the union on the letting to an independent contractor of work which had been performed by union members; and whether the NLRB, in a case involving only the refusal to bargain, was empowered to order the resumption of operations which had been discontinued and reinstatement with back pay of workers previously employed on the work subcontracted.

The case involves the Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. and the Steelworkers. Originally the NLRB had voted to dismiss the case, but on reconsideration it held that the company violated the Taft-Hartley Act in subcontracting the work at its Emeryville, Calif., plant without consulting USW Local 1304. The Circuit Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia upheld the board and the company appealed to the high tribunal.

The second important case accepted for review involved the Retail Clerks in Carlsbad, N. M. The NLRB had ruled that non-struck members of a food store association violated the Taft-Hartley Act in locking out their employes during a strike against one member. The 10th Circuit Court of Appeals overruled the board's finding and the agency sought review by the Supreme Court.

Johnson Hails 'Unparalleled Era' Of Labor Peace Since End of '59

By Eugene A. Kelly

A Labor Dept. report of a near-record low level of strike activity in 1963 was called "most important and gratifying" by Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, reporting to Johnson that all measures of strike activity moved downward last year from 1962 levels to help make up a four-year record unmatched by any similar peacetime period since the depression, said the nation has experienced "an unparalleled era of industrial peace" since the close of 1959.

Johnson called the report "an indication of a growing maturity and responsibility in the collective bargaining process." He said the record "illustrates how far industrial democracy has advanced in this country" in recent years. He added:

"I know of no better confirmation of the vitality, the strength and the promise of the free enterprise system than that shown by the ability of labor and management to work out their destinies in a free and peaceful manner."

Wirtz told Johnson that the number of worker affected by stoppages beginning in 1963 was 1.03 million, lowest since 1942. Time lost through strikes and lockouts was 15 one-hundredths of 1 percent, a level lower than in any other postwar year except two—1957 and 1961, he said.

The Labor Dept. said approximately 3,400 stoppages began in 1963, compared with 3,614 in 1962. They involved 1.03 million workers as against 1.23 million the year before. Lost time totaled 17.8 million mandays because of stoppages that began in 1963 or continued from 1962, compared with 18.6 million mandays in 1962, the department reported.

The favorable record for 1963 was attributed by the Labor Dept. to the small number of major strikes—only seven stoppages involving 10,000 workers or more began in 1963, compared with the previous postwar low of 12 in 1956 and an average of 16 for 1960-1962.

Including two large strikes that continued into 1963, the major stoppages accounted for only about one-tenth of time lost because of stoppages in 1963, the department reported.

It listed these days lost per worker because of stoppages that began last year: millinery workers, New York, eight; shoe workers, Boston, two; sugar workers, Hawaii, 10; construction workers, Syracuse-Albany, N. Y., 16; operating engineers, St. Louis, 26; building trades, Buffalo, N. Y., eight; lumber workers, West Coast, 98.

CLC Urges Canadawide Pension Plan

Ottawa, Ont.—The Canadian Labor Congress has called on all affiliates to work for the enactment of a Canadawide pension program as the central body observes its traditional Citizenship Month during February.

In rallying support for the campaign, CLC Pres. Claude Jodoin described pensions as "one of the weakest areas" in Canada's social legislation and urged improvements in the basic old age benefit program.

"At the same time," he went on, "there is need for a broader contributory and portable plan enabling workers to carry benefits from job to job and providing new opportunities for other groups, particularly farmers.

"As far as industrial workers are concerned, the need for portability becomes increasingly evident in the face of the sweeping changes which are taking place in industry. Job changes inevitably result, and in too many cases the equity a worker has in the pension plan of one company is lost when he moves to another."

Jodoin said Canada can pay its "debt to the past" by providing older citizens "with the essentials of a decent standard of living" and at the same time can establish the future security of all citizens.

"This is not only correct from a moral point of view," he said, "but it is also a sound economic policy providing for a continuing improvement in the standard of living for all and filling a social security gap."

A detailed program is being worked out to enlist the cooperation of all sections of the CLC, Jodoin said.

"DON'T BE A BUNNY—Work for Money," these pickets urge potential employes of the Detroit Playboy Club, where waitresses or "bunnies" work for nothing but tips. The picket line was organized by Local 705, Hotel & Restaurant Employes, and was swelled by members of the Cooks and the Bartenders as well as the dog.

Jobless Benefits Won After 13-Year Fight

Seven hundred Ohio Auto Workers won a 13-year battle for unemployment compensation due them, but the state legislature in the meantime passed a law which will bar compensation payments to future groups of workers laid off in similar circumstances.

The claim dated back to 1949 when, as a result of a strike over local issues at Ford plants in the Detroit area, management shut down plants at Canton and Hamilton, Ohio.

After years of litigation, the State Supreme Court ruled recently that the Ohio and Michigan plants were different "establishments" and since the Ohio workers were not on strike, they should be entitled to unemployment benefits under the state law then in effect.

The workers will get their long-overdue payments as a result. But earlier this year the Republican legislature changed the law to bar payments to workers idled because of a strike at an out-of-state plant of the same company.

Ironically, a different incident led earlier to an exactly parallel development in Michigan.

On another occasion, it was the Ford Canton plant which had been struck over local issues—and Michigan workers who were laid off sought to collect unemployment compensation.

The Michigan Supreme Court ruled—as did the Ohio court—that unemployment compensation should be paid.

Earlier this year the Michigan legislature, also Republican controlled, changed the state law so as to preclude payment of benefits in future situations of this nature.

New ILO Aide Named by Morse

Geneva—Appointment of Hafiz Abdul Majid of Pakistan as an assistant director general of the Intl. Labor Organization has been announced by Dir.-Gen. David A. Morse.

Majid, a veteran of the Indian and Pakistan civil services, was named special assistant to Morse in July 1962 and has supervised the ILO personnel office since January.

Goldwater

SEN. BARRY GOLDWATER has formally entered the lists of candidates for the Republican presidential nomination to insure, in his terms, a valid choice between liberalism and conservatism.

The Arizona department store owner's formal announcement culminated several years of extensive criss-crossing of the nation and thousands of speeches which clearly entitle Goldwater to hoist the conservative, or perhaps ultra-conservative, banner.

Although in the past six months or so those who have followed the political declarations of the Arizona Republican closely have noticed a shifting of positions and an attempt to embrace more moderate viewpoints, Goldwater today stands unchallenged as the voice of a form of conservatism that is jarringly at odds with the country and the world in the second half of the Twentieth Century.

TO BACK UP his claim as spokesman for roll-back-the-clock conservatism, Goldwater has put together an impressive record in his 10 years in the Senate. The AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education has compiled his votes on 52 separate rollcalls since he entered the Senate and credited him with 52 "wrong" votes. Not once in the 10-year period did he vote "right" in terms of the AFL-CIO position on the legislation involved.

If Goldwater were to succeed in his quest for the Republican presidential nomination, the voters in November would have a choice of electing to the most powerful office in the free world a man who has written in his book, "Conscience of a Conservative:"

"The government must begin to withdraw from a whole series of programs . . . from social welfare programs, education, public power, agriculture, public housing, urban renewal and all the other activities that can be better performed by lower levels of government or by private institutions or by individuals."

His views on taxation—in 1961 he was quoted in a responsible newspaper as saying "get rid of the whole graduated income tax"—on civil rights, where he opposes federal fair employment practices laws and public accommodation legislation; on health care for the aged, which he has characterized as destroying freedom, are indicative of his approach.

IN A SENSE the nation is fortunate that a man of Goldwater's political philosophy is formally seeking the GOP nomination. His views, while several notches above the rantings of the radical right, nevertheless reflect to a great extent the fear-ridden segment of the electorate that is overwhelmed by the complex problems of our time and flees to the simpler dogmas of earlier centuries.

The democratic system is keyed to the free marketplace of ideas and dogmas and it is better that these ideas be placed openly before the voters, where they can be exposed and demolished, than to have them in the shadowy background of a candidate who hides behind the platitudes and slogans of a carefully manufactured campaign.

The delegates to the Republican national convention will have the final say on Goldwater, but they should have before them one important evaluation of the candidate that appeared in the New York Post of May 11, 1961:

The paper, in an interview with Goldwater, drew from him the comment that he is not "equipped for the job; there are men far better equipped."

Professor's Study Shows:

Propaganda of Extreme Right Used by Blue Chip Corporations

A COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY professor has charged that top American "blue chip" corporations are including "heavy doses of radical rightist materials" in their anti-Communist public education programs.

Alan F. Westin, associate professor of public law and government at Columbia, who made the charges, said there is no evidence of the existence of a corporate conspiracy with the extreme right and that "intelligent, balanced—and indeed even liberal—corporate anti-Communist programs," do exist.

Westin's findings, in Commentary magazine, are based on first-hand research into the anti-Communist materials of more than 100 corporations, and discussions with leading management associations, many corporate public affairs officers and spokesmen for civic and labor groups.

The article, "Anti-Communism in the Corporations," cites as a major example of extreme rightwing propaganda Communism on the Map, a one-hour film strip "written by a Birch Society stalwart who drew heavily from Robert Welch's Blue Book."

Despite the fact that the Birch origins of this film were widely exposed in the press, hundreds of major companies continue to use it, including Goodyear Tire, Minnesota Mining, Aluminum Corp. of America, Boeing, Jones & Laughlin Steel, Revere Copper & Brass, Convair, Arkansas-Missouri Power, Texas Power & Light, Schick Safety Razor, Ohio Bell Telephone and North American Aviation.

Although Dr. Fred Schwarz of the Christian Anti-Communism Crusade has disavowed the film as a mistake, it "continues as a best seller in the corporate world not only for showing to employes, but also for active community programs of these companies."

Westin points out that many of the "activist" indoctrination programs are carried out by "small and middle-size businesses located in California, pockets of the South, and the southern tier of the Midwest." Large firms in these areas which rely heavily on Birch materials are either individually owned or family managed.

In this category, the most extensive customer-community "educational" campaign is conducted by the Coast Federal Savings & Loan Association of Los Angeles, one of the five largest savings and loan institutions in the country with assets of more than $5 million.

Other substantial firms which carry on active Birchite programs, Westin said, are: Knott Berry Farm and Dr. Ross Dog Food in California, Cherokee Textile Mills in Tennessee, Spindale Mills in North Carolina, the Allen Bradley Corp. of Wisconsin, the Warner & Swasey Co. in Ohio.

The Freedom Forums sponsored by the National Education Program, an extreme rightist group, have involved many members of the "blue chip corporate community," including Boeing Aircraft, Houston Lighting & Power, Monsanto Chemical, Gulf Oil, Southwestern Bell, Stockham Valves & Fittings, Pontiac, Quaker Oats, and Goodyear.

These companies and others send executives to participate in the Freedom Forums which include representatives of the following rightist groups: John Birch Society, Four Freedoms, Christian Anti-Communism Crusade, Americanism vs. Communism, Letter of Correspondence, Christian Economics, and Lamplighter Study Group.

WESTIN STRESSED that despite publicity given "to the extremist character of the National Education Program materials, top company executives from firms such as Swift & Co., Monsanto Chemical, General Electric, Armco Steel, and Mississippi Power, still sit on the Freedom Forum Advisory Committee."

Major companies have also had an important hand in financing Schwarz' right wing Christian Anti-Communism Crusade. Despite the condemnation by respectable church, educational and civic groups of Schwarz' Crusade for its uselessness in fostering a proper understanding of communism, major companies that have footed the bills for Schwarz rallies include Richfield Oil, Technicolor, Union Oil, Deering-Milliken and United Aircraft.

Westin reported that a newspaper advertisement endorsing the Schwarz rally was signed by top executives from Rexall Drugs, Air Finance Co., United Whelan, Bank of America, Diners Club, E. F. Hutton & Co., and others.

Business leaders are beginning to recognize the danger of extreme right-wing propaganda and several management groups, "including the American Management Association and the Effective Citizens Organization, have begun to distribute lists of responsible books, films and speakers, and to advise interested companies about course packagers to be avoided."

Morgan Says:

The Nation Still Has a Chance To Preserve Some of Its Beauty

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

IT NEVER FAILS. Every time I cross the country, the great majestic sweep of America fills me with awe and pride—and apprehension. Perhaps no nation on the face of the earth has been blessed with more of Nature's treasure and yet we have not husbanded the riches prudently nor have we hesitated to deface the breathless beauty of the land, whether for timber or the location of a hot dog stand.

Morgan

Not everybody has been a plunderer, though wanton litterbugs do seem to be beyond count. And responsible citizens, minority though they be, are quickening the battle to preserve our natural resources and bring harmony instead of greedy exploitation to the development of cities and suburbs.

There is one stark fact which should startle us all into action. Pres. Kennedy uttered it on his last trip through the West, his so-called conservation tour.

He deeply loved his native land and his concern for its future was contained in one set of statistics he kept repeating from Pennsylvania to Palm Springs: There are 190 million people in the United States today and by the turn of the century, less than 37 years away, the population will swell to the staggering figure of 340 million.

How will the still lovely city of Seattle cope with its share of this swarm? By more hideous bridges across Lake Washington feeding into real estate developments that are planned to do more for the developers than for civic pride and convenience? How will the nation's capital itself, which began from the graceful gleam of urban planning in Maj. L'Enfant's eye, save itself from the utter chaos of ugliness induced by the eagerness of promoters, the venality of political hacks in surrounding counties and the slovenliness of Congress in governing—if that's the word—the District of Columbia?

Happily, the Kennedy Administration gave much impetus to sensible thinking on these vital matters and the Johnson Administration shows signs of following suit. One of the New Frontiersmen most appreciative of the richness of our land and sensitive to the urgency of conserving it is a native of the wide open spaces of Arizona, Sec. of the Interior Stewart Udall. Udall has recently published a book entitled "The Quiet Crisis," which deals excitingly with the heritage of the American land plus the problems of now and tomorrow.

AUTHOR UDALL, nature lover and scaler of mountains from Fujiyama to Kilimanjaro, brings the whole issue into sharp focus in the foreword of his book where he relates two events called to his attention "which seemed to sum up the plight of modern man: the first was a press report which indicated that T. S. Eliot, the poet, was a victim of London's . . . 'killer fog' and lay gravely ill; the second was a call from a preservation-minded citizen of New Hampshire who informed me that Robert Frost's old farm—fixed for all time in memory of the poem 'West-running Brook'—was now an auto junk yard."

"The coincidence of these two events raised questions in my mind," Udall wrote. "Is a society a success if it creates conditions that impair its finest minds and make a wasteland of its finest landscapes? What does material abundance avail if we create an environment in which man's highest and most specifically human attributes cannot be fulfilled?"

This is the current "Quiet Crisis" of which Stewart Udall writes, adding, with hope, that "it is not too late to repair some of the mistakes of the past . . . if we understand the history of our husbandry, and develop fresh insight concerning the men and forces that have shaped our land attitudes and determined the pattern of land use in the United States." There is a big lesson here and Americans need to do a heap of homework on it, from the Bering Sea to Miami Beach, from Waikiki to Bangor, Me.

Tenth Year

Speaking of soap boxes, this correspondent finds himself in the unexpected position tonight of starting his tenth year broadcasting from this one. It is a marvelous position to be in and I only wish more journalists, electronic and otherwise, were privileged to mount one under the astonishingly civilized conditions that my sponsor, the AFL-CIO, and my employer, the American Broadcasting Co., have seen fit for nearly a decade to draw for me.

The rules of this broadcast are simple: Fairness in news reporting and fairness in comment with no censorship on either, regardless of where the chips of criticism may fall. As the rules remain, the opportunity and the responsibility increase for me. I hope I can live up to the exciting, sobering challenge of both.

Washington Reports:

Udall Urges National 'Wisdom' To Buy Tomorrow's Parks Now

SEC. OF THE INTERIOR Stuart Udall expressed the hope that the people of the United States will agree we should "be wise enough to pay now for the parks we are going to need tomorrow" as he was interviewed on the AFL-CIO public service program, Washington Reports to the People, carried on almost 700 radio stations.

A pending conservation fund bill has been approved in committee, he said, and hoped that it will be on the floor of the House in late January or early February. The measure would set up a special fund of $150 to $200 million annually, of which 60 percent would go to the states on a 50-50 matching basis, for park projects and outdoor recreation projects of various kinds.

The other 40 percent would be used by the federal government for new national seashores, national parks and areas in national forests for recreation, wildlife refuge, etc.

Udall announced a Lower Colorado River conservation plan of 400,000 acres, running along the river from the Hoover Dam 300 miles to the Mexican border. This project, worked out with California and Colorado, includes man-made lakes, parks, wildlife refuges and other recreation and conservation areas.

The conservation fund bill would encourage many states to work out programs of this kind, Udall said. It would also enable the federal government to create public park areas along the seashores and elsewhere.

"THIS MEANS projects like Cape Cod in Massachusetts," he explained, "Fire Island near New York City, Assateague off the Maryland coast—parks along some of our rivers; island parks, like the Channel Islands off the coast of California, the Apostle Islands in Lake Superior."

Udall said he had been named by the President to represent the U.S. in Kenya when that nation celebrated its independence, because this and other countries in Africa are interested in preserving their parks, game preserves and forests.

"Tourism can be a tremendous source of income for them—and the U.S." he remarked. "In the U.S., as we increase leisure time, tourism is one of the great, growing, stable and dynamic industries."

Udall is author of a recent book, "The Quiet Crisis," written to encourage conservation. He believes its sale indicates that "we are waking up to our opportunities in conservation."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

SELDOM HAS Walter Lippmann, a most veteran and experienced columnist, treated a highly publicized and supposedly "major" presidential candidate with the open denunciation he visited on Sen. Goldwater of Arizona on the latter's announcement of his Republican candidacy.

Entirely apart from the senator's "extraordinary and altogether untrue" statement that a President can't break diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union without "an action of the Senate," Lippmann challenged Goldwater as a spokesman of "conservatism."

The Arizona senator speaks for "a minority [faction] within a minority party," said the columnist, and is trying to have the established Republican leadership "ousted and purged" so that Goldwater adherents can claim "to be invested as the only true Republicans."

Lippmann pointed to those brought up in the historic Republican tradition. Hamilton was notoriously a strong federal government spokesman but Goldwater would "transform the party of Hamilton into an anti-federal party."

He would "transform the party of Lincoln," who signed the Emancipation Proclamation, "into the party of the white supremacists."

Theodore Roosevelt was a progressive and a reformer, a strong federal government man and a "trust-buster," but Goldwater would "transform the party of Theodore Roosevelt into an anti-progressive party of uncontrolled and unregulated businessmen, each man for himself and the devil take the hindmost."

LIPPMANN IN HIS TIME has supported Republican candidates against Democratic presidential nominees — Alf Landon against Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1936, for example—and believes that the only Republican elected to the presidency since Herbert Hoover, Gen. Eisenhower, should scarcely be read out of the party. His harshest blast against Goldwater is in these paragraphs:

"By all the historic and traditional considerations of the English-speaking world, by the precedents that come from Burke and Hamilton, from Disraeli and from Lincoln, Barry Goldwater is not a conservative at all. He appears to be totally without the essential conservative respect . . . for the social order as a living body.

"He is a radical reactionary who would, if we are to believe what he says, dismantle the modern state. His political philosophy does not have its roots in the conservative tradition but in the crude and primitive capitalism of the Manchester school. It is the philosophy not of the conservators of the social order but of the newly rich on the make.

"If he is able to capture the Republican party organization by getting himself nominated, the condition of the party will be a shambles. For the Republicans, the question in 1964 would then be not how to beat Lyndon Johnson but how to survive the assault and the challenge of the Goldwater faction."

IN COMMENTING on Goldwater's half-incredible remarks (on a Meet the Press television interview) about the powers of the President in diplomatic relations, Lippmann perhaps ran short of space for noting another extraordinary error. Goldwater called a gentleman named Hans Morgenthau a "distinguished physicist" and claimed Morgenthau agreed that the nuclear-test ban treaty should be renounced.

Hans Morgenthau is not a physicist, distinguished or otherwise, but a most distinguished political scientist—and he doesn't agree with Goldwater about the nuclear test-ban treaty.

You could run a survey of all U.S. "distinguished physicists" and come up with few who would really agree with Goldwater on the test ban treaty. The treaty was not negotiated without careful study of the views of "distinguished physicists," and there are very few political figures (except the Chinese Communists) who express dogmatic opposition to opening steps toward an easing of tensions between the East and West. But the senator from Arizona can't even get the name of his physicist straight.

THE GREAT OUTDOORS is the playground for those who can't afford expensive private resorts, especially workers and their families, Sec. of the Interior Stuart Udall declared in an interview about the conservation fund bill now before Congress. He discussed the measure on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

'Fairly Stable' Prices for 1964 Offer Chance to Cut Living Costs

By Sidney Margolius

THIS JANUARY we have to discard our usual annual forecast of another sizable rise in living costs. For 1964, the prospect is for fairly stable prices. In fact, an alert family that knows how and when to buy should be able to reduce some of its basic expenses and have more money for other family goals.

Especially look for sharp price cuts and big sales in the annual January clearances. Unusually warm weather in some regions earlier this winter and the gloom cast over Christmas shopping by the assassination of Pres. Kennedy have left stores with heavy inventories, particularly of clothing and gift items.

In general, you can expect a year of reasonable food prices. Cheap beef especially is going to be a big help. You also can expect a continuation of low prices for clothing, with the exception of somewhat higher prices on wool garments.

This also will be a good year to shop for home equipment. An increasing number of appliances is available at genuine bargain prices. Too, retail prices of both new and used cars are sagging.

But your problems in 1964 will be higher price tags on medical care; on some housing expenses, especially home operation and repairs; on commercial recreation such as movie admissions, and on auto maintenance.

Here is a checklist of specific price prospects to help guide you in selecting good values in 1964:

Food prices will be relatively stable, some important ones even will be cheaper. You can make savings by using more of the especially-abundant foods. Especially good buys will include beef (in exceptionally large supply); eggs; poultry; pork (during the winter and spring); tuna (now selling at lowest prices of recent years); Maine sardines, and canned corn. Frozen orange juice concentrates will continue expensive, even if a little less costly than last year.

In clothing, take advantage of the January sales, especially to fill your needs of coats, suits and other wool garments; also, hosiery. Rising wool prices are expected to boost prices of men's suits, coats and other wool clothing later this year. Some hosiery manufacturers also raised prices.

In household appliances, you will be able to find both low prices and improved designs. Particularly low in price are refrigerators, washing machines and dryers, vacuum cleaners and ranges. Zig-zag sewing machines are cheaper.

One of the most interesting new developments is the self-cleaning range introduced by one large maker. This is accomplished by a special high temperature setting. However, the new device so far is available only on the more expensive models.

In refrigerators, the news is the model that comes with a counter work area. The freezer section forms the base of the counter area, and the refrigerator is above the recessed counter.

In washing machines, a significant development is increased capacity, with three manufacturers introducing 14-pound washers. Previous largest capacity was 12 pounds. The big machines usually have larger agitators, stronger components and increased oscillation to handle the heavier loads.

In furniture and rugs, some furniture lines and floor coverings, especially wool rugs, will cost a little more. For furniture, we advise shopping during the February sales.

HOUSING REMAINS the big budget problem, with construction costs again 3 percent above a year ago. Renters will find landlords in some cities offering more concessions. Real estate interests are finding over-priced new apartments more difficult to rent.

In 1964, low-cost individual houses—those under $15,000—will be even harder to locate. Builders are expected to concentrate on homes in the $15,000 to $25,000 range. The concentration on more-expensive dwellings and luxury apartments is ominous for the economy as a whole, and the construction industry in particular. This kind of construction usually signals the mature stage of a building boom, just before a recession breaks.

However, 1964 will be a good year to expand or renovate a home, or refinance a mortgage. Prices of a number of building materials have declined, including those on asphalt roofing, heating equipment and plywood.

As we enter 1964, mortgage interest rates are a good one-half of 1 percent below a year ago. They now average as low as 5.25 percent in New England; 5.5 to 5.75 percent in the Midwest; 6 percent in the South and 6 to 6.25 percent in the Far West.

Lenders also are offering the longest repayment terms in the country's history—25 to 30 years on new houses, and 20-25 years on existing dwellings.

ILGWU Study Advises:

Funeral Costs Drain Union Benefit Plans

The following is excerpted from an article in Justice, publication of the Ladies' Garment Workers, by Harry Haskel, director of the ILGWU Death Benefits Fund.

JESSICA MITFORD'S current best seller, "The American Way of Death," has focused attention on what has aptly been called the "exploitation of bereavement" and the "commercialization of grief."

This is a welcome development breaking through the taboo that has inhibited frank and open public discussion of all aspects of the funeral business.

Studies by the ILGWU Death Benefits Dept. for the period 1959-62 reveal that the average funeral bill paid for deceased members (excluding expenses for plot and headstone and for transportation outside a city) was $899 in 1959 and $950 in 1962.

An interesting sidelight brought out by the ILGWU study was that the casket, the largest single item in a funeral bill, averaging $555, was separately stated in only 165 out of a total of 680 bills. Insufficient itemization is a general practice among funeral establishments. Broad terms like "casket and professional services" or "complete funeral" are transparent devices for concealing the actual cost of particular items.

Even in those instances where some items are specified, the frequent wide disparity in prices for the same item in different bills of the same establishment suggests arbitrary figures designed to reach a predetermined total. There is, in fact, wide suspicion that funeral bills, in many instances, are tailored to what the traffic will bear.

The ILGWU death benefit—which is not a burial payment but analogous to an insurance payment to certain beneficiaries—was expected, after it was increased from $150 to $500 and then to $1,000, to cover not only funeral expenses but also partially to meet other expenses such as the cost of a plot or headstone or an unpaid medical bill. However, the rise has been practically gobbled up by corresponding increases in funeral expenses.

In trade union circles there is growing concern about the high proportion of death and insurance benefits diverted from families of deceased members toward payment of funeral bills as indicated by a report of the New York State Insurance Dept. that undertakers siphoned off 75 percent of $11.9 million paid in 1958 to beneficiaries of deceased workers.

Our files contain examples of undertakers obtaining from beneficiaries assignments "in full" or for exactly "$1,000" or for "all the proceeds" of the death benefit. Responding to our request for an itemized funeral bill some submitted bills from $50 to $200 less than the full amount specified in the assignment, subsequently agreeing, at our suggestion, to accept the lesser amount in full satisfaction.

OTHERS SUBMITTED bills for the full amount of the death benefit with the items apparently entered merely to reach a predetermined total. In fairness, however, it should be stated that this particular practice is confined to a small number of funeral directors.

To blame the funeral director as an individual for rising funeral costs would be an oversimplification of the problem. With the field crowded by an excessive number of small operators, one might expect a buyer's market with lower rather than higher prices for funerals. That this does not happen is due to the absence of the degree of competition that would normally exist.

There is evidence that the funeral trade associations exert considerable influence in getting their members to maintain "price floors" or "suggested minimums" in a particular area. Overt price-fixing by agreement, though perhaps not direct, is now coming under scrutiny by government anti-trust lawyers.

From Soup to Nonsense:

A World of Universal Irritants Threatens Us All with the Fits

By Jane Goodsell

THERE ARE certain things that send everybody into conniption fits: the sound of a finger squeaking down a blackboard; letters that arrive postage due; people who make you guess who's calling when you answer the telephone. These are universal irritants, common to all members of the human race.

But most of us suffer, too, from special, personalized annoyances that send our blood pressure rocketing, but don't bother other people at all.

My husband (a more or less stable individual in other respects) suffers pain and anguish at the sight of a misplaced apostrophe. A menu that says "Bacon and Egg's" or a Christmas card bearing the signature "The Smith's" throws him into a teeth-grinding fury.

I have a friend (she's a surgical nurse, so you can imagine the things she has to look at without fainting) who can't bear the sight of a fried egg with its yolk off-center. I know another girl who runs screaming to the bathroom with her hand over her mouth at the mere mention of marshmallows in salad.

Then there's the case of the young man who broke up with his girl when he got his first letter from her. There wasn't anything wrong with the letter itself. It was perfectly grammatical, nicely-phrased and encouragingly affectionate. The trouble was, all the i's were dotted with little circles—a harmless conceit which thoroughly dampened the young man's ardor. As he explained it, a girl who'd do a thing like that was undoubtedly insincere, neurotic and probably frigid.

MY FATHER is an incurable optimist who sees good in everyone—with one exception: people who spoil their appetites by eating between meals. For them, he has nothing but scorn and contempt. If he sees a perfect stranger munching a candy bar in the middle of the afternoon, he shudders and averts his eyes.

As for me, I'm a rational, sensible, logical human being who can't understand how people can go to pieces over such petty annoyances.

Of course, there are a few things that bother me, too. Postage stamps placed upside down on envelopes. Baked potatoes wrapped in foil. Table napkins folded into fancy shapes. Twisted telephone cords. Pencils without erasers.

These things give me the screaming meemies. But that's perfectly understandable, isn't it?

Schnitzler Urges Jobs:

Unemployment Rate Held 'Danger Signal'

Rochester, N. Y.—The nation's economy faces the threat of being thrown "badly out of whack" unless the country heeds the "danger signal" of continued high unemployment during a period of prosperity, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler said here.

Schnitzler cautioned members of Rochester's City Club, including business and community leaders, that "plenty of jobs at good wages" are "essential to the preservation of the affluence you represent." The prosperity of business and industry, of the banks or the professional people, "rests upon the earnings of workers," he noted.

Describing automation as "an ominous thunderhead over our nation," Schnitzler pointed out that during the past decade the number of full-time jobs in the private segment of the economy has decreased by at least 400,000 —despite a growing work force.

"If the chief result of automation is unemployment—and that is the case today—the displaced workers will not be the only sufferers," he declared. "The inevitable catastrophe will strike down the automators as well.

Job Program Needed

"There is no one-shot solution that will produce full employment."

He called for "a reduction in the standard workweek to 35 hours, with no loss of pay, coupled with penalty pay of double time for overtime."

A cut in hours, he stressed, "is not a revolutionary idea" but a continuation of a process begun a century ago. It is necessary, he said, "for the well-being, possibly the economic survival, of the nation."

The nation's economy also needs, Schnitzler said, "a bold and determined program" by the federal government that will increase employment opportunities.

Needed also are a tax cut concentrated in the lower income brackets, a further accelerated public works program, a stronger unemployment insurance system, extension of the Fair Labor Standards Act, youth employment programs and other measures to attack unemployment and poverty, he stressed.

"We welcome" the Johnson Administration's attack on poverty, the AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer said, "and will give it our fullest cooperation."

Labor's goal, Schnitzler declared, "is not just full employment for union members, but full employment for America."

The AFL-CIO's legislative program, he said, "embraces virtually every aspect of government policy, from disarmament to the conservation of natural resources, from hospital care for the aged to parity prices for farmers." He added:

"We have been called the 'people's lobby,' the voice of all who have no other spokesman. We are proud of the title, and I think we have earned it."

NIAGARA FRONTIER Civil Liberties Award for 1963 was presented to Dist. Dir. Joseph P. Molony of the Steelworkers at a ceremony in Buffalo, N. Y., for his defense of academic freedom at the State University of Buffalo and of the right of Negro citizens to demonstrate for equality. Presenting the citation is Mrs. K. William Shields, chairman of the Local ALCU group, as members of the selection committee look on—Robert North, Jr., and Prof. David R. Kochery on the left, and Russell W. Gibbons on the right.

Pay Boosts, Rise in U. S. Spending Urged to Create Full Employment

Sharp increases in hourly wage rates and a rise in federal spending are vitally needed to end the nation's economic "stagnation" and restore full employment, the Conference on Economic Progress has declared.

A surge in wage increases to boost consumer demand and spending and "catch up" with productivity gains should be the "largest single step toward economic restoration," the conference asserted in a report prepared by Leon H. Keyserling, former chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers during the Truman Administration.

The second most important step, the study declared, should be a far greater degree of government spending to spur economic expansion and help meet "some of the top priorities of our unmet national needs," especially adequate housing for every family, and urban renewal.

The report suggested that even if Congress improves the proposed income tax reduction to redirect more of its benefits to low-income consumers, the slash "can carry at best only a small part of the restorative burden." It warned that to "hold the line" on public spending in exchange for the tax cut would be "a very bad bargain on all scores."

The conference is a private nonprofit research group whose national committee includes AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther, A. J. Hayes and O. A. Knight.

7 Million 'Real' Jobless

The report observed that officially reported unemployment averaged 4.2 million or 5.7 percent of the civilian work force in 1963, but that the true level of joblessness, including the full-time equivalent of part-time and concealed unemployment, averaged 7 million or 9.5 percent for the year.

It attributed this persistent, high rate of joblessness basically to a lack of balance between the nation's growing capacity to produce and the ability of consumers to buy enough to keep plants running and manpower fully employed.

For 1963 alone, the study estimated a national production "gap" of $76.5 billion and the biggest single reason for this, it said, was a deficiency of $56.4 billion in wages and salaries.

The conference called on the government to reconsider its so-called wage "guidelines" which suggest that pay increases should generally be kept to productivity increases. Emphasis on this notion actually has caused pay hikes to lag far behind productivity gains, the report declared, adding:

"Until the huge shortage in purchasing power resulting from this is remedied, adequate reduction of unemployment remains impossible."

It noted that hourly wage rates can be lifted either by maintaining the present standard workweek of 40 hours and increasing take-home pay or by shortening the workweek to 35 hours while maintaining take-home pay.

Cut in Workweek Backed

"In view of the fact that no dent in unemployment with the current standard workweek is foreseeable under private and economic policies now under active consideration," the report said, "a shorter workweek appears manifestly desirable."

It rejected the argument that either a shorter workweek or sharply increased wages would be inflationary and declared that "profit margins are now too high, and a better balance between funds available for investment and funds available for consumption would expedite economic growth, reduce idle manpower and plant, and enhance aggregate profits and investment in the long run."

The conference also supported proposals to increase the federal minimum wage from the present $1.25 an hour to $2 and provide greatly expanded coverage because "the victims of excessively low wages are not rescued promptly by the general advance of wage rates." A resolution strongly urging these improvements in the federal wage-hour law was adopted at the latest AFL-CIO convention.

The report observed that because the economic expansion needed is so great, the private sector of the economy cannot do the whole job, and federal spending policies must come into play.

It urged that added government spending be concentrated on accelerated housing and urban renewal because these offer "the largest single opportunity" for maximum job gains and private investment.

The conference proposed a long-range effort that would increase the number of housing starts from 1.6 million in 1963 to 2 million in 1966 and 2.2 million in 1970, with special attention to the needs of low and middle-income families.

IAM, Employers Offer Job Training in Prison

Folsom, Calif.—Machinists Local 33 and employers it deals with are cooperating with state agencies in a dramatic on-the-job training program aimed at rehabilitating lawbreakers and preparing inmates for jobs after their release from the state prison here.

A model training program, developed under the guidance of the local and employers, was presented to the Correctional Industries Commission by Mrs. Margaret R. O'Grady, assistant to State Industrial Relations Dir. Ernest B. Webb.

Under the program, carefully selected prisoners will receive a combination of classroom instruction and on-the-job training in Folsom's metal stamping plant, and tool and die making and machine shops, which produce the license plates for California automobiles.

Development of the curriculum and standards for the program took more than a year of effort by union and management representatives of the Machinists Trade Advisory Committee and prison officials, with the assistance of the State Division of Apprenticeship Standards.

The Trade Advisory Committee will play a continuing guidance role under the program, to assure that the training is related to the needs of outside industry, and will attempt to place successful trainees in jobs after their release.

Inmates who complete the training will receive certificates similar to those the apprenticeship division provides graduating apprenticeships, testifying to competence in their craft.

In presenting the program, Mrs. O'Grady said that while state agencies could be proud of their part in developing it, "the real credit must go to those from labor and management who really made it possible."

"Training that is not directly related to the needs and practices of private industry has little value to the man who must finally find and hold a job," she observed. "The training needed by industry is often difficult to provide in the classroom removed from day-to-day changes in technology and competition. It is even more difficult in the prison, which is separated from society by walls.

"This program represents the joint effort of labor and management to breach these walls to provide a training program directly related to the needs of outside industry."

Lathers Pick Sal Maso As President

The Lathers have announced the election of Sal Maso of Paterson, N. J., as general president of the 25,000-member union to fill a vacancy caused by the death Dec. 7 of Lloyd A. Mashburn, who had been president since 1955.

Maso, a vice president of the Lathers since 1936, has served for 23 years as president of the New Jersey State Building & Construction Trades Council.

Cited by former Presidents Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry Truman for conspicuous service, Maso also was named by former Pres. Dwight D. Eisenhower as a member of a special industry committee for Puerto Rico. He has been serving as a member of the Governor's Conference on Equal Employment Opportunity in New Jersey.

Mashburn, who had been a member of the Lathers since 1922, died of a heart attack at a union conference in Chicago. Maso assumed office Jan. 6.

30 YEAR PINS are presented to Wesley Reedy, right and Hugo Neuffer, center by Executive Vice Pres. John De Concini of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers at the 19th anniversary banquet of ABC Local 265 in Reading, Pa. Reedy, who is assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, and Neuffer were initiated into Local 6 on the same day, Oct. 14, 1933, and worked in the same shop in Philadelphia.

Fruitful, Productive Session Seen for Congress by Biemiller

The second session of Congress "will produce more important legislation than did the one just finished," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller predicted in a network radio interview.

Labor has a "primary concern" in legislation attacking the problem of unemployment, Biemiller said, including the key tax cut and civil rights bills. He also said he feels "very strongly" that a social security hospital care for the aged bill will pass "this year."

Among other major goals, he said, labor "will put a lot of effort" into pressing for a renewal of the accelerated public works program.

Biemiller was interviewed on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO program produced for the Mutual radio network, by Hobart Rowen, Washington correspondent of Newsweek magazine, and Robert Novak, co-author of the syndicated newspaper column, Inside Report.

The basic reason Congress hasn't moved faster on the legislative front, Biemiller said, has been the "hampering rules" and "structure" of Congress, rather than deficiencies of leadership.

The AFL-CIO is "clearly on record," he said, "for a thorough overhauling of the procedures of both houses of Congress."

"The idea that the chairman of the House Rules Committee can just arbitrarily hold back a civil rights bill—and probably would still be holding it back if it hadn't been that 175 signatures were gathered on a discharge petition—is ridiculous," Biemiller declared.

The Senate, under its rules, can be tied up "interminably," he noted.

Labor would like to see "some very drastic changes made," he declared, including "consideration as to whether seniority is the best system of naming committee chairmen."

Asked to evaluate Pres. Johnson's performance during his first weeks in office, the AFL-CIO spokesman replied:

"We think he has performed very well indeed. We are convinced that he is quite serious in trying to forward the programs which the Kennedy Administration had started. . . . He is an excellent practitioner of the legislative art and we can expect to see the White House, if anything, being more effective on Capitol Hill."

Biemiller said that "one of the reasons" he believes the social security hospital care bill will be passed "is that in practically every speech Pres. Johnson made while he was Vice President, he made a strong reference to the need for a medicare bill and I believe that this bill is now set to get out of the House Ways & Means Committee."

As for the President's "economy" statements, Biemiller said:

"I don't think Pres. Johnson is off on any wild slashing binge as some members of Congress would like to see him do."

Curtailment in certain areas, however, makes it "all the more necessary that there be additional programs in the field of social needs," he said.

A reduction in the workweek, he added, "has to be considered" because "automation is costing jobs." Part of the "unfinished business" before Congress, he said, is also extension of coverage under the wage-hour law.

Immediate passage of a sound tax cut bill, Biemiller declared, can create "about 2 million jobs" over the next several years. But he stressed that "total government expenditures must be maintained, in fact increased, if we are to make a really serious dent in the unemployment picture."

AIFLD 18 Months Old, 'Standing on Own Feet'

Students from 25 countries were among the 181 union members who received training in Washington during 1963, the American Institute for Free Labor Development said in a year-end summation.

The unionists were divided into five groups, each of which spent three months undergoing training and instruction before returning to their own nations to spread the gospel of the free democratic labor movement.

In addition, some 1,700 men and women completed AIFLD courses offered in Latin American and Caribbean regional centers.

AIFLD Executive Dir. Serafino Romualdi reported that at the start of 1964, courses were being offered in Brazil, Peru, Venezuela, the Dominican Republic, Uruguay and Central America. Within a few weeks seminar and resident programs were to be opened in Mexico and Jamaica, he said, the latter to serve the entire Caribbean area.

To reopen soon, he added, will be a program in San Jose, Costa Rica, for instruction of Central American union leaders and members.

"The institute has passed the crawling stage," Romualdi said. "It can now stand firmly on its own two feet—and does so proudly.

"The fact that our regional centers are now strong enough to handle the basic education programs, permitting the Washington school to provide more advanced training for the graduates of the regional courses, is a good manifestation of the institute's health."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is president of the AIFLD, which was founded by the AFL-CIO and is supported by organized labor, business, foundations and the federal government through the Alliance for Progress. It began operations 18 months ago.

The program in the Dominican Republic was set up in conjunction with the National Confederation of Free Workers and several international trade secretariats and offered training to 20 young trade unionists in its first series of courses, which was completed in mid-December. Two of its graduates were expected in Washington for the advanced course beginning this month.

In commenting on the AIFLD's experience during the first 18 months of its existence, Romualdi pointed to the difficulty of demonstrating "immediate tangible results" from such a program, "for the benefits are really of a quiet, long-term nature."

"However," he added, "I am able to report that in every case where our graduates have had a face-to-face battle with totalitarian elements we have won clear and lasting victories—most notably in British Guiana against the Marxist government of Cheddi Jagan, and in the Dominican Republic and Honduras against Castro agents before the unfortunate coups of last fall."

Romney 'Available' Too:

Goldwater Opens Nomination Drive

By Willard Shelton

Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) launched his campaign for the GOP presidential nomination with speeches in Michigan and New Hampshire and a nicely-timed appearance on the NBC television program, Meet the Press, after formally announcing Jan. 3 that he would run.

Goldwater barely beat Michigan's Gov. George Romney into the lists as Romney told a highly-sophisticated political audience in Washington, that he would not be an "active" candidate, but would "have a duty to accept" if the nomination just happened to come his way.

New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller went into high gear in his New Hampshire primary campaign, with his chief political liaison man, National Committeeman George Hinman, saying in Washington that recent polls showed Rockefeller had pulled even with Goldwater in the state.

The New Hampshire primary Mar. 10 is the first in the nation and is regarded as often significant—as when former Pres. Eisenhower polled a huge popularity-test vote in 1952 before he had resigned from the Army and come home from his Paris post as commander - in - chief of the NATO armies.

Hinman, saying that California and Oregon polls also showed a gain in Rockefeller appeal, said the governor was considering entering Maryland, West Virginia and District of Columbia primaries.

Goldwater's formal announcement served notice that he was running to give the nation "a choice" between what he calls his own "conservative" philosophy and what he describes as the "me-tooism" of Rockefeller and, presumably, other GOP presidential potentials.

On Pres. Johnson's announced "frugality" drive, Goldwater said in a Phoenix, Ariz., press conference that the President is not really an "economizer" but "so far is just fooling the public."

On the Meet the Press program Goldwater twice had to handle questions on his proposal for breaking relations with the Soviet Union, adding that in the White House he would of course have to have "an action of the Senate" to keep the commitment —a statement that Walter Lippmann, dean of political columnists, termed "extraordinary and altogether untrue" and revealing "how little" the senator "understands the constitutional powers of the office for which he is now an avowed candidate."

The President constitutionally has sole authority to open or shut off diplomatic relations with any foreign government.

Romney's Washington speech—taken in connection with his announced intention to speak widely on public affairs—was viewed as announcement of hopes for a dark-horse candidacy.

A Republican contest in the Wisconsin primary was ruled out for this year by the announcement that an uncontested delegation would be filed in the name of Rep. John W. Byrnes a favorite son. Goldwater and Rockefeller are still the only open rivals for the nomination, but both former Vice Pres. Nixon and Gov. William W. Scranton of Pennsylvania are considered available in the event of a deadlocked convention next July.

Coordinated Approach Seen Organizing Help

Champaign, Ill.—The labor movement is meeting success in the coordinated approach to union organizing, Executive Dir. Jack Conway of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. told the recent State Labor Conference for central bodies.

Conway was one of the principal speakers at the 15th annual conference sponsored by the Illinois State AFL-CIO at the University of Illinois Institute of Labor & Industrial Relations here.

Discussing "New Plans and Programs for Organizing the Unorganized," the IUD official cited the AFL-CIO's coordinated pilot program in Los Angeles and cooperative drives in other parts of the country under the auspices of the federation and the IUD.

"In all areas," he observed, "we have won more elections than we have lost, and we have won more people than we have lost."

He noted, however, that organization has been most successful in bargaining units outside the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board, particularly among public employes.

At the dinner session, State AFL-CIO Pres. Reuben G. Soderstrom reviewed the progress of Illinois labor's legislative program and outlined areas in which it will continue to work. He called on the central bodies to help create "the kind of public attitude which will make wise political decisions possible and constructive legislation the rule, not the exception."

Prof. Jack Barbash of the University of Wisconsin School for Workers cited inadequate economic growth of the nation and the effects of automation on the work force among other major reasons for the lag in trade union growth since 1957.

Other conference speakers included Rupert Evans, associate dean of the University of Illinois College of Education; Samuel C. Bernstein, state unemployment security administrator; Lester Asher, general counsel, and Harold Katz, special counsel, of the state central body.

W. E. Maloney Of IUOE Dies

Chicago—William E. Maloney, president of the Operating Engineers from 1940 until 1948, died Jan. 2 in Columbus Hospital here. He was 83.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler expressed "deep sorrow" in a telegram of condolence to his widow, Helen, who survived.

"His service to the trade union movement, especially to the members of the Intl. Union of Operating Engineers, has earned for him a special niche in the history of organized labor," they said.

He joined the now defunct Local 569 in 1917 and moved to the big Chicago Local 150 in 1929, and held many local and sectional offices before assuming the international presidency.

Funeral services were held in St. Viator's Church, with burial in Mt. Carmel Cemetery here.

In Wyoming:

IBEW Scores Point In 'Work' Law Case

Cheyenne, Wyo.—A joint union-employer challenge to the constitutionality of Wyoming's so-called "right-to-work" law has passed its first legal hurdle.

State Judge Franklin Sheldon turned down a motion by Wyoming Atty. Gen. John F. Raper to dismiss the suit brought by three locals of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and two chapters of the National Electrical Contractors Association. He said the issues raised were significant enough to warrant a full hearing.

The IBEW and the employer groups contend that the Wyoming statute, enacted early last year by the Republican-controlled legislature, goes beyond the scope of state open shop laws permitted under Sec. 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The suit notes that the state law makes illegal the job referral system used by Wyoming contractors and the IBEW locals, even though the system does not discriminate against persons not members of the union. Similar union hiring hall arrangements, the suit declares, have been held valid under federal law.

Both the unions and employers also challenge an interpretation by the attorney general prohibiting unions with bargaining rights from representing non-members unless authorized in writing to do so.

This, the suit points out, directly contradicts the National Labor Relations Act which requires unions to represent all employes in the bargaining unit whether or not they are members.

Joining in the challenge are IBEW locals in Cheyenne, Casper and Laramie, and the Wyoming and Mountain States Line Constructors chapters of the employer association.

They said, in seeking an injunction against enforcement of the law, that the long-standing union-management agreement and hiring arrangement has brought "stability of employment relationships, the promotion of harmony and cooperation between employer and employes, the availability of sufficient skilled, competent and experienced artisans . . . and increasing production and quality."

The Wyoming law, which the workers and their employers seek to have voided, provides a penalty of up to six months in jail and a $1,000 fine for violations.

Labor Aides Support Free Public Colleges

New York—Labor strongly supports the principle of free tuition for students in public colleges, two union officers said recently in statements written for the Alumnus of New York City College. Both are new members of the city Board of Higher Education by appointment of Mayor Robert F. Wagner (D).

Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes noted that labor has been calling for greater government expenditures for higher education and for free tuition in public institutions, state and local. Benjamin F. McLaurin, eastern zone supervisor of the Sleeping Car Porters, asserted that the right to a college education should never be dependent upon the ability to pay because "education is an investment in our way of life—our concept of democracy."

Sullivan observed that the United States has been unique among great nations for the relative absence of class distinctions, and that advancement among wage earners was accelerated in earlier years by widespread economic opportunities and freedom of movement from job to job and town to town.

But two recent developments threaten, he said, to produce the kind of class distinctions which most Americans despise—the decline in the rate at which new jobs are created, and the great increase in the cost of higher education at a time when the need for it is greatest.

A college education has, Sullivan wrote, long been recognized as an entrance-way to greater opportunity, and many wage-earning families have "scrimped and saved" to send their children to college but, as the cost rises, many such families find themselves increasingly unable to pay.

AFL-CIO Position

Labor's position as expressed by the 1963 convention of the AFL-CIO is that the right to a higher education "should be a broad social right which this richest country in history can provide," he said, adding that "we feel that higher education is a public function as much as elementary and secondary education" and that it is not like a house or an auto, to be bought and paid for by the immediate user.

McLaurin said "college education is no longer simply a private investment" made by persons who can afford it and that some of the "great minds of our time" have come from the free colleges—Bernard M. Baruch, financier and presidential adviser; Associate Justice Felix Frankfurter, retired, of the U.S. Supreme Court; Wagner, and others.

"Students going to free colleges," he wrote, "should not be troubled by the margin of the football score. They should be concerned, rather, with the ability to maintain an academic standard.

"It is because our city, state and nation must develop their most treasured resources, our youth, to carry on our democratic way of life that we must maintain our tuition-free education."

A committee of educators recommended recently, in a report published by the Educational Policies Commission, that all high school graduates be given two years of free college and, in some cases, living expenses while in college. This program would require financial support from all government levels, the commission said.

NLRB Reinstates Fired Union Wives

Florala, Ala.—Ten women fired by the Franklin-Ferguson Garment Co. because their husbands or other close relatives joined the Machinists in an organizing campaign at the nearby Merit Metal Products Co. have been ordered reinstated by the National Labor Relations Board with back pay averaging $470 each.

There is some duplication of ownership between the two plants, and the women were subjected to harassment before being fired. IAM Rep. L. M. Fagan had to handle two cases before the NLRB—a petition for representation rights for the men, and another seeking back pay and job restoration for the women.

ILO Group Votes Study Of Apartheid

Geneva—The Governing Body of the Intl. Labor Organization unanimously voted to set up a committee to examine the entire problem posed for the ILO by South Africa's policy of apartheid.

The resolution had been proposed by the Workers Group in the Governing Body and authorized a committee of 12 members—four each from the Workers, Employers' and Government Groups. The committee is currently meeting in Geneva.

Specifically, it will submit to the next meeting of the Governing Body proposals which could be put before the Intl. Labor Conference next June. It will attempt to determine what contribution the ILO can make to complete the elimination of apartheid and to suggest what should be done to secure observances of the principles of the ILO constitution and to protect human dignity.

To have ample time for consideration of the committee's report, the Governing Body advanced the date of its next meeting to Feb. 4-21, 1964.

The Governing Body also reiterated its intention of seeking, with the United Nations, a solution of the apartheid problem and to implement within the framework of the ILO any measures the UN might take.

In other areas, the Governing Body voted to add to the agenda for the 1965 ILO conference the matters of agrarian reform and the role of cooperatives in economic and social development of developing countries.

Rail Unions Fight Full Crew Repeal

Albany, N. Y.—Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller called on the New York Legislature to repeal the state's 50-year-old Full Crew law and promptly stirred a hornets' nest of protest from railroad brotherhoods.

Pres. Charles Luna of the Trainmen wired Rockefeller that the repeal proposal "makes a political issue out of a matter of public safety." The law sets the minimum size of train crews in the state and railroad management has charged that it requires unnecessary crew members.

Luna asked the governor to "reconsider" his stand, declaring that today's trains are longer, faster and more complicated than in the period when the law was passed.

Meany Pledges Johnson Aid in 'War on Poverty'

of the United States on these matters."

"The President demonstrated a sound understanding of the major problem of unemployment that faces us and of the need for a constantly growing, expanding economic base which is essential to the United States both at home and abroad.

"Obviously America cannot be half-strong or half-employed, or half-housed or only partially prepared to lead the forces of the Free World.

"Pres. Johnson recognizes all of these facts."

Meany said that like Johnson, labor is opposed to waste in government and deplores the waste inherent in longterm, widespread unemployment." Unlike "some of the carping critics of our time," he continued, "the American worker is just as interested in balancing the budget of human needs as he is in balancing the fiscal budget."

"We don't think there is any magic budget figure," he said, adding that it will be the details, "the specifics" of the President's budget message, not just the total figure, "that will count with us." The full budget message is scheduled to go to Congress Jan. 21.

"As we have said often in the past," Meany went on, "we are prepared to pay the cost of keeping America strong militarily and economically."

Referring to Johnson's expression of opposition to the 35-hour workweek, the AFL-CIO president said labor was "unconvinced" by the President's observation that it would "merely share" employment. Labor, he said, will continue to fight for a shorter workweek until full employment is achieved.

"The AFL-CIO," he noted, "has never contended the 35-hour week was the sole magic formula for solving the jobless problem. We have said from the beginning that if this nation can achieve a full employment economy at 40 hours we will be the first to applaud."

He said that the President "has quite correctly assessed" the problem of excessive overtime as a major factor contributing to the high rate of joblessness and declared:

"We think there is abundant evidence now to cause the Congress to enact a double time for over 40 hours provision in the Fair Labor Standards Act."

Hard Core Joblessness To Be Studied by ARA

A study of the causes of "hard core" joblessness in sections of Los Angeles and an action program to implement its findings have been launched by the Area Redevelopment Administration of the Commerce Dept.

The first part of the program will be undertaken by the Institute of Industrial Relations of the University of California at Los Angeles and will cost $76,543 under an ARA technical assistance grant. The second phase will cost about $50,000 and will be carried out by the Los Angeles Economic Development Agency, a newly-formed nonprofit community organization.

"The aim of this study," said ARA Administrator William L. Batt, Jr., "will be to speed up economic development so as to increase job opportunities for workers living in an area south and southeast of downtown Los Angeles.

The rate of unemployment in the area, where many low-income Negro and Mexican-American unskilled and semi-skilled workers make their homes, ranges up to 29.8 percent of the work force, compared to 6.6 percent for the city as a whole.

The first part of the project will attempt to determine the specific unemployment situation, availability of land and buildings, literacy and skill levels of workers, industrial development, capital requirements and the types of programs needed to cut the level of joblessness in the area.

The action part of the program will seek to determine:

- What organized community groups can do to ease the situation by utilizing existing programs.
- If existing programs are found to be inadequate, to seek out what could be done additionally if the area were designated for ARA financial assistance.
- To indicate what new legislation might be required to attain the twin objective of trained workers and more jobs.

The State of the Union:

Johnson Calls Nation To 'War on Poverty'

gram can be completed "by this summer," when legislative activity will be interrupted by the national political conventions and the presidential campaign.

What is more, he asserted, the program can be achieved "without any increase in spending."

Johnson announced that for fiscal 1965 he would propose a budget of $97.9 billion—$500 million lower than the latest estimate of actual expenditures in this fiscal year.

At a briefing for newsmen in the White House Rose Garden in advance of his speech, the President stressed that the bulk of the budget cutbacks would occur in military and nuclear expenditures and that the savings would be applied to programs to meet human needs, particularly through the multi-faceted attack on poverty.

As part of this attack he called for modernization of the unemployment insurance system, extension of federal minimum wage coverage to 2 million more workers, and establishment of a "high-level" commission on automation.

"If we have the brainpower to invent these machines," Johnson declared, "we have the brainpower to make certain they are a boon and not a bane to humanity."

On another issue directly related to labor's program, he announced that while he was opposed to cutting the standard workweek to 35 hours on the ground it would "merely share" employment and be too costly, he was "equally opposed" to 45 or 50-hour workweeks based on excessive overtime that causes increased joblessness.

He urged legislation to authorize tri-partite industry-by-industry studies "as to where a higher penalty rate for overtime would increase job openings without unduly increasing costs—and authorizing the establishment of such higher rates."

Shortest Since 1934

The President's speech, running fewer than 2,900 words, was the shortest State of the Union message since that of the late Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1934. Johnson was interrupted repeatedly by applause as he outlined the goals and stance of his Administration.

The longest burst of applause came as he set forth a 10-point foreign policy program to achieve "a world without war" and declared in an obvious retort to Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev:

"We intend to bury no one—and we do not intend to be buried."

The President said that economies in the nation's military effort would be achieved while maintaining the "full strength of our combat defenses" and would result in the lowest number of civilian personnel in the Defense Dept. since 1950.

He announced that the U.S. would cut back its production of enriched uranium by 25 percent in fiscal 1965, would close down four plutonium piles and close "non-essential" military installations.

He called on "our adversaries" to do the same and said that this country would make new proposals at the Geneva disarmament conference "toward the control and eventual abolition of arms."

The President declared that while his budget would propose less federal spending overall, "it is not a stand-still budget." Coupled with this year's legislative program, he said, it is "designed to help each and every American citizen fulfill his basic hopes."

Referring to the need for a tax cut to spur the economy and provide jobs, Johnson declared that the issue had been discussed for a year and "now we need action."

"Every month of delay dilutes its benefits in 1964 for consumption, for investment, and employment," he said.

Calling on Congress to complete action on the $11.7 billion reduction in personal and corporate income taxes by Feb. 1, the President observed that until the bill is signed the withholding rate cannot be cut "and it should now be reduced to 14 percent instead of 15 percent."

Regarding civil rights, the President declared it to be a principle of his Administration that increased opportunities in employment, education, housing and every other field "must be open to Americans of every color."

"As far as the writ of federal law will run, we must abolish not some but all racial discrimination," he asserted, specifically endorsing the public accommodations section of the civil rights bill.

In declaring "unconditional war" on poverty, the President asked Congress and the nation to join in the effort, which he said would require the cooperation of federal, state and local governments.

Action Asked

Declaring that no single piece of legislation will suffice, the President, without going into detail, set forth a program for the anti-poverty drive that included:

- "A special effort" in the chronically depressed areas of Appalachia.
- Expansion of the area redevelopment program.
- Enactment of youth employment opportunities legislation and creation of a National Service Corps.
- Stepped-up distribution of food to the needy through a broader food stamp program.
- Special school aid funds to aid hard-hit areas.
- Construction of more libraries, more hospitals and more nursing homes, and training of more nurses to staff them.
- Hospital insurance financed through the social security system to protect the aged against "the devastating hardship of prolonged or repeated illness."
- Expanded programs of housing for the poor and the elderly and greater aid to those displaced by slum clearance.

Superiority Maintained

In the foreign policy section of his speech, the President reiterated his assertion that the reduced defense budget would still maintain the nation's margin of military superiority over potential foes.

He urged increased distribution of U.S. food surpluses to the hungry of the world "as an instrument of peace."

He stressed the need for a stronger Alliance for Progress to help us "become better neighbors with the free states of the Americas."

Finally, he said, "we must develop with our allies new means of bridging the gap between East and West—facing danger boldly wherever danger exists—but being equally bold in our search for new agreements which can enlarge the hopes of all while violating the interests of none."

Displaying awareness of the barriers confronting the domestic and foreign policy programs he outlined, the President warned Congress that the world "will judge us harshly" if "we fritter and fumble away" opportunities in "needless, senseless quarrels" between Democrats and Republicans, the House and the Senate, the South and the North, or Congress and the Administration.

Meany Statement on Message

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany issued the following comment on Pres. Johnson's State of the Union message:

The President has challenged America to make the American way of life more meaningful to more people. He obviously intends to judge the prosperity of America only by the well-being of all her people. That can only be achieved when we outlaw the pockets of poverty, the inhumanities of discrimination and segregation, the illiteracy, the exploitation, the suffering that are today the lot of too many of our citizens.

This is a warm and human message, and it bespeaks an Administration of warmth and humanitarianism.

The President demonstrated a sound understanding of the major problem of unemployment that faces us and of the need for a constantly growing, expanding economic base which is essential to the United States both at home and abroad. Obviously America cannot be half-strong or half-employed, or half-housed or only partially prepared to lead the forces of the free world.

Pres. Johnson recognizes all of these facts.

Like him, we are opposed to waste in government. Like him, we deplore the waste that is inherent in long term, widespread unemployment. Unlike some of the carping critics of our time, the American worker is just as interested in balancing the budget of human needs as he is in balancing the fiscal budget of the U.S.

We don't think there is any magic budget figure. The details of the President's budget are what will count as far as we are concerned. As we have said often in the past, we are prepared to pay the cost of keeping America strong militarily and economically, so it is the specifics of the budget message—not just the total figure—that will count with us.

The President has voiced his opposition to the 35-hour week which the American labor movement believes is essential to solving the problem of unemployment. Let me reiterate the fact that the AFL-CIO has never contended the 35-hour week was the sole magic formula for solving the jobless problem. We have said from the beginning that if this nation can achieve a full employment economy at 40 hours we will be the first to applaud.

But we are unconvinced by the President's observation that a 35-hour week would "merely share" employment. We shall continue to fight for a shorter workweek. The only thing that will stop our fight is achievement of full employment.

The President has quite correctly assessed the problem of overtime as a major contributing factor to unemployment. We think there is abundant evidence now to cause the Congress to enact a double time for over 40-hours provision in the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The President's call for a high-level commission on automation is eminently sound. The short-term and the long-term problems that automation is causing and will cause this nation cannot be wished away. The answer is immediate study and thoughtful action, and we commend the President for his understanding of this need.

The President has given the highest priorities to a tax cut, to enactment of civil rights legislation and to passage of hospital care for the aged under Social Security. We are with him 100 percent in these fights. America can brook no further delay by Congress on these matters.

The President's message is a challenge to Congress and to the people. The American labor movement is ready and willing to do its part in meeting this challenge.

Kennedy Center for Arts Approved As Congress Opens New Session

By David L. Perlman

A tribute to the late Pres. Kennedy—and a strong assist to the performing arts—was the first legislative action of the new session of Congress.

The House beat down a series of restrictive amendments and passed, by overwhelming voice vote, a bill to name the projected National Cultural Center for Kennedy. The measure carries a $15.5 million federal grant to match contributions from private citizens for construction of the center and advances a $15.4 million loan to build parking facilities. A Republican amendment to eliminate federal financing was beaten 148-100.

The renamed John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, to be located on the banks of the Potomac, will fulfill a project strongly supported by the late President and Mrs. Kennedy. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is one of the trustees of the center and Vice Presidents Herman D. Kenin and James B. Carey are members of the advisory council.

The House bill designated the center as the "sole" national memorial to Kennedy, the only change made in the bill which passed the Senate unanimously at the close of the last session.

As the second session of the 88th Congress got under way, preliminary skirmishes in the big legislative battles of 1964 were being fought in the House Rules Committee and the Senate Finance Committee.

The Rules Committee began its long-waited hearings on the bipartisan civil rights approved by the House Judiciary Committee. It is expected to clear the measure for the House floor after a delaying action by southern congressmen who have asked for time to register their opposition.

After a brief holiday respite, the Senate Finance Committee resumed closed-door consideration of the tax cut bill, and moved in its first few meetings at a faster pace than anticipated. Pres. Johnson, in his State of the Union message, asked Congress to complete "final action" on the tax bill by Feb. 1.

In a letter to Committee Chairman Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.), Pres. Johnson urged the Senate to speed up the effect of the tax cut voted by the House by cutting the basic payroll withholding tax to 14 percent as soon as the measure is enacted.

The present rate is 18 percent and the House bill would have dropped this to 15 percent on enactment, and 14 percent effective next Jan. 1.

Johnson warned that each month's postponement of the tax cut keeps $600 million out of wage earners' take-home pay.

The House Ways and Means Committee has scheduled a one-week renewal of hearings on the King-Anderson bill to provide hospital care for the aged through social security. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany will testify on the opening day, Jan. 20.

Senate Democratic leaders hope to get the tax bill out of the way before settling down to a protracted battle over civil rights—and an effort to break the expected southern filibuster. Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) and Assistant Leader Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.) estimated that 25 Republican votes may be needed to invoke cloture and pass the bill.

The national conventions of the two parties this summer and the start of the presidential campaign in the fall put a limit on the length of the congressional session. The first session, which ran to Dec. 30, was one of the longest in the nation's history.

Firm's Unfair Practices Described as 'Classic'

An air travel insurance firm at Washington National Airport committed 12 unfair labor practices to break up an organizing campaign by the Insurance Workers, a trial examiner for the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

Examiner George A. Downing, calling the case a "classic" example of unfair practices because it was "saturated with an overwhelming array' of "discriminatory and coercive" conduct, recommended that the Tele-Trip Co., Inc., be ordered to reinstate two fired salesgirls with back pay, and to stop interfering with the right of employes to engage in union activities.

Downing found the company fired two girls who had been active in union organizing but gave raises to 11 others. The firm asserted that the two picked out for firing last March had poor sales records but the examiner said other girls had worse records and one was on "probation" because of poor sales.

The examiner cited the "suspicious timing" of the firings at the climax of the organizing campaign; the "unerring" selection of the two union leaders; the failure to give the discharged workers any warning about their sales; a woman supervisor's warnings against union activity and her attempt to get another worker to write an anti-union letter to management; and by its "stick and carrot" conduct in firing the two union leaders one day after suddenly raising the wages of other workers.

Cloaks and Daggers Galore:

Injunction Denied Against AMA Tape

By John M. Barry

A tale of two shadowy figures known only as "Irv" and "Cousin" and a rendezvous on a dark street lent an Alfred Hitchcock air to the American Medical Association's account of how it got a tape recording that led to a $400,000 damage suit against the organization by Steelworkers' Dist. Dir. Paul Normile.

The tape and plastic phonograph records made from it were distributed by the AMA's Political Action Committee (AMPAC) in fund-raising efforts among doctors as part of its campaign against old-age social security hospital insurance, the USWA has charged.

The records purport to present the voice of Normile addressing a COPE meeting in Allegheny County, Pa., where he heads USWA Dist. 16.

Flatly denying that the voice is his, Normile has sued the AMA for libel and invasion of privacy, charging that the recording is fraudulent and portrays him as "a tough-talking bully and extortionist" who urges strong-arm methods to collect COPE voluntary contributions from union members. The suit also seeks a permanent injunction against distribution of the recording.

The AMA's story of how it acquired the recording came out in depositions filed with the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia by AMA and AMPAC officials. Judge George L. Hart, Jr., while noting that the AMA's answer to the suit indicates that it doesn't know the real origin of the recording, nevertheless denied a motion for a preliminary injunction filed by Normile's counsel, David E. Feller.

Hart observed that the AMA has voluntarily halted distribution

2 Printing Unions Vote To Merge

By Gervase N. Love

Members of the AFL-CIO Photo Engravers and of the Lithographers have approved a merger proposal in referendum votes that climaxed more than a year of negotiations.

Results of the balloting, which was spread over six weeks, were announced by the respective presidents.

IPEU Pres. William J. Hall reported that members of his union had cast 8,715 votes for merger and 4,611 votes against.

ALA Pres. Kenneth J. Brown announced a vote of 18,434 for and 13,013 against the proposal. Eighty-five out of 95 locals favored the move, he said.

A merger convention to adopt a constitution for the new Lithographers & Photoengravers Intl. Union will take place during the week of May 24 in the Leamington Hotel, Minneapolis.

The merger has the endorsement

Schnitzler Rallies Labor:

Oklahoma Pledged Aid in 'Work' Fight

Oklahoma City—Labor, at the Oklahoma AFL-CIO's 4th biennial convention here, rallied its forces for the state's imminent "right-to-work" law battle.

Facing the prospect of a May popular referendum on a "work" proposal, the delegates called on all union members in the state to make voluntary contributions of $5 each to finance a campaign to turn back the "work" law advocates.

They served notice that labor would not support any candidate for office who refused to state a clear position on so-called "right-to-work" legislation.

Having lost its challenge in the state's courts on the validity of the "work" law petitions, the state labor body said it would forego further legal action and called for an early vote on the issue. State AFL-CIO Pres. Roy Tillman urged Gov. Henry Bellmon (R) to schedule the referendum at the May 5 primary, declaring: "We're ready to vote."

Speaker after speaker called on all local unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO to take their stand as affiliates of the state organization as well and to join the fight.

The whole labor movement will help to the degree it can, pledged AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler in a keynote speech. But in the referendum, just four months off, on the issue of "killing the union shop," he warned, Oklahoma labor itself must "provide the energy, the leadership, the manpower—yes, and the money—essential if the fight is to be won."

The state's union members should offer "the greatest flood of new membership affiliations, the greatest outpouring of voluntary contributions, the greatest army of volunteer workers" in their history, he said.

Schnitzler also addressed a general appeal to Oklahoma citizens, pointing out that a so-called "work" law gives no person a job.

It simply "forbids any form of

December Shows Dip To 5.5%

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation closed out 1963 with the unemployment picture as grim as it had been the year before, according to the Labor Dept.'s job report for December.

The summary figures revealed a seasonally adjusted jobless rate of 5.5 percent for December, exactly the same rate as for the same month of 1962.

This left 1963 with an average of 5.7 percent in the key adjusted jobless rate, slightly higher than the average of nearly 5.6 percent recorded for 1962.

The average of 5.7 percent for 1963, a year of booming business activity, compares to an average of 5.6 percent jobless for 1954, a recession year. National leaders have been making comparisons with that year to stir greater concern over the need for remedial action. Reinforcing the point is the fact that corporate profits are setting record highs.

While the December rate represented a sharp drop from November's 5.9 percent, government experts warned against reading too much into the decline. They explained it was due mostly to correction of a statistical quirk which caused a rise in the rate for November.

The total unemployed declined by 100,000 from November to 3.8 million for December, the same total as for December 1962. The report added that unemployment usually goes up by 100,000 in December.

The December report showed a rise of 250,000 in the number of 35-Hour Week Not a Problem, Employers Assure House Panel

Two employer associations joined with the Ladies' Garment Workers in telling a congressional subcommittee that the 35-hour week has worked out well in their industry and urging that it be adopted as a nationwide standard under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

House Labor Subcommittee Chairman Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), winding up hearings on reduction of the workweek, received statements from:

- Leon Frechtel, president of the New York Coat & Suit Association, who said the 35-hour week has benefited employers as well as workers and "assisted materially in our ability to maintain quality standards."
- A. Joseph Isaacs, executive director of the New Jersey Dress Manufacturers & Contractors Association, who said the 35-hour week was put into effect in the industry "in order to combat unemployment" and "to a large extent" has accomplished this goal.

Predictions that the shorter workweek would mean increased overtime at premium pay "were wrong," he said, adding that "there has not been any substantial increases in overtime hours."

Lazare Teper, ILGWU research director, stressed for the union that past reductions in working hours disproved fears that "shorter hours would reduce the nation's output and lead to a debasement of standards of living." In fact, he said, the opposite took place.

The subcommittee also received from Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers a warning that the high level of unemployment "makes it imperative" that the workweek be reduced "without further delay."

Potofsky emphasized that the economy, "as it has been functioning, has not been able to provide work for our people." "What has been done so far has clearly been ineffective," he said, and "more daring measures are required."

The magnitude of the unemployment problem has been intensified, Potofsky said, because "we also must provide jobs for

Labor Plans J.F. Kennedy Library Aid

A major contribution to the John F. Kennedy Memorial Library is planned by organized labor, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced.

"John Kennedy was a true friend of the American worker," Meany said. "He was our friend when the going was rough and when it was smooth. He was our friend throughout his public life, long before he became the President of the United States.

"Today John Kennedy belongs to history. There is one way to insure that coming generations understand how important he was to our time, how greatly he was loved, how grievously he was mourned. That is through easy

FIRST UNION CONTRACT in Ethiopian history nears completion by the Wonji-Shoa Sugar Union, an affiliate of the year-old Confederation of Ethiopian Labor Unions. union contract" under which workers must join a union and remain members during the life of the contract, the AFL-CIO spokesman said, despite the fact that under federal law the union is required to "represent all the workers" in a bargaining unit "including those who voted against" the union.

Oklahoma voters will be told the "work" proposal is a way that "workers can be 'liberated' from the 'oppression' or 'compulsion' of unions," he warned. But if union members are really "groaning under the lash," the protest could be expected to come from states where union membership is largest, he remarked, and in these states there are no "work" laws "because union members won't stand for it."

"These 'right-to-work' people" are "lined up every time on the side of big business and against social progress," he declared, and cited their opposition to farmer cooperatives.

"You know they are wrong about the co-ops; why should you believe them about the unions?" he asked.

From neighboring states, Texas AFL-CIO Pres. H. S. Hank Brown and Colorado AFL-CIO Pres. Herrick S. Roth brought counsel and pledges of assistance.

"We have 'right-to-work' in Texas," said Brown, and "we also have 75,000 Mexican nationals who cross five [Rio Grande] bridges every day to work for 16 to 31 cents an hour."

"Petty politicians" in the state have "damned" organized labor and "damned" Negroes and Latin Americans, he said, and the result of their domination and their "work" law is that "girls running the elevators in Laredo get $11 a week for 70 hours. Three dollars a day is the going wage for many of the half-million workers of South Texas."

The state of Kansas did not save its economy by approving a "work" law in 1958, Roth pointed out. Colorado's voters, on the other hand, killed a "work" proposal the same year, and its economy has "blossomed" ever since.

Kansas was the only state of six where a 1958 referendum vote endorsed a "work" law, and in all five other states—California, Washington, Idaho and Ohio as well as Colorado—"the dollar increase in per capita income" has been higher than that of Kansas, Roth told the convention.

Tillman said Oklahoma labor and a citizen's group had carried on their court battle against the referendum initiative "because of the tremendous number of improper signatures" on the petitions and such methods as money payments and "delicate arm-twisting" by employers to obtain signatures.

"These and many other unfair methods of obtaining signatures were used, but they have been determined to be legal," he said.

The state labor body decided against a second petition to the Oklahoma Supreme Court for a rehearing or an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, Tillman stated, because it was not interested "in delay for delay's sake." He noted that if the referendum were delayed beyond the primary, it would require a special election costing the state's taxpayers about $125,000.

The circulation of "work" petitions had been launched in 1961 following a meeting here of a new U.S. Chamber of Commerce special committee, created for the express purpose of outlawing the union shop "wherever and in whatever form it may exist."

The convention re-elected Tillman of Oklahoma City as president and Len Yarborough of Tulsa, executive vice president and legislative representative. Henry Likes of Muskogee was elected secretary-treasurer in a contest, defeating J. J. Caldwell, the incumbent.

The convention passed resolutions calling for vigorous administration of the Walsh-Healey public contracts law and asking state laws on prevailing wages and the protection of fair-minded contractors. It also endorsed the pending King-Anderson bill on social security hospital care for aged citizens.

ILGWU, Employers Back 35-Hour Week

the 1.5 million young people entering the labor force each year and for the additional 1.8 million workers who are being displaced each year by automation and technological changes."

In the ILGWU statement, Teper said a shortened workweek, coupled with a double-time penalty for overtime, is needed "to restore a balance."

The greater leisure resulting from past reductions of the workweek, he said, had generated "a host of new industries" which provided additional employment opportunities.

"The restoration of a balance between the available jobs and the available manpower will provide a heightened consumption of goods and services and speed up the tempo of national economic growth," he urged.

The employer testimony stressed that the ladies' garment industry had absorbed the 35-hour week without strain and that years of experience showed none of the ill effects that had been feared.

AFGE Fights Recognition of Rival Group

The Dept. of Agriculture local of the Government Employes has asked Sec. Orville L. Freeman to withdraw his department's recognition of a professional association headed by high-ranking management officials.

AFGE Local 2051 filed a formal complaint, comparable to an unfair labor practice charge in private industry, contending that union recognition extended to the Organization of Professional Employes of the Dept. of Agriculture violated the government's employe-management relations policy.

The unaffiliated professional group, the AFGE local alleged, is sponsored, controlled and dominated by management. The union's complaint listed eight management officials in the association's current roster of officers.

The local has asked Freeman either to withdraw recognition or to agree to refer the issue to arbitration.

Supreme Court Rules:

Pre-Vote Handouts Held Unfair Practice

A unanimous Supreme Court found "a fist inside the velvet glove" of a Texas employer who passed out holiday, vacation and overtime benefits in a successful campaign to persuade his workers to vote against union representation.

The court agreed with the National Labor Relations Board that the Exchange Parts Co. had committed an unfair labor practice by its sudden generosity during a Boilermakers' organizing drive.

Its decision reversed the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, which refused to enforce the NLRB order. Similar labor board decisions had been upheld in other circuit courts.

Justice John M. Harlan, speaking for the Supreme Court, said in effect that benefits given by an employer to discourage union organization aren't worth much anyway. He declared:

"We cannot agree with the Court of Appeals that enforcement of the board's order will have the 'ironic' result of 'discouraging benefits for labor.' The beneficence of an employer is likely to be ephemeral if prompted by a threat of unionization which is subsequently removed. Insulating the right of collective bargaining from calculated good will of this sort deprives employes of little that has lasting value."

The company, which rebuilds auto parts, sent a letter to each employe in March 1960, two weeks before the NLRB election, which listed various benefits it had put into effect including several which were announced for the first time. The letter said in part:

"The union can't put any of those things in your envelope—only the company can do that . . . it didn't take a union to get any of those things . . . it won't take a union to get additional improvements in the future."

Declaring that the company's action was a form of interference with the freedom of choice of the workers towards union representation, the Supreme Court said:

"The danger inherent in well-timed increases in benefits is the suggestion of a fist inside the velvet glove. Employes are not likely to miss the inference that the source of benefits now conferred is also the source from which future benefits must flow and which may dry up if it is not obliged."

The Supreme Court noted pointedly that various circuit courts "have found a violation in the kind of conduct involved here." It had accepted the case for review, it said, "to clear up a possible conflict" between the 5th Circuit Court and other circuit courts "on an important question of national labor policy."

2 Big Firms Charged With Unfair Practices

Two major business firms have been charged, in complaints issued by the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, with a wide range of unfair labor practices against unions.

At Boston, the United Aircraft Corp. has been accused of causing and prolonging a 1960 strike of the Machinists by resorting to unfair practices started in 1953 or earlier. An estimated $25 million in backpay for more than 3,500 workers is at stake in the case, pending since 1961.

At Winston-Salem, N. C., the NLRB regional office and the general counsel issued six complaints based on inquiries into 19 law violation charges filed by the Textile Workers Union of America against the J. P. Stevens Co., major employer of labor in the Carolinas.

A hearing on the complaint has been set for Feb. 24 at Great Falls, S. C., the NLRB said. The big textile firm is accused of interrogating employes at various plants on union activities during a TWUA organizing drive; spying on union handbill distributors and union meetings; firing and laying off 53 employes illegally for union activities, and continued harassment of union supporters on the job for minor rules infractions.

The new charges against United Aircraft grew out of information produced by management at hearings in the U.S. District Court in Hartford, Conn., on civil suits. The Machinists are trying to collect several million dollars for members injured by what the IAM called management's violation of a strike-settlement agreement.

The charges were contained in an amended petition filed Jan. 15 by NLRB Gen. Counsel Arnold Ordman's office with an examiner who has been holding hearings over a six-month period on previous NLRB complaints. The new complaint accuses United Aircraft of these unlawful practices:

- Causing and prolonging a nine-week strike in 1960 at two of its Connecticut plants—Pratt & Whitney Aircraft and the Hamilton Standard Div.
- Refusing to give the union complete seniority lists, or other information to which it was entitled, before and after the 1960 strike.
- Failing to bargain in good faith for more than 10 years by repeatedly refusing information which the IAM needed as bargaining agent.

The earlier NLRB complaints involved union charges that in violation of the strike settlement, the firm either failed to call back or downgraded at least 3,500 strikers.

Screen Actors Back Swedish TV Strike

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Actors Guild has thrown its support to the Actors Union of Sweden in its dispute with the Swedish Radio & Television Authority.

The Swedish union went on strike in television after nearly a year of fruitless negotiations for wage increases, and the authority retaliated by locking members out from employment in sound radio programs.

The SAG board of directors voted to instruct all members that they should not accept Swedish TV or radio work without checking with the union. British Actors' Equity and other entertainment unions in many other countries have taken similar action.

New York CWA Locals Rally To Fight New Teamster Raid

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York—The Communications Workers are rallying their forces in 23 locals all over the state to throw back the sixth recent all-out Teamster raid on CWA membership and bargaining rights.

The CWA, representing 23,000 employes of the New York Telephone Co. plant department, has expressed confidence that its members will support it by an emphatic margin in a statewide National Labor Relations Board election set tentatively for the first two weeks in February.

The Teamsters, expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957 on findings of domination by corrupt elements, petitioned for the election in the latest of a series of raids on Bell telephone unions. All have been beaten back, said CWA, whose leaders predicted a similar result in the latest raid.

In the coming election, plant employes from Staten Island to Buffalo will have four choices on the ballot—CWA, Teamsters, the unaffiliated Brotherhood of Telephone Workers, or neither.

The Teamster raid followed a decision by one of the 23 plant locals in the state—Local 1101, representing 10,500 plant employes in Manhattan, Brooklyn and the Bronx—to leave the CWA and join another union to be designated by the local executive board. The board chose the Teamsters, and these developments followed:

- The CWA suspended three officers of Local 1101, named an administrator, and went to court when local officers refused to surrender funds, records or union headquarters.
- The CWA denied the right of the local to disaffiliate under the CWA constitution and under state or federal law.
- At an Albany meeting Jan. 10 addressed by CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, officers and bargaining committeemen from the 23 locals voted unanimously, CWA said, to support CWA and condemn Teamster Pres. James R. Hoffa and his associates for the latest attempted raid.

The telephone union also won a temporary injunction against use of the funds of CWA Local 1101. and later asked a contempt of court citation against officers it said had violated the injunction. A judge of the New York State Supreme Court reserved decision on the contempt petition and also on CWA's petition to make the injunction permanent.

CWA represents some 380.000 workers in the telephone industry. It said the dispute here grew out of a difference of opinion over bargaining methods. CWA for several years has sought to set a "pattern" on wages and conditions at one Bell company and then tried to apply the pattern to other Bell units. Leaders of the local here attacked the settlement and when a majority of the New York members accepted it, they moved to leave CWA.

A $1,200 CONTRIBUTION to the John F. Kennedy Center for Performing Arts from employes of the Philadelphia office of the Veterans Administration is brought to Washington by Pres. Royal Sims of Government Employes Local 940. Left to right: AFGE National Pres. John F. Griner; Deputy VA Administrator William J. Driver, who accepted the check on behalf of the cultural center fund drive; Sims; AFGE Sec.-Treas. Esther F. Johnson. Actors Win Pay Hikes For Making TV Ads

New York—Substantial rate increases for performers in filmed and taped television commercials are provided in a new agreement reached by the Screen Actors Guild and the Television & Radio Artists in joint negotiations with national advertisers, agencies and producers.

Representing the industry in the talks were the Joint Committee of the Association of National Advertisers and the American Association of Advertising Agencies.

Pay increases for actors, singers, announcers and stuntmen apply to both program commercials and spot commercials. Payment in the industry is on the basis of a 13-week cycle and depends on the number of showings and the number of cities in which a commercial is shown, with heavier weight given to such large cities as New York, Chicago and Los Angeles.

SAG announced that session fees had been increased from $95 to $105 for on-camera players and from $70 to $80 for off-camera players.

In the area of program commercials, the major gains were achieved in payments for commercial use beyond the first 13 uses, where the unions regarded the existing discounts as "arbitrary and excessive." For example, the on-camera performer rates for each 13-week cycle of commercials in Class A programs (those shown in more than 20 cities) went from $15 to $20 for each use from the 14th through the 20th, from $10 to $20 for each of the next six uses and from $10 to $12.50 for each use thereafter.

Citing examples of how improvements in the complicated spot commercial formula would apply, a SAG spokesman said that in the case of 153 cities, including all of the larger weighted cities, pay for an on-camera player for one 13-week cycle would go from $386.25 to $525, an increase of 36 percent.

In another example, the rate for an off-camera player appearing in a commercial shown in Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland and 114 of the smallest cities would go from $224.75 to $266.25 for one 13-week cycle, an increase of 19 percent.

Other improvements tighten restrictions on advertisers acquiring and maintaining exclusive rights to a performer's services, require payment for certain uses of still photographs and provide double-time payment for work on Saturday as well as Sunday.

The contract also contains for the first time a clause barring discrimination in the hiring of performers because of race, creed, color or religion. It is patterned on the clause SAG negotiated last year in its contract covering theatrical motion pictures.

Reinstatement, $15,000 in Pay Won for 56

The Clothing Workers have won job restoration for 56 laid-off workers and backpay of more than $15,000 from a Tennessee clothing maker who has agreed to reopen the "runaway" pants manufacturing department he closed when the union started organizing his plant.

Majorette Sportswear, Inc., of Decherd, Tenn., signed a National Labor Relations Board stipulation to stop promoting employe signatures to a petition opposing the union, promising wage increases, payment of group insurance premiums or other benefits to discourage union membership, and to stop interrogating employes about their attendance at meetings or other ACWA activities.

The firm agreed to:

- Resume operation of the pants manufacturing department instead of subcontracting the work outside the plant.
- Offer immediate and full reinstatement to former employes of the department, and make them whole for loss of pay ranging from $245 to $400 each.

A hearing on the charges brought by the union opened last Nov. 19 but was ordered closed when the firm agreed the same day to a stipulation later approved by the labor board and the ACWA.

3.7% Average Hike Won in Transit

Union-won wage increases went to more than 95 percent of the 62,000 operators of local transit systems in the nation in the year ending last July 1, the Labor Dept. has reported.

Average hourly scale advanced 9 cents to $2.64 for operators of surface cars and buses, and by 10 cents to $2.79 for elevated and subway operators, the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said in its annual survey in cities of 100,000 population or more. The average increase was 3.7 percent, it said.

2 Graphic Arts Unions Vote Merger Approval of the AFL-CIO Executive Council. Under the proposed plan the new organization, with about 60,000 members, will be an AFL-CIO affiliate. The Lithographers for several years have been unaffiliated.

Completion of action at the May convention will merge two of the country's oldest graphic arts unions. The Lithographers were founded in 1882 and have 40,000 members, while the IPEU was organized in 1900 and has 20,000 members. The merger would be the first in the industry since 1900, when four craft unions in the lithographic field unified.

The two presidents in an announcement said the combined union will represent platemaking in all phases of the graphic arts—letterpress, rotogravure and lithography. In addition, about half the ALA membership is made up of lithographers pressmen.

The merger, the two presidents predicted, will be the forerunner of other mergers in the graphic arts. Unions in the printing trades and newspaper industries for the past several months have been holding talks on mutual problems.

The IPEU-ALA merger discussions headed down the home stretch after mandates were voted by both conventions in 1962. Hall and Brown met with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany early in January 1963 and in subsequent sessions had the aid of his executive assistant, Lane Kirkland.

As the terms of merger were undergoing exploration, both unions broadened committees of top officers to include representation from locals in major cities. A subcommittee of officers reached agreement on the terms, which were approved by the full committee and then by the respective executive councils.

The IPEU convention in August and the ALA meeting in September accepted the proposal and it was thereupon submitted to referendum votes under present procedures.

Building Service Local Signs 1,236 Pacts in '63

New York—Building Service Employes' big Local 32B here negotiated and signed 1,236 contracts in the year ending Dec. 12, 1963, its executive officers revealed in their annual report to members.

With approximately 7,000 contracts with building owners to maintain and improve, the union renewed 287 contracts with two employer groups and signed 949 agreements with independent operators of Manhattan, Queens, Brooklyn and Staten Island apartment houses and office buildings. Other agreements are due to expire Apr. 20 and June 30, 1964, and proposals are now being prepared for bargaining.

During the year Local 32B processed 2,297 member complaints against employers; carried 59 cases to arbitration, with 30 settlements; filed 172 State Labor Relations Board election petitions; filed 36 unfair labor practice charges against employers and conducted 73 strikes with contracts won.

The local conducted a continuous organizing campaign to win jobs in hundreds of new buildings, especially in Manhattan and Queens, and signed 342 new contracts. It secured agreements for employment of members at the World's Fair, opening in April, and filled 2,215 other jobs through the New York State Employment Service.

Pres. Thomas Shortman said members received $3.9 million in welfare trust benefits and got thousands of eye examinations and eyeglass prescriptions through the union optical plan, which paid $21,383 for these services. The report also listed other union programs including a retirement system, scholarship awards program, and a health center with 18,500 members enrolled.

Pamphlet Cites Low Standards Under R-T-W

Poor working conditions and a low standard of living are characteristic of states with "right-to-work" laws, a new AFL-CIO leaflet proves.

An analysis of the 20 states with "right-to-work" laws documents the fact that "Labor Standards Are Lower in 'Right-to-Work' States," the title of the new leaflet.

A table in the publication grades the 20 states on unemployment compensation, workmen's compensation, minimum wage, overtime pay, fair employment practices, equal pay and child labor laws.

The leaflet, Publication No. 71, is an updated and completely revised edition of an earlier publication carrying the same title. It is available from the Pamphlet Division, AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 16th St. N.W., Washington 6, D. C. Single copies are free; up to 100 the cost is 3 cents each; orders for over 100 will be billed at $2.50 per hundred.

Ex-Rep. Howell Named Pension Plan Adviser

Charles R. Howell, New Jersey commissioner of banking and insurance and a former Democratic congressman, has been named to the Labor's Dept.'s Advisory Council on Employe Welfare & Pension Benefit Plans.

The council consists of 13 members and is appointed by the secretary of labor to advise the department with respect to the Welfare & Pension Plans Disclosure Act. Howell was appointed as a public member.

The Great Paradox

THE YEAR 1963 will go down in the record books as the year in which economic growth and unemployment both increased.

This seeming paradox is borne out by year-end figures showing an increase in 1963 of about $30 billion in the gross national product—the total of all goods and services—or a growth rate of nearly 4 percent after taking into account all price changes.

At the same time, employment increased 1 million while the labor force jumped 1.1 million, resulting in an average unemployment rate for 1963 of 5.7 percent compared to the average 5.6 percent rate for 1962.

Add to this skyrocketing profits reaching a new all-time record and dividend payments of record proportions and the overall economic picture comes more clearly into focus: In a relatively prosperous year for most people, the unemployment rate increased despite a marked jump in the GNP.

Two things are immediately evident from the above figures—a 4 percent growth rate is not enough in the drive to wipe out unemployment; and automation has triggered a sharp and sustained jump in productivity, wiping out in terms of jobs the gains in general economic activity.

Indicative of this trend are the forecasts of many of the nation's top economists for 1964. They predict a further rise in the GNP to $625 billion—$600 billion was scoffed at as unbelievable a few years ago—and a drop in the unemployment rate to about 5.2 percent, at best.

Given the hard fact that unemployment has been above 5 percent for more than six years and that total output of goods and services has been mostly on the rise during that period, the impact of automation becomes increasingly clear.

The unemployment problem calls for a many-sided assault—a tax cut, public works, higher wage levels, education and retraining, an end to discrimination—but one of the major weapons in the attack must be a shorter workweek.

A 35-hour workweek without reduction in take-home pay, bolstered by doubletime pay for overtime work, can crack the unemployment crisis and bring some of the affluence and prosperity evident in the profit and dividend records to the millions of unemployed.

Consumers' Spokesman

THE APPOINTMENT of Assistant Labor Sec. Esther F. Peterson as special assistant to the President for consumer affairs is an important step in giving the nation's consumers an articulate voice in the shaping of national policy.

The consumer as an identifiable group has not to this point in history been represented in any meaningful way in the machinery of government.

To a great extent the American labor movement has been the major voice of the consumer in Washington—struggling to secure passage of truth-in-lending and truth-in-packaging legislation, seeking lower drug prices, fighting price-fixing legislation offered under the name of "quality stabilization."

Mrs. Peterson in her duties in the Labor Dept. and with the Presidential Commission on the Status of Women is deeply aware of the needs and problems of the American people. We hail her appointment and Pres. Johnson's action in giving a White House voice to the millions of American consumers.

Wirtz Tells Graduates:

Collective Responsibility Basic To Meet Impact Of Automation

Following are excerpts from a commencement address by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz at midyear graduation exercises at the University of Michigan.

A CENTURY which dawned on an industrial revolution, that saw men concerned about becoming slaves, has reached its high noon in a revolution of technology haunted, rather, by the spectre of becoming robots.

A few miles from this hall, 10 employes man a machine that makes automobile motor blocks 400 men worked on 10 years ago.

Fourteen operators attend the glass-blowing machines that make 90 percent of all the glass light bulbs produced in this country.

Two workers now turn out 1,000 radios a day—the product of 200 workers a few years ago.

A machine translates an issue of Pravda into English in half an hour. Another traces precedents in the law library. At Cal Tech, a computer reports at the end of three hours the results of 80 million calculations required to trace the evolution of the sun over its 4.5-billion years.

Among the more athletic set, one machine plays now an excellent game of checkers, another a good game of chess except for the end play, and a third a relatively good hand of bridge. And there was last month's report even of cybernetic sacrilege—the Scottish computer that has proved St. Paul was the author of only five of the 14 epistles attributed to him in the New Testament.

It is only a matter of time, surely, until some clanking robot will draw itself erect and announce: Cogito, ergo sum.

Between now and this time tomorrow, 4,400 people will have stepped aside from their jobs, or moved on to others, because machines will be doing what they are doing today.

Yet any philosophy or policy about automation must necessarily start from clear recognition that unrestrained technological advance is not only inexorable, but essential to the maintenance and elevation of the standard of living.

The myth that automation is only a new stage in an old process is akin to the thinking that splitting the atom represented only an evolutionary development in the dynamics of war, a projection of the first use of the cross-bow or the Trojan horse. Technology has wrought as large a change in the necessary thinking about the future of work as about the future of war—but the answer here is obviously not to stop it.

The comforting myth that we can always pull the plug of a machine out of the wall disregards the fact that we won't. And the companion piece about "nothing coming out of machines except what men put into them" disregards the fact that this is probably no more true now of some machines than of some men.

THE MOST DANGEROUS MYTH, in immediate times, is that machines produce as many jobs for men as they destroy and therefore represent no threat to workers. This is a half-truth, and therefore a half-lie. The truth is that machines permit the extension of men's work activities. The implied lie is that this will happen automatically or without the exercise of full human responsibility.

The machines now have, in general, a high school education—in the sense that they can do most jobs that a high school education qualifies people to do. So machines will get the unskilled jobs, because they work for less than living wages. Machines are, in the most real sense, responsible for putting uneducated people out of work.

The jobs the machines create, furthermore, are usually for different people from those they displace. This doesn't matter if labor is viewed as a commodity. What it means, however, in more understanding terms is that the bargain a machine strikes with a man is that it takes one job and offers in return another—stripped of the worker's seniority, accrued vacation benefits, pension rights, and the value of the skill he had spent a lifetime developing.

The answers are not to smash the machines. They are to recognize that the individual versus the machine is as unfair a match today as the individual versus the corporation was in the last century, and that advancing technology requires the exercise of collective—public and private—responsibility for its effects and collective measures to carry out this responsibility.

Morgan Says:

It's a Specious Kind of Patriotism Which Defiles That of Our Allies

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

TWO QUESTIONS leap to mind from the dangerous tragedy in Panama. Why were American high school students permitted to get away with their arrogant and explosive defiance of an official order honoring an agreement that the American and Panamanian flags be flown together in the Canal Zone?

And knowing for years that they had basic issues on their hands that would sooner or later blow up unless they were faced, why have the United States and Panamanian governments not faced them?

Morgan

Dispatches say the lethal riots were ignited by the refusal of American secondary and elementary school students to fly anything but the Stars and Stripes on their school flagpoles. This neither explains nor excuses the death and destruction left in the wake of wanton protests by infuriated Panamanians. Obviously there was more behind the manifestations of hatred and vengeance than a "flag" incident could touch off by itself. But some Canal Zone authority, whether military, school or other civilian official, has surely got to answer for a lapse of responsibility in allowing children to precipitate an international incident.

It seems clear, however, that if they hadn't, somebody or something else would. Trouble has been simmering between the two republics almost from the day the 10-mile-wide strip of the Canal Zone was drawn athwart Panama 60 years ago. Repeatedly the trouble has boiled over. The root of it, as is the case of so many problems between nations, is largely psychological. In a real sense Panama was born as a nation out of U.S. "gunboat diplomacy" but it has always bridled at the 1903 treaty giving the U.S. perpetual sovereignty over the Canal Zone. Control of the canal itself is not the central issue here, though it could quickly become so if relations were permitted to continue along their clumsy course.

The central issue stems from the big-power-little-power imbalance and the American failure, both military and civilian, to compensate adequately and gracefully for the fact that the Panamanians resent being treated like inferiors perhaps even more than they regret their small and relatively secondary position in the so-called family of Western Hemisphere nations.

Look at the ingredients of this tinder box: A poor but proud nation of little more than a million people in an area smaller than South Carolina. Not literally but figuratively it is "occupied" by American might. Individual income is about $500 a year, high for Latin America, but its unemployment rate is 12 percent. The prosperous living standards of U.S. military and civilian personnel in the Zone are in rich contrast, visible daily, to the Panamanians' own.

WASHINGTON RECOGNIZES that Panama has title to the 553-square-mile area of the Zone but for years it gave no tangible recognition to this titular sovereignty. Eventually in the wake of serious riots in 1959 Pres. Eisenhower ordered the flying of American and Panamanian flags side by side in the Zone. Then some American youngsters chose to defy that order in, of all times, a Panamanian presidential election year, when any candidate has to inveigh against the vestiges of Yankee imperialism.

Who needs a Communist to set such an emotional tinder box afire?

"A Latin," a Panamanian once told U.S. Ambassador Joseph Farland, "thinks with his heart, not his head."

As it happens, Washington has had no ambassador in Panama since Farland, a holdover Eisenhower appointee, left five months ago in a dispute with the Kennedy Administration. Whatever the merits of the dispute—much of it turned on the choice and execution of foreign aid projects—Farland proved Americans could be popular in Panama. One of his rules was to have as ready a handshake for the doorman as a high dignitary. When Farland left, a huge "despedida," farewell party was given for him in a gymnasium in one of the toughest, poorest districts of the capital. Hoisted on one wall, in contrast to today's "Yankee go home" mood, was a huge sign which read "Yankee, this is your home."

Pres. Johnson's newly appointed Latin American expert, who sped to the trouble zone, a professional diplomat from Texas named Thomas Mann, reportedly has the unpatronizing "quality and desire" to assist which is so vital an approach to our touchy Latin American allies. He will need all his talents to cope with this crisis. The U.S. government will need to get a new ambassador to Panama post haste.

Then, of course, there remains the abiding problem of teaching American teen-agers and their parents, whether they are stationed in Panama or Perth Amboy, that it's a specious kind of patriotism which requires defiling the patriotism of our friends.

Washington Reports:

American People Urged to Insist That Congress Act 'Responsibly'

IF THE PEOPLE "insist that Congress act like a Congress, act responsibly, act decisively," the civil rights and tax bills and the program that Pres. Johnson proposed "to end poverty" will pass the second session of the 88th Congress, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), majority whip, asserted in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service program, Washington Reports to the People, carried on 700 radio stations.

Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.), minority whip, blamed "the archaic rules" of the House and the Senate for delays on major bills in the first session of the 88th Congress and the difficulties expected in the current session.

"It's a shame," he declared, "that in this 20th century, in this age of outer space, we still have a handful of U.S. senators [capable of] preventing the Senate actually from voting on major issues."

Kuchel said that a civil rights bill and the pending tax bill will be passed. He expected the latter to pass the Senate before the end of February, and said that a bipartisan majority would invoke cloture and pass the rights bill.

Humphrey reported that he has been informed by Rep. John Blatnik (D-Minn.), House sponsor of the youth employment opportunities bill, that he expected the measure to be pried from the Rules Committee because of the support given youth programs by Johnson. The Senate passed the bill, sponsored by Humphrey, last year, and the Blatnik bill has been cleared by the House Labor Committee.

THE TAX BILL is vital, he declared, and "the people ought to insist" that their congressmen meet "the needs of our elderly for hospital and nursing home care" as well as the "needs of our youth for training and education, of our basic economy in the field of resource development, area rehabilitation, accelerated public works."

"We can do these things," Humphrey asserted. "The tax bill ought to be on the President's desk before Mar. 1. And if the people of the U.S. react, as I think they will, the time involved in the civil rights bill may well be reduced. The American people are going to insist that this Congress act and act decisively."

Kuchel expressed his opinion that the second session of the 88th Congress will be called back after the conventions and the November elections because of unfinished business.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE HOUSE RULES COMMITTEE hearings these days offer a short course in the practiced, skillful techniques of the Southerners in filibuster and diversionary tactics on civil rights legislation.

Judge Howard Smith of Virginia, who concedes that the pending Judiciary Committee bill will pass the House, nevertheless professes the utmost alarm about how this particular "mysterious" version of the bill came through the committee "without hearings." The suggestion is implanted that Atty. Gen. Kennedy, full of fanatic zeal to impose his diktats on the innocent South, hornswoggled a bipartisan majority into indefensible abandonment of the duties of the powerful House, defender of the people's liberties.

Judge Smith asks Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler, the first witness, how it can be that the bill would empower the federal government to control conduct of state elections as well as federal elections. Celler belatedly suggests that the states can avoid any "interference" by offering their own protections of the equal right of Negroes to vote—or maybe, even, by scheduling state elections on different days. But Smith has exploited a point of federal "invasion."

THE NEXT-RANKING Rules Committee Southerner, Rep. Colmer of Mississippi, also raises the "centralization of power" issue. He approaches the bill, he says, "not from the standpoint of race," and he would be against it "if there were not a single Negro in my state."

He wonders how persons of Celler's "intelligence and accomplishments, who style yourselves as liberals, how you could continue this attrition, this erosion of the rights of individual citizens and the state governments."

The public accommodations section of the bill is "the most vicious, most objectionable feature of this monstrous proposal," he says. And he reproaches Celler:

"We don't have any hatred down in Mississippi for Negroes. You're breaking down the good relations between the white man and his colored brother."

Celler runs the record: In two Mississippi counties there recently were "107 percent" and "118 percent" registration of white adults and not a single Negro out of 7,300. Colmer explains that the real reason "this class" of people doesn't vote is that they aren't really interested in voting.

Colmer also argues that election procedures are supposed to be constitutionally the domain of the states. Celler has to remind him that there is a 15th Amendment forbidding the denial of voting rights because of race.

CELLER AT LAST releases the record of Judiciary Committee hearings showing that Atty. Gen. Kennedy was by no means a "dictator," that he urged the committee to modify the Administration bill to meet serious objections, that the Administration "wants a bill, not an issue."

Rep. McCulloch of Ohio, the ranking Republican Judiciary Committee member, testifies that the bill was not "railroaded" or dictated by Kennedy but approved in strict accordance with procedural rules. It was drafted by committee staff members, congressmen and "properly authorized people at the Justice Dept." after lengthy hearings on Administration proposals and a subcommittee bill, and it represented an agreeable version with strong bipartisan support.

At the end, Celler was called back for further testimony, and Smith announced that Rep. Willis of Louisiana would be the first opposition witness, with "about 30 other" opponents, mostly Southerners, also applying for time.

Of all the issues raised, we shall hear much, much more—especially in the Senate. The House Southerners are preparing the way.

THE PEOPLE CAN PUSH Congress to make certain that the tax cut and civil rights bills and the rest of Pres. Johnson's program are passed and passed quickly, Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.), left, declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.), right, blamed much of the previous delay in such programs on "archaic rules."

THE RISING "CASH FLOW" TO CORPORATIONS

Profits, Dividends and Cash Flow Hark Back to Pre-Depression Days

Record-high profits, dividends and corporate cash flow now being enjoyed by American industry reflect a boom "that is clearly out of balance" and "reminiscent" of the late 1920s, the AFL-CIO warned in the January issue of its monthly magazine, the American Federationist.

"Unless lessons from the past are learned quickly and public and private economic policies are redirected to immediately and substantially raise the ability of millions of families to consume, it is evident that the current profits boom soon will be in jeopardy," the federation declared. "And when it collapses, production and new investment growth will move into recession, too."

The analysis, "The Runaway Profits Boom," was prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research as an Economic Trends feature of the Federationist.

It noted that after-tax corporate profits hit a history-making high of about $27 billion in 1963, nearly 10 percent above the previous year, and that the 1962 level had been almost 13 percent above the 1961 figure.

The analysis pointed out that for the past two years corporations have been permitted much faster depreciation write-offs under liberalized Treasury Dept. rules, and that official profit reports for 1962 and 1963 actually were understated in comparison with previous years.

Understanding of the full extent of the well-being of American corporations requires examination of their rising "cash flow," the article stressed.

It noted that even with record cash dividend pay-outs, corporate "cash flow"—undistributed profits plus depreciation set-asides—skyrocketed to an annual rate of $42.5 billion in the third quarter of 1963, up from $38.8 billion the previous year and only $18 billion in 1947.

Wealth Enhances Wealth

"The vast size of this internally generated pool of dollars and the uses being made of them has tremendously enhanced the wealth and the power of American corporations, particularly the largest companies which are receiving most of them," the article declared.

Against this abundance of corporate funds, the article observed, stands the lag in consumer demand stemming from an "unbalanced flow of spendable incomes" which the AFL-CIO Executive Council has declared lies at the root of the economy's growing slack.

Although production and sales are at all-time peaks, the analysis noted, much of the nation's productive capacity is going unused and nearly 6 percent of its labor force is unemployed.

Thus, it continued, "funds badly needed to broaden the base of consumption are now being taken out of the economy at the top" in the form of cash flow that far exceeds current investment needs.

The AFL-CIO researchers cited Commerce Dept. studies showing that in 1961 about 30 million Americans were "impoverished by any acceptable standard," living in families with before-tax incomes of less than $3,000 or alone on less than $2,000. It noted, further, that a breakdown of family incomes in 1962 showed the 7 million most impoverished families with incomes under $2,000 were receiving less than $8 billion as a group whereas the 4 million wealthiest families with incomes above $15,000 received $100 billion as a group.

Program Offered

To correct the imbalance reflected in the sharp contrast between corporate wealth and consumer deprivation, and to avoid another recession, the Federationist urged:

- Collective bargaining efforts to win higher wage and salary increases and bring consumers a "fairer share of the constantly rising output of the nation's economic system."
- Lower prices as the public's share in technological progress.
- Public policies that will "distribute more of the rising abundance to the millions of low-income families whose needs are greatest," such as a substantial increase in the minimum wage and in social security benefits and coverage, concentration of tax cuts among moderate and low-income families, and public works and other undertakings that will add to purchasing power by putting the jobless back to work.

"Surely it would seem best for all Americans — corporation stockholders and all others alike," the article concluded, "to pursue enlightened policies that will assure reasonable profits continuously by assuring an adequate and continuous rise in consumer demand.

"Unless this is done quickly, the profit boom will collapse of its own topheavy weight, production will turn down and additional millions of workers will find themselves out of work."

Green Fund Scholarships Now Open

Columbus, O.—Ohio State University has announced it is receiving applications for the William Green graduate fellowships and undergraduate scholarships for 1964-65.

The awards consist of two graduate fellowships of $2,250 each for study concentrating in labor and industrial relations, and two scholarships of $750 each for upper-class undergraduate students majoring in the liberal arts.

All four awards are for study at OSU and are financed by the William Green Memorial Fund, created by the former AFL as a memorial in perpetuity to Green, who headed the organization from 1924 to 1952.

Applications, which must be submitted by Mar. 15, may be obtained from the William Green Memorial Fund, 239 Hagerty Hall, Ohio State University, 1775 S. College Rd., Columbus 10, O.

Job Injury Law Marks 50th Year

Albany, N. Y.—A half-century of workmen's compensation in New York State was marked by a proclamation by Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R) calling for observance of the first week of 1964 as Workmen's Compensation Jubilee Week.

The legislature passed a law in 1910 which was declared unconstitutional, Rockefeller recalled in his proclamation. As a result a constitutional amendment was approved by the voters and in 1913 another law was passed which became effective Jan. 1, 1914.

"The alleviation of economic hardship from accidents and occupational illnesses in our state through workmen's compensation," he said, "has contributed immeasurably to the continuing progress of the economy of the state and of the nation."

Chamber's Program A 'Weird Melange'

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce "really surpassed itself in double talk" in its 1964 labor program, said John M. Redding, director of the National Council for Industrial Peace.

Terming the CofC program "a weird melange" of contradictions, Redding noted the chamber says it wants to keep the government from interfering with collective bargaining, but at the same time wants state "right-to-work" laws which prohibit union shop agreements reached through free collective bargaining.

December Shows Dip:

'63 Jobless Rate At 5.7% Average

jobless adult man, an increase in line with seasonal expectations as outdoor work is curtailed.

On the other hand, it continued, teenage unemployment dropped in December, when there is usually little change, and jobless adult women experienced a larger than seasonal decline. All the reduction in unemployment was among those seeking part-time work, the report noted.

Harold Goldstein, the Labor Dept's. manpower and job statistics expert, speculated that many of those who had been looking for part-time work in November may have given up by December.

Breadwinner Trend Ominous

While the jobless rate showed recent declines among adult women and among teenagers, an ominous trend seems to be developing for family breadwinners, Goldstein noted.

"I think we should watch the unemployment among adult men which has increased slightly," he told a press conference. "It is a reflection of something that may be developing for adult men."

The overall jobless rate has been, for the past three months, 5.5 percent, 5.9 percent and 5.5 percent.

For adult men, the rate since October has moved from 4.1 percent to 4.3 percent to 4.4 percent in December. For family breadwinners — married men — the rate since October has been 2.9 percent, 3.2 percent and up to 3.4 percent in December.

Among teenagers, the jobless rate fell to 14.8 percent in December from November's 17.2 percent. Their jobless rate was 12.9 percent in December 1962.

Women's Rate Static

The rate for adult women, at 5.2 percent, was the same as in December a year earlier.

The total of longterm unemployed—those jobless 15 weeks or longer—remained frozen in December at 900,000. This total has been unchanged since last spring, when it had swelled to 1.4 million. The longterm jobless reached a low for postwar Decembers of 204,000 in 1952.

"As in November, about half of the longterm jobless had been out of work 6 months or longer," the report observed. "Both categories were close to year-ago levels."

Jobholders Down 700,000

On the employment side of the picture, the Labor Dept. said the total jobholders were down by 700,000 to 68.6 million. This decline was expected, leaving the December total 1.1 million higher than a year earlier.

All the job decline, the report noted, was in the farm section, dropping this total to 4 million. This was the same as in December 1962, the report said, but farm jobs averaged 200,000 lower than the previous years as the longterm decline continued.

The total labor force decreased in December by 800,000, as expected, to 75.2 million, or 1.1 million higher than a year before.

The Labor Dept. said the labor force growth for 1963 as a whole also amounted to 1.1 million, "a little below" the expansion expected from its longterm projections.

Factory Hirings Hit '63 Low Level

The Labor Dept. has reported that factory hirings for November were at their lowest point in 1963 after remaining on a plateau for more than a year.

The hiring rate of factory production workers dropped from 39 per 1,000 to 28 per 1,000 between October and November, according to a report by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The layoff rate at 20 per 1,000 workers was as low as in any month since early 1960. The quit rate dropped from 15 per 1,000 to 11, the usual seasonal change.

U.S. Chamber Outlines 1964 'Labor' Program

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has announced its "labor program" for 1964. Pres. Edwin P. Neilan, a Delaware bank president, says his group:

- Opposes a shorter workweek, but favors increased productivity and lower prices.
- Favors repeal of the Walsh-Healey and Davis-Bacon Acts, which set minimum wage standards on government contracts and construction, and opposes the pending bill to include the cost of fringe benefits in Davis-Bacon wage determinations.
- Favors a bill by Rep. Phil M. Landrum (D-Ga.) to strip the National Labor Relations Board of jurisdiction over unfair labor practices and transfer this authority to the federal courts. This, the CofC said, will "promote industrial peace."
- Endorses a bill by Rep. David T. Martin (R-Neb.) to put unions under anti-trust laws, prohibit a union from representing employes of more than one company in an industry, and prohibit "any featherbedding practice."
- Opposes extension of federal wage-hour protection to employes of hotels, motels, restaurants and laundries. The CofC said it opposes a minimum wage for these groups "to protect job opportunities," since a $1.25 wage floor would make their employment "too costly."
- Favors curtailment of the U.S. Employment Service and denial of its resources to persons already employed. (If a man wants a better job, let him pay a private agency a fee.)
- Opposes federal standards for unemployment compensation and favors maintenance of "state control."
- Favors state laws prohibiting the union shop and opposes repeal of Sec. 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act.
- Asks retention of the national emergency strike provisions of Taft-Hartley.

One Agreed Point

The final point on the C of C agenda is the only one which matches anything on labor's program. The chamber says it, too, believes free collective bargaining should be encouraged and compulsory arbitration opposed.

Deposition Filed in $400,000 Suit:

Origin of AMA Political Tape Reads Like a Mystery Thriller

of the recording pending outcome of the suit and has attempted to recover copies of it.

Feller noted, however, that about 2,600 copies of the recording are still in the hands of persons unknown and that every time they are played, Normile is again damaged. Because of the peculiar nature of the libel—through "an engine . . . a self-producing libeler"—the AMA, he said, should be directed to state publicly in its Journal what it has acknowledged privately, that it now has no information to establish the authenticity of the recording.

He pointed out that because of the heavy docket confronting the court, Normile could not expect a trial on the merits of his suit for at least two years. The injunction was being sought in the interim, he said, to forestall further injury.

Professor to Testify

He declared that Normile was prepared to prove "beyond any reasonable doubt" that the voice was not his and that a professor of linguistics was prepared to testify that the person on the recording "learned his English in or around New York City" where Normile never lived.

Feller cited a deposition filed by Walter Hughes, executive director of the Pennsylvania branch of AMPAC, describing how the recording came into the AMA's hands.

Hughes said that while attending a public debate, he was approached by a man who identified himself only as "Irv," who discussed with him the opposition of doctors to hospital care for the aged. "Irv," Hughes said, stated that there was dissension in labor's ranks in the Pittsburgh area and that he might be able to provide material for use in AMPAC's flight.

Phone Call from 'Irv'

About 13 months later, Hughes said, he received a telephone call from "Irv," who said he had some material of interest and that Hughes would be contacted by another person.

A few days later, Hughes' deposition went on, he received a call from a person who asked to be known only as "Cousin" and said he had a tape recording that "would be very interesting to medicine," which Hughes could have for $20.

Arrangements were made for "Cousin" to meet Hughes outside the AMPAC office in Camp Hill, a suburb of Harrisburg, where the exchange of tape and money took place on a dark night. Hughes said he did not get a good look at the face of the man who, he said, was tall and wore a broad-brimmed hat.

Hughes said he made eight copies of the tape and forwarded one to Dr. William R. Hunt of McKeesport who, after listening to it, said he thought the voice was Normile's and sent the tape to Chicago where both the AMA and AMPAC have their headquarters.

In AMPAC's offices, according to depositions by officials of the organization, the tape proved so interesting that arrangements were made to have it reproduced and distributed.

"I will absolutely guarantee you that this will raise the blood pressure of all doctors by 40 points on a shady day," one AMPAC official was reported as writing to another. "It is almost too good to be true."

'Checking' Described

The only check of the tape's authenticity, according to the statements filed with the court, were a telephone call to Hughes, who refused to say where he got it, and an interview with Kenneth Query, secretary of the Tri-State Industrial Association in Pittsburgh, who said the reference on the tape to 146,000 members in USWA Dist. 16 was a "good" estimate.

Actually, Feller said, the figure is further evidence of the fraudulent nature of the record because only about 20,000 USWA members are in Dist. 16.

He noted that about 5,200 copies of the record were made and about 3,400 were distributed before the suit was filed. About 800 were traced through AMPAC records, including a direct shipment of 500 to the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee which has since been recovered.

In arguing for the preliminary injunction, Feller pointed out that despite the history of the AMA's acquisition of the original tape, AMA Pres. Edward R. Annis had declared in reference to the tape during a television and radio interview: "I happen to know it's authentic."

Annis 'Believed in AMA'

Feller noted, however, that in his deposition to the court Annis said the basis for that statement was his belief that "the American Medical Association and the people with whom they work . . . would never do anything like this."

A public statement in the AMA Journal that it has no evidence to authenticate the recording "would at least remedy the public advice they have given people who have the recording," Feller said.

Hart said that this would amount to ordering the defendant to admit he has no evidence before the case is tried. He said he would "lean seriously" to granting an injunction, despite legal questions posed by the First Amendment and those involved in enjoining libel, if the AMA had not agreed to stop distribution of the recording.

Subsidies Proposed To Boost Apprentices

Los Angeles—Subsidies and other methods aimed at promoting apprentice training were discussed here at the first meeting of the Federal Committee on Apprenticeship to be held outside Washington.

The session was the first of a series to be held around the nation, with management, labor and government representatives discussing manpower needs and how apprenticeship programs can help meet those needs.

Garth L. Mangum, research director of the Senate Subcommittee on Employment & Manpower, suggested federal subsidies as a "positive economic incentive" to hire apprentices.

He urged study of the proposal for a quota of apprentices in each vocation to be set jointly by labor and management.

Undersec. of Labor John Henning, who chaired the meeting, said the economic crisis caused by automation "can be solved only by economic growth."

The present apprentice program is far too small, he said, and called on defense industries in particular to intensify their activities in the field.

Sec.-Treas. David S. Turner, of the Sheet Metal Workers, said that defense contractors should be encouraged to hire apprentices, and if they fail, then they should be required to do so by the government.

"The taxpayer would be the winner" if apprentice training is used more extensively to increase workers' skills and productivity, he said.

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. also called for intensification of the apprenticeship programs around the nation.

Robert E. Collins, training director of Hughes Aircraft Co., said the average age of skilled workers in his firm in many departments is from 55 to 57 years.

The stockpile of skilled craftsmen is "shrinking at an alarming rate," Collins said.

"If industry does not take definite steps to reverse this trend," he warned, "the impact upon employers using skilled craftsmen will be near disastrous."

Turner, a member of a task force on apprenticeship in defense contracts, said that "so far, no concrete program has been followed through by the Dept. of Defense."

Mangum, who is working on a report on apprenticeship to be issued soon by the Senate subcommittee, said "two-thirds of our skilled workers receive no formal training."

In Great Britain, he said, 36 percent of those entering the labor force do so through apprenticeship programs; in France, half of the men under 20 are in apprenticeship programs; and in Germany the proportion is even higher, with the shortage seen in applicants, not apprenticeship openings.

Japanese Coordinator Visits U.S.

Operations of the newly-organized Intl. Wage Research Center in Tokyo were discussed by its coordinator, Eiichi Ochiai, and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at a meeting in Washington.

Officials of AFL-CIO unions also joined in the discussions, which considered policies and procedures, and Meany entertained at luncheon for the visitor, who is general secretary of Shinsanbetsu, one of the four Japanese labor federations.

The wage research center, a new venture in international labor cooperation, is sponsored by the AFL-CIO, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the Auto Workers and the four Japanese labor centers.

R. W. Watson Dies; Former Organizer

South Seattle, Wash. — Condolences to the family of Rowland Winfield Watson, former West Coast representative and organizer for the former AFL, who died here at 81, were expressed in a message of sympathy by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler.

Watson remained actively interested in union affairs until his death, said Rowland J. Watson, a son. Meany and Schnitzler said labor can "ill afford to lose such staunch supporters" as the elder Watson, who "served the cause of labor faithfully and untiringly."

Johnson Declares:

Medicare Approach 'Practical, Fair, Just'

By David L. Perlman

The social security system is "the American way" to provide hospital care for the aged—"practical, sensible, fair and just"—Pres. Johnson declared in a call for a stepped-up drive to pass the King-Anderson bill.

He told a delegation of medicare supporters and senior citizen leaders the Administration has "just begun to fight" for the program and predicted that it "is going to be the law of the land."

This "most powerful of all nations," Johnson said feelingly, "should no longer continue to ask our old people to trade dignity and self-respect for hospital and nursing home care."

Forcing senior citizens to turn to public welfare, the President declared, "is not the American way."

The President used similar White House meetings with delegations representing a broad cross-section of citizens as a forum to rally public support for other major Administration programs.

He told the Citizens Committee for Tax Reduction & Revision—coalition of labor, small business, farm, education and welfare leaders—that "the clock is ticking" while the tax cut bill waits for Senate action.

"Every hour of talk by a senator can keep many jobs away from many people for many weeks," the President said.

At another White House meeting, attended by a bipartisan group of congressmen and senators as well as representatives of private organizations including AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, Johnson called for a non-discriminatory immigration policy.

Immigration Reforms Backed

He urged enactment of the Administration's bill to liberalize immigration laws so that applicants would be considered for admission to the United States without reference to their national origin.

Speaking in the presence of Sen. James O. Eastland (D-Miss.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee which has begun hearings on the measure, Johnson said the bill is a matter of "common sense, common decency" and "for the common good."

Groups formed to support key Administration programs meanwhile piled on fuel for the fire they hope to build under Congress.

The citizens committee on the tax bill, set up last May, heard reports from its five divisions to coordinate its renewed legislative drive. Biemiller, representing federation Pres. George Meany, a co-chairman of the committee, reported for the labor division.

The citizens group warned that further delay in passage of the tax bill "will cause business uncertainty that could lead to an economic slowdown" and "higher unemployment, scarce jobs for new workers, less business profits and reduced investment."

Also meeting with Johnson in support of the tax bill were members of a separate Business Committee for Tax Reduction headed by Henry Ford II.

Health Care Drive Pressed

To give a boost to the social security hospital care drive, Johnson invited to the White House representatives of leading organizations supporting the measure, including the National Council of Senior Citizens and the AFL-CIO. The federation's social security director, Nelson Cruikshank, headed the labor delegation. They were addressed by Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze and the two key sponsors of the bill—Rep. Cecil R. King (D-Calif.) and Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N. M.)—as well as the President.

The House Ways & Means Committee, which interrupted its hearings on the King-Anderson bill after the assassination of Pres. Kennedy, will resume hearings Jan. 20. Meany is scheduled to be the first public witness.

The immigration law reforms, strongly endorsed by Johnson, were requested by Kennedy last July in a message that called the present system of national quotas an "anachronism" which is "without basis in either logic or reason."

The Administration bill, introduced by Senator Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), would give top priority to applicants with needed skills, followed by relatives of American citizens. The nationality quota would be eliminated gradually, but no one country could be the source of more than 10 percent of the annual immigration.

FIRST ADVANCED-STUDY CLASS of Latin American labor unionists is welcomed to Washington by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler in ceremony at federation auditorium. The course, conducted by the American Institute for Free Labor Development, has brought 35 students from 12 Latin nations and the Canal Zone here for 12 weeks of study and field trips. All class members previously completed study programs at AIFLD regional centers outside the U.S.

access to his papers, his words, his thoughts—the access he himself wanted in the library he had planned.

"That is why we in the AFL-CIO want to help build that library."

The AFL-CIO Executive Committee, meeting in Washington on Jan. 7, began mapping a plan which will be submitted to the Executive Council at its next meeting starting Feb. 17 in Bal Harbour, Fla.

While no definite figure has been set, Meany indicated that labor's contribution to the library would be in the neighborhood of $2 million.

Max Danish, Union Editor, Dead at 77

New York—Max Danish, retired editor for the Ladies' Garment Workers, a longtime dean of labor editors, died of a heart ailment in French Hospital here. He was 77.

A onetime member of the Cigar Makers who joined the ILGWU in 1909, he participated in the historic strikes of blousemakers and cloakmakers in 1909 and 1910. He became managing editor of Justice, the union's official publication, in 1914 and editor four years later. By the time he retired in 1951, he had seen the ILGWU grow from 60,000 to 450,000 members.

At the outset of his career, he recalled, most labor news was concerned with picket line disorders, but over the years the philanthropic, political and industrial activities of unions received equal attention.

Born in Vitebsk, Russia, he came to this country in 1900 and became a citizen. He attended New York University while working for the ILGWU and received a bachelor of laws degree in 1918. He spoke several languages, and was in the forefront of the fight in the 1920s against Communist attempts to control the ILGWU.

Since his retirement he had been a consultant to the ILGWU and was active in the Liberal Party. He also wrote "William Green: A Pictorial Biography," published in 1952, and "The World of David Dubinsky," published in 1957. Just prior to his retirement he edited "ILGWU News-History," a chronology of the union gleaned from contemporary writings.

He is survived by his widow, the former Molly Frank; two sons, Roy and Keith; a brother, David, and a sister, Mrs. Rose Spekin.

Role of Institute Cited In Shaping Latin Unions

American labor anticipates that graduates of the American Institute for Free Labor Development will help develop Latin American labor movements tailored to the needs of their own peoples, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler said in welcoming 35 Latin trade unionists to the AIFLD's sixth training course.

The new class includes 33 men and two women from 12 nations and the Canal Zone. All previously completed 12-week study programs in one of the institute's 11 regional centers south of the U.S. border. They comprise the first class of advanced students since the AIFLD opened its doors in June 1962.

Study course directors, meeting at the same time for a three-day evaluation of training results, reported rapid growth of the education program and heard AIFLD Sec.-Treas. Joseph A. Beirne predict that the school will outgrow present boundaries and extend to other continents, including Africa. Beirne is president of the Communications Workers.

Schnitzler, saying the future of the world will be determined to a great extent by free labor movements, told the new class its members will have to "play an extremely important part in that work."

Thirty five individuals by themselves can do little but, Schnitzler added, "as you become teachers in your own countries you'll be contributing to the welfare" of all Americans. He expressed the hope that the 12 weeks at school would be "the richest experience" of the students' lives.

Ten of the 35 students will leave Washington after three weeks to study and observe labor bodies in Israel, Italy and Germany and the operations of the Intl. Labor Organization, Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and Common Market.

The students come from such fields as agriculture, retailing, public utilities, communications, construction, manufacturing, food processing and hospital care. They are citizens of Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Honduras, Peru, Paraguay, Uruguay and the Canal Zone.

Schnitzler also addressed the directors' meeting, as did AIFLD Executive Dir. Serafino Romualdi.

The AIFLD is sponsored jointly by the AFL-CIO; business firms and foundations; and the Agency for Intl. Development through the Alliance for Progress. Before the current class started, the institute had given 181 out-of-country unionists their first classroom instruction here. About a year ago, regional training centers were opened in Latin America.

Burdon Hits Robert Taft On 'Moonlighting' Charge

Akron, O.—Rep. Robert Taft, Jr., "insulted the working people of Akron" by calling their city "the national, perhaps the international center, for moonlighting," according to Pres. George Burdon of the Rubber Workers.

Taft, a candidate for the Republican nomination for the Senate seat his late father held, used the 6-hour day the URW has gained in collective bargaining to attack the shorter workweek, claiming it led to unemployment.

"Akron has an unemployment rate of 3.8 percent," Burdon said. "The national average is 5.9 percent and Ohio's average is 4.4 percent. If the 6-hour day contributed to unemployment, then Akron should be leading the unemployment list."

The Bureau of Labor Statistics, Burdon pointed out, does not consider "moonlighting" among Akron rubber workers "important enough to discuss in their studies of the subject."

Only 4 percent of all factory workers engage in "moonlighting," he said, adding that "the biggest moonlighters, according to authoritative surveys, are farmers, professional and technical workers."

"It would be well," Burdon said, "for Mr. Taft to check among his associates in both houses of Congress . . . He and his advisers are just as wrong as the social Neanderthals of former years who opposed the 10-hour day and the 8-hour day."

Civil Rights Foe Wins In Louisiana Primary

New Orleans—John J. McKeithen, a lawyer from the northern part of the state, won the Democratic nomination for Louisiana's governorship, defeating liberal-backed deLesseps S. Morrison, former mayor of New Orleans, 491,666 to 449,647.

McKeithen's upset victory in the runoff primary presented an omen of political difficulties for Pres. Johnson in the state over the civil rights issue.

In the first primary, Morrison led, and both he and McKeithen took a moderate approach in presenting their segregationist views to eliminate 10 other candidates, most of them running as extreme opponents of civil rights legislation.

In the runoff, McKeithen laid heavy stress on a charge that Negro "bloc" voting for his opponent was being promoted by "outsiders." Following his victory, he called for a conference with the state's congressional delegation to discuss strategy in opposing the Johnson Administration's civil rights program.

McKeithen still must face Republican candidate Charlton H. Lyons, Sr., in the election, but no GOP candidate has been elected governor since Reconstruction days.

The extent of the new governor's segregationist convictions and the shape of his administration, observers suggest, will be given a test late next summer when a federal court is expected to order desegregation of Shreveport's schools.

Meany Presses Case for Hospital Care

Economic Message, Budget Stress Tax Bill, Price Cuts

THESE ARE THE PEOPLE, a few of them, who traveled to Washington to urge Congress to pass a social security program of hospital care for the elderly. The scene is the House Ways & Means Committee hearing room during testimony on the labor-backed King-Anderson bill. (Separate story on page 10).

'Legislative Inoculation':

Meany Asks Speed On Medicare Bill

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany renewed labor's plea for a social security program of hospital care for the aged and assured Congress that American workers are "perfectly willing" to pay their share of the cost.

He told the House Ways & Means Committee that older Americans are "worse off now" than six years ago, when the first medicare bill was introduced in Congress.

Since then, he said, the number of Americans over 65 has gone up and hospital costs have risen "far faster than their incomes."

Meany asked passage of the King-Anderson bill as a "legislative inoculation" against "catastrophic medical costs in old age." He noted that more people were forced on relief in 1962 as a result of budget-shattering medical expenses than have even been stricken in a single year by polio.

The AFL-CIO president was the first witness to testify as the House committee resumed hearings that were suspended after the assassination of Pres. Kennedy.

"This is a measure which was close to the heart of our late President," and strongly endorsed by Pres. Johnson in his State of the Union message, Meany reminded the committee. It is "fitting" that it be "the first piece of major legislation" considered by the Ways & Means Committee in the new session, he added.

As the parade of witnesses began, the large committee room filled with elderly men and women, many of them delegated by senior citizen organizations to testify and to give encouragement to others testifying. They were joined by governors and mayors, state AFL-CIO officials, representatives of social service agencies, church groups and prominent physicians anxious to express their dissent from the Amer-

Joblessness Termed Intolerable

By Saul Miller

There will be "ample room" for price reductions in 1964 especially in "large industrial enterprises" where productivity is rising faster than the national average, the government's top economists declared.

Their advice on price cuts to prevent a "pileup" of profits came as part of Pres. Johnson's Economic Report to Congress which tied the future of the American economy to swift passage of the House-approved $11.1 billion tax cut bill now pending in the Senate Finance Committee.

The President stressed that failure to enact the legislation could turn expectations of continued economic growth into a recession. He asserted that a tax cut, combined with other government policies, would produce a gross national product of $623 billion in 1964, compared to 585 billion for 1963—an increase in stable dollars of about 5 percent.

The Council of Economic Advisers, in their report which contains the advice on price cuts, estimated that such a rise in the total of goods and services produced would drop the unemployment rate to 5 percent by the end of 1964, but said that the "attainment of the interim goal of 4 percent lies beyond 1964."

Johnson termed the average 5.7

'An Agenda For Action'

Pres. Johnson's budget and economic messages to Congress offer an "agenda for action" to which labor "gives wholehearted support," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

The program is designed to "create jobs, wipe out poverty and meet the needs of a growing population," he commented.

Swift approval of the tax bill is "essential," he said, with benefits "concentrated among low- and moderate-income taxpayers." Reiterating the AFL-CIO's support for an immediate cut in the tax-withholding rate to 14 per-

President Spells Out Program

By John M. Barry

Pres. Johnson has submitted to Congress a fiscal 1965 budget which he said "provides more funds than ever before in our history" for the fuller development of the nation's people through improved education, housing, manpower training, health and employment opportunities for youth.

The President described his first budget, totaling $97.9 billion in 1965 expenditures, as one of "economy and progress."

He noted that it provides for $500 million less in government spending than is now estimated for fiscal 1964 and will result in a deficit of $4.9 billion, about half the deficit for the previous year.

At the same time, he said, it is a budget that "safeguards the peace" by strengthening "the most formidable defense establishment the world has ever known," continues foreign military and economic aid, advances the space program, and maintains and initiates programs to meet pressing social needs, including a new $1 billion effort "to break the vicious circle of chronic poverty."

The budget is tied directly to the $11.1 billion reduction in federal income taxes passed by the House and now before the Senate, which Johnson views as an effort to shift the emphasis in economic expansion from the public sector to the private sector, to "shrink the $30 billion gap" between the nation's actual and potential output, and to provide 2 million more jobs for the unemployed and new workers entering the labor force.

Vital to Program

"The earliest possible enactment" of the tax cut, Johnson declared, "is an integral and vital part of my budgetary proposals."

The President noted that because of the delay in enactment of the tax cut, originally proposed by the late Pres. Kennedy, he now is urging Congress to lower the individual withholding rate from the present 18 percent to 14 percent, rather than 15 percent as provided in the House bill.

This, economists point out, would amount to pumping about $2 billion more of the tax cut into consumer spending during calendar 1964 instead of 1965.

24th Amendment Outlaws Poll Tax As South Dakota Votes Ratification

The anti-poll tax amendment became part of the U.S. Constitution as the South Dakota state legislature voted approval and became the 38th state to ratify. Ratification by 38 states, three-quarters of the total, was required to make the proposal part of the nation's organic law as the 24th amendment.

The amendment, proposed by Congress by a two-thirds vote of each house, will abolish the poll tax as a condition of voting in federal elections. No state can hereafter restrict the franchise in federal elections by requiring financial payment to the state from otherwise qualified voters.

As Maine's legislature brought the number of ratifications close to the needed three-quarters mark, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sent telegrams to the presidents of the Arizona State AFL-CIO and South Dakota state body urging redoubled efforts to secure ratification.

"The AFL-CIO has long fought the poll tax and we hope the labor unions in your state will help abolish it forever," Meany's telegram said. Ratification "will obliterate the last vestige of property qualification as a basis for citizenship and will break down an artificial barrier to the free exercise of the franchise by all citizens," he said.

Last April Meany sent messages to labor federations in eight states where legislatures were still in session urging that they back ratification. At that time only 30 states had ratified.

The poll tax as a qualification for voting has existed recently in only five states—Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, Virginia and Texas.

Some southern states may try to preserve the poll tax for state elections, as Virginia already has done. The overall effect of the amendment is to broaden the right of franchise.

STUDENT PICKETS from several schools joined members of the Laundry & Dry Cleaning Intl. Union in picketing Bergmann's Laundry in Washington, D. C., during a union organizing campaign. The union lost a National Labor Relations Board election but filed charges that management interfered for the second time with a free choice by employes. Last year the NLRB set aside a previous election on similar grounds.

Hopeful Trend Seen in Industry Study Groups

Labor-management study groups and "human relations committees" represent a hopeful new trend in collective bargaining but the committee approach cannot provide all the answers to the basic problem of continuing unemployment, an AFL-CIO economist told interviewers.

Joblessness is a national problem and must be treated at the national level, Rudolph Oswald of the Dept. of Research told Marvin Zim of Time magazine and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc., on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public service program broadcast over the Mutual radio network.

Nevertheless, study groups have unquestionably made a major contribution to industrial peace in several major industries, Oswald said, including steel, auto, clothing, rubber, meatpacking and construction.

The purpose of the long-range study-group approach, he observed, is to "relieve the pressures of the last 60 days" at the bargaining table. Under the committee method, "bargaining continues throughout the year and this prevents the build-up of certain questions into last-minute bottlenecks" as well as providing day-by-day solutions for some problems.

Improving the security of some present workers does not reach those who do not have jobs, Oswald observed. He added:

"One of our growing problems today is with unemployed young workers entering the work force."

A shorter workweek, he said, would provide jobs for some of the new entrants.

Jobs for New Workers

Labor, he asserted, is "naturally desirous of keeping jobs for those workers presently on the payroll" but it also feels the obligation of "providing opportunities" for future job seekers.

Each of the joint study committees now functioning has tried to resolve problems relating to its own industry, and "there does not seem to be one single answer" applicable to all industries, he noted.

For example, Oswald said, the Armour committee in the meatpacking industry studied retraining and relocation of workers to find jobs for laidoff employes; the Kaiser Steel committee studied profit-sharing, and other groups have sought new answers to worker problems.

But automation still causes problems in certain industries in spite of committee studies, said Oswald. He cited the committees at the Armour Co., which sought to retrain workers for new jobs but found not enough new jobs available even after retraining.

Union Upheld In Work Quota Enforcement

The National Labor Relations Board has upheld the right of a union to enforce its rules putting a ceiling on piecework production of voluntary members.

In a 4-1 decision the board cleared Auto Workers' Local 283, West Allis, Wis., of unfair labor practice charges filed by four members who in 1961 were fined from $50 to $100 apiece for exceeding quotas under an incentive plan at the Wisconsin Motor Corp. plant.

The quota plan started in 1938, was adopted by vote of local members in 1944, and has "played an important role in contract negotiations," the board said in its decision. The plan does not apply to non-members, and there is no union shop provision requiring membership.

Four board members agreed that the fines were internal union actions and voted to dismiss the complaint. The newest board member, Howard Jenkins, Jr., wrote a separate concurring opinion. Member Boyd Leedom dissented.

The majority cited this reasoning in support of its decision:

The board has not been empowered by Congress to pass judgment on the penalties a union may impose on a member so long as the penalties do not affect the member's job status; the fined members were free to join the union and be bound by its rules, or to stay out of membership; company management, while abstaining from enforcement of the ceiling rule, has consistently supplied the information which the union uses to "police" the rule and the company has even asked, in contract negotiations, for increases in the ceilings.

Joe Davis Named To Defense Reserve

Seattle, Wash.—Pres. Joe Davis of the Washington State AFL-CIO has been appointed to the National Defense Executive Reserve.

Pilots Seek New Cargo Safety Rule

Chicago—The Air Line Pilots have asked the Federal Aviation Agency to change aircraft cargo loading regulations so that flight crews will have room to escape if a plane catches fire or plunges into a body of water.

With present methods of loading, an ALPA study showed, bulk or "palletized" cargoes fill all the available space on planes of three major airlines and leave the crew with only the small cockpit windows or a forward door for escape during emergencies.

This system may spread to other airlines, the union said, when aircraft now on order are delivered. Its leaders met with top FAA officials and later made a formal request by letter for re-evaluation of the regulations affecting crew survival in cargo planes.

Favored by the ALPA for more crew safety is installation of an escape hatch over the cockpit and overhead "crawl" space above the cargo, or an aisle alongside the cargo compartment leading to wing exits which, past experience has shown, are above water in ditchings.

The union asked for new regulations, it said, because it doubts that company managements would voluntarily take such action so long as present regulations have approval. ALPA Pres. C. H. Ruby said the union wants to promote the use of air freight as a service to the public on planes where crew safety is assured.

Farson, Reifin Visit Workers in Japan

Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson of the Newspaper Guild and Harry A. Reifin, assistant to the president of the Typographical Union, are on a month-long visit to Japan to discuss with printing and publishing industry workers the benefits secured by their American counterparts through the labor movement.

The trip is under the auspices of the U.S. Departments of State and Labor with the cooperation of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs. It is intended to strengthen union-to-union relationships. Stopovers were scheduled in Honolulu and Okinawa.

A comparable visit will be made to the United States by Japanese union members in the printing and publishing industry.

Major Cities Affected:

Slight Shifts Shown In Area Job Report

By Robert B. Cooney

The job situation worsened in five major areas and improved in two others, the Labor Dept. said in releasing its December survey of the nation's 150 major job centers.

The Labor Dept. classified 38 major areas as suffering "substantial unemployment" in December—that is, with 6 percent or more jobless. This was up one from November's total of 37 areas, the 1963 low point for four straight months. A year ago 41 areas were so classified.

Tacoma, Wash., was placed on the list of major areas with substantial unemployment. Tacoma's increased joblessness was caused, according to the report, by the shutdown of a defense firm and a nearby aircraft plant, and reduced work in a metal fabricating firm.

Construction cutbacks were "mainly responsible" for higher joblessness in Wilmington, Del., and Columbus and Dayton, O., the report said. These three areas moved from the relatively low jobless grouping of 1.5 to 2.9 percent unemployed into the 3 to 5.9 percent category.

Fall River, Mass., was reclassified into the 9 to 11.9 percent jobless grouping as unemployment rose among rubber, textile and electrical machinery workers, the report said.

Job improvements came to Grand Rapids and Lansing, Mich., the report noted, mainly because of a pickup in automobile parts and related industries. Both areas were reclassified downward into the 1.5 to 2.9 percent jobless grouping.

Smaller Areas Improve

In the list of smaller areas suffering substantial unemployment, the total for December dropped to 153 with removal of nine areas. This was a low for the year. In December 1962, the smaller areas so classified totaled 167.

The smaller areas which improved and dropped below the 6 percent jobless mark were Fort Lauderdale-Hollywood, Fla., Carbondale, Ill., Muncie and Vincennes, Ind., Adrian, Mich., Klamath Falls, Ontario and Salem, Ore., and Parkersburg, W. Va.

The list of "very small areas" of "substantial and persistent unemployment" showed one area added and 12 others removed.

It said there is now an overall total of 574 areas—17 major, 97 "smaller" and 460 "very small"—officially classified by the Labor Dept. as "areas of substantial and persistent unemployment." All these areas have been recommended to the Dept. of Commerce for designation as "redevelopment areas" under the Area Redevelopment Act. the Labor Dept. said.

In a separate report, the Labor Dept. said that one major area—San Jose, Calif.—has been put on its list of areas eligible for aid under the Public Works Acceleration Act. Such areas must be on the ARA list or must suffer substantial unemployment for nine of the preceding 12 months.

UAW Local Breaks Ground For New Clinic

Baltimore — Ground-breaking ceremonies were held here for a new labor-supported group medical clinic where workers will get comprehensive health care for a flat monthly fee.

The new Eastpoint Medical Health Center was set up by Auto Workers Local 738 at the Martin aircraft plant. It is designed as a community organization, to which it is hoped that various groups in the Baltimore area will affiliate to provide health care for members and their families.

UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock, speaking at the ceremonies, noted a "profound change in the concept of health care in recent years"—from an earlier attitude of merely preventing illness to a more modern effort to provide "physical, mental and social health."

Dr. Edwin Dailey, vice president of the Health Insurance Plan (HIP) of New York, said non-profit group medicine is rapidly showing many advantages over traditional practice. New York surveys, he said, show far fewer infant deaths among members of group health plans, less use of hospitals, and greater progress towards immunization of infants against disease.

Baltimore's Eastpoint Center is due to open in the spring. Head of the group which will operate it is Leonard Lesser, director of social security for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Arbitration Application Delayed by Firemen, Rails

The Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen have signed an agreement with major railroads delaying application of a compulsory arbitration award insofar as it affects locomotive helpers (firemen) until a legal challenge raised by the union is decided by the courts.

The award grew out of arbitration ordered by Congress to settle two phases of a dispute between the operating unions and the railroads—work rules and crew consist—and was to become effective Jan. 25. The new agreement, signed in Washington, has the effect of delaying its application pending settlement of the legal challenge initiated jointly by the BLF&E, the Trainmen and the Switchmen.

The unions attacked both the constitutionality of the compulsory arbitration law and the award itself.

The law is unconstitutional, they claimed, because it deprived persons of their property—in this case, job seniority—and of freedom of contract. The award itself, they asserted, went beyond the limits set by Congress.

Judge Alexander Holtzhoff upheld both the law and the award in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. The unions have appealed to the U.S. Circuit Court, which has scheduled oral hearings for Jan. 30 and 31 in Washington.

The Locomotive Engineers filed a separate suit also questioning both the constitutionality of the law and the award.

Backing from AFL-CIO:

Meany Pledges Full Support To CWA in Teamsters' Raid

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pledged the full support of the federation in the Communications Workers' defense of bargaining rights against a Teamster raid aimed at the plant department of the New York Telephone Co.

In a letter to CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, which the union has distributed to all members, Meany expressed hope that the 23,000 members of the statewide unit will vote "overwhelmingly" for the union in a National Labor Relations Board election set for the first two weeks in February, "so that CWA can get on with the job of negotiating improved contract conditions."

Meany, recalling his own long experience in the labor movement of New York State, expressed the view that trade unionists there "want to do the right thing and the smart thing . . . and in this election that means voting for CWA" for at least these reasons:

- The "fine reputation" and "noteworthy record of accomplishments" enjoyed by CWA.
- The fact that CWA "is a solid segment of the AFL-CIO" and enjoys the respect and gets the support of other unions in the federation.
- The fact that the CWA has the "general union know-how" to make it best able "to cope with a big telephone company like the Bell System."
- The fact that "the Teamsters Union, which was expelled from the AFL-CIO because of serious domination . . . by corrupt elements, has no rightful jurisdiction in the telephone industry."

"This raiding effort," Meany declared, "cannot help, and it can only hurt, the best interests of telephone employes."

Meanwhile, two Teamsters' organizers and four dissident officials of CWA Local 1101 in New York City were indicted by a state grand jury on charges of conspiracy to assault CWA and management officials.

Named in the indictment were Pres. Henry Habel and Vice Pres. Arthur McGovern of Local 1101, who along with the local's secretary-treasurer were suspended by CWA on charges of "dual unionism" at about the same time they led the 10,000-member local in a vote to disaffiliate from the CWA.

Others named in the indictment were Kenneth Burkard and Julio Rodriguez, identified as Local 1101 shop stewards, and Morgan Seifert and William Griffin, both organizers for the Teamsters.

'Campaign of Terror'

Dist. Atty. Frank S. Hogan charged that the six had engaged in "a campaign of terror and intimidation" in efforts to split the CWA membership. Among the targets they had chosen for beatings, he charged, were Frederick Kappel, board chairman of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.; John Macky, a local member who opposed the move to disaffiliate from CWA; Herbert Sharkey, an executive of the New York Telephone Co.; and William Lyons, president of a Queens CWA local.

Beirne said the indictments were illustrative of the "corrosive and destructive influence of Jimmy Hoffa on the American labor movement."

Castigating "this gangster philosophy of intimidation and violence," the CWA president said he was sorry "that some of the former officials of Local 1101 fell prey to Mr. Hoffa and his henchmen. It was for this reason that they were suspended from office by the CWA several weeks ago and are now facing charges by the union."

The NLRB vote among the plant department employes of the company will offer workers four choices —the CWA which now holds bargaining rights, the Teamsters, the unaffiliated Brotherhood of Telephone Workers which the CWA charges has had close contacts with the Teamsters, or no union.

CWA officials say the dispute raised by the Local 1101 officers grew out of differences over bargaining methods in pattern-setting negotiations with Bell System affiliates.

Officers and bargaining committeemen from all 23 CWA locals in the state whose members will vote in the NLRB election have pledged unanimous support to the CWA, Beirne noted.

PICKETS in third month of strike against General Telephone Co. of California greet Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of Communications Workers at Los Angeles airport. Beirne walked picket lines and visited strike headquarters of the 12 striking CWA locals. Nearly 9,000 union members have been out since Oct. 19 in fight for contract parity with employes of other major telephone companies in area.

Labor Board Clarifies Doctrine on Lockouts

An employer may not lock out his workers in support of another employer struck by a union unless the two negotiate jointly with the union in a multi-employer bargaining relationship, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

The 3 to 0 decision upheld a trial examiner's ruling that the Detroit News had committed unfair practices when it locked out its workers Apr. 16-19, 1962, while the unaffiliated Teamsters were picketing the city's other newspaper, the Free Press. The Teamsters had separate contracts with the two dailies covering circulation drivers.

The board ordered the News to make whole any pay loss suffered by its employes as a result of the lockout.

Unlike the trial examiner, however, the NLRB panel of Boyd Leedom, John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown found that only the News was guilty of violating the act and absolved both the Free Press and the Detroit Newspaper Publishers Association.

The board agreed with the examiner, but for different reasons, that three suspensions at other times during the spring of 1962, when one or the other of the papers shut down in support of its opposite number during a strike, did not amount to unfair labor practices.

The panel also reversed the examiner's finding that the two papers interfered with, restrained and coerced their employes in the exercise of their trade union rights by entering into a lockout agreement affecting multi-employer bargaining units of the Pressmen, Paper Handlers, Photo Engravers, Stereotypers and Mailers.

The decision expanded on the board's doctrine regarding lockouts as set forth in the Buffalo Linen and Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. cases.

In Buffalo Linen, the NLRB held that under certain circumstances, a non-struck employer may lock out his workers in defense of a multi-employer bargaining unit.

In the A&P case, the board ruled that a lockout may not be used by employers as an offensive weapon to force a change from single-employer to multi-employer bargaining.

Start in February 1962

The events in the Detroit case began on Feb. 14, 1962, when the Paper & Plate Handlers struck the News and the Free Press suspended its Feb. 15 edition but did not lock out its employes. From Apr. 11 to 19, the Teamsters picketed the Free Press, and the News in turn suspended publication Apr. 12 to 14 without locking out its employes. The News did lock out its workers, however, from Apr. 16 through 19. The Paper & Plate Handlers again struck the News May 7-9 and the Free Press locked out its staff May 8-9.

The board held that the February and May suspensions fell within the permissive limits of the Buffalo Linen doctrine and that the Apr. 12-14 suspension of the News was not a lockout. Thus, only the Apr. 16-19 period, when there was no question of preserving a multi-employer bargaining relationship with the Teamsters, amounted to unjustified use of a lockout as an offensive weapon.

The board agreed that the trial examiner had properly rejected the argument of the papers that even though they did not negotiate jointly with the Teamsters, the principles of Buffalo Linen and not the A&P case should be applied because the union's demands on the two papers posed largely identical issues.

Texas AFL-CIO Picks Educator

Austin, Tex.—H. G. Tate of Corpus Christi and Victoria has been named education and research director of the Texas AFL-CIO.

Tate belongs to Local 278, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and was a member of the IBEW's first statewide apprenticeship committee, which drafted the trainee standards for the Texas electrical industry. He has been his local's business representative for a total of seven years.

Pres. H. S. Hank Brown of the state labor body said a series of one-day and two-day union education programs will be offered in different parts of Texas soon after Tate assumes his new post Feb. 1.

High Court Bid Links Union, Negro Picketing

which involved picketing of retail stores in Seattle by Fruit & Vegetable Packers Local 760 advising consumers against the purchase of apples packed by non-union workers.

In the NAACP case, a Negro organization picketed a Florida drug store, Webb's City, Inc., over its refusal to serve Negro customers in its cafeteria. A Florida court found that such picketing was not protected as an exercise of free speech.

Recognizing the inter-relationship of the two cases and the possibility that an adverse decision in one might be detrimental to the other, counsel for the NAACP urged that they be argued together since they both raise "the same fundamental issue."

Both cases, the NAACP observed in a motion now before the high court, concern "a vital question of the lawfulness of peaceful picketing for the purpose of advising consumers of the picketers' views of the acts of a commercial establishment."

The AFL-CIO, in a friend of the court brief filed in the Seattle case, argued that purely informational peaceful picketing directed at consumers is protected by constitutional guarantees of freedom of expression.

The issues involved, the brief maintained, are "inseparably linked [to] the question of whether the constitutional right of free speech applies to peaceful picketing by Negroes protesting racial discrimination in public accommodations or employment, by religious or patriotic groups protesting supposedly objectionable motion pictures, or by any other popular or unpopular groups attempting to present to the public in the most effective way possible their view of a controversial issue, and soliciting the voluntary assistance of the individual consumer through his withdrawal of patronage from the offending firm or product."

Physical Strain Cited As Production Factor

Mobile, Ala.—The American Institute of Industrial Engineers was urged to set up its own research project to determine the effect of modern production methods on workers by Bertram Gottlieb, AFL-CIO industrial engineer, in a speech before the institute's Mobile chapter.

He developed his point at a press interview with Reporter Ben Rapport of the Mobile Register in which he called assembly line pressure "inhuman."

"An automobile assembly line," he pointed out, "is an extremely efficient product of engineering. What we don't see, or solve by engineering, is the strain and stress on the worker.

"We can displace a worker with a machine, but we can't make a worker into a machine."

Industrial engineers "almost universally ignore" the human factor in planning for efficiency, he said, emphasizing that "they think of man as a tool of production."

In his address to his fellow industrial engineers, Gottlieb said that the recent stress on mathematics and statistics in education, while necessary, should not be allowed "to bury other needs."

"Options in industrial psychology and sociology and in physiology must be encouraged," he declared.

"We must educate our industrial engineers rather than train them. Industrial engineering graduates must be prepared for the facts of industrial life. Industrial engineering schools must provide a basic understanding of workers and unions and of their legitimate concern with the work of the industrial engineer."

There is no question, he said, "that workers and unions will have a profound influence on the work of the industrial engineer for many years to come."

Pre-Pension Leisure Won In Sugar Pact

Baltimore — A precedent-setting leave program to help elderly workers prepare for retirement is a feature of the new contract between the Packinghouse Workers and the American Sugar Co. refinery here.

UPWA Sugar Dir. Emerson Moseley said the new provision gives up to 12 weeks of paid leisure each year to elderly workers getting ready for retirement. At the same time, the extended leaves will provide openings for workers of middle years to upgrade their skills and earning capacities.

Job Security Aid

Moseley said the plan will give relatively junior employes who might otherwise be laid off through automation a new hold on their jobs. He estimated that the program will save the jobs of 24 workers in its immediate impact.

Workers with 15 years of service will be allowed leave with pay (including regular vacation time) on the following schedule: Age 57-58, six weeks; age 59-60, seven weeks; age 61-62, eight weeks; age 63-64, 12 weeks. A union-company counseling committee will be set up to advise prospective employes on retirement problems.

Moseley said the new contract also provides for a 5 percent wage increase effective last Dec. 1 and a 3 percent boost payable next Dec. 1.

Vacation schedules were liberalized, the annual guarantee of work or pay in lieu of work was raised from 2,000 hours to 2,040, and the company agreed to pay 18 cents per employe hour into a jointly administered health and welfare fund.

Economic Message Stresses Need For Price Cuts, Five Million Jobs

percent unemployment rate for 1963 "intolerable" and said it would take 5 million more jobs to bring the country to full and sustained employment. The President figured it thus:

- Two million jobs to "get rid of stubborn excess unemployment."
- Two million jobs to "offset the labor-saving effects of rising output per worker."
- One million jobs to handle the nation's growing labor force.

No Legislation Proposed

The President did not detail a legislative program in his report, although touching on the need for a number of programs proposed by Pres. Kennedy and in his own State of the Union message. He promised to detail legislative needs in a series of later messages.

He made clear his intention of taking all possible steps to maintain present price stability and called on industry and labor to maintain price and wage policies "that accord with the non-inflationary guideposts" first stated by the CEA in 1962 and restated last year and again in the current report.

The President told Congress that in the past three years the nation has recorded a $100 billion expansion, with the GNP increasing 16 percent, profits up 44 percent and non-farm jobs up 2.75 million.

The average real income of non-farm workers had increased by $345 a year in the three-year period, he said, "a gain not exceeded in any previous comparable period," although noting also that average wage rate increases in 1961-63 "have been the most modest since World War II, thereby helping to stabilize unit labor costs and improve our ability to compete with Europe and Japan."

Johnson praised labor for being "constructive in collective bargaining and in its contributions to rising productivity."

He called, as previously, for a special high-level commission on automation and urged such a group to study the CEA analysis in the report, which by and large questioned the extent of the impact of automation on the economy and indicated it was possible that "higher rates of productivity increase may prove to be transitory."

The President urged retraining of displaced workers, increasing the coverage and benefits of the unemployment compensation program and extending the minimum wage act's protection to 2.5 million more workers—"among them 650,000 hotel, motel, restaurant, laundry, dry-cleaning and farm-processing workers."

He restated his opposition to a cut in the workweek to 35 hours, saying this would "redistribute work, not expand it."

He said he would ask for legislation authorizing higher overtime penalty rates on an industry-by-industry basis where tripartite industry committees "determine that such rates could create more jobs without unduly raising costs."

Special Message on Poverty

The President told Congress he would send it a special message dealing with his war on poverty, but stressed that this war is tied directly to higher employment and speedier economic growth.

The chief executive signaled the change in economic policy from one of expanding federal expenditures to a new emphasis on private consumer demand and business investment tied to the tax cut.

He noted that the federal government "played an important role" in the 1961-63 expansion with federal purchases accounting directly for 11 percent of the 16 percent growth in the GNP.

Stressing the necessity of the tax bill's passage to achieve this change in policy and emphasis, the President said the bill must be enacted "not in one, or two, or three months, but now" and with an immediate drop in the withholding rate to 14 percent from the present 18 percent.

Failure to pass the bill would bring a reduction in the anticipated GNP of $10 to $15 billion, he emphasized.

Dr. Walter W. Heller, chairman of the council, told newsmen that the prospects for maintaining price stability and warding off inflation were more favorable at this time than in other periods of expansion.

Price Cuts Discussed

Discussing the possibility of industry price reductions, Heller said that the auto industry could be one of the industries that under the guideposts could consider price cuts.

The council's report had this to say on price cuts:

"It is appropriate to focus special attention this year on price reductions. The guideposts call for reductions in those industries whose trend productivity gains exceed the national trend. It is fair to say that large industrial enterprises thus far have not widely heeded this advice. And yet, as noted earlier, there will be ample room for such price reductions in 1964. If they are not forthcoming, over-all price stability will be rendered more difficult, since price increases are likely in industries that are progressing at a less-than-average rate.

"Moreover, in industries whose trend of productivity rises faster than the national average, if wages conform more nearly to national than to industry-productivity trends (as the guideposts would have them do), failure to follow the general price guide will cause profits to pile up. Such profits become highly visible to the public and constitute a lure for strongly intensified wage demands."

The guideposts generally relate wage and price increases to the national trend in the rise in productivity. The council's report said in the past three years wages have been "close to economy-wide productivity gains and prices on the whole have not been raised to widen profit margins."

The President and the council affirmed their belief that the present non-inflationary levels can be maintained, the CEA noting that even with the strong expansion in the economy forecast for 1964, "the economy will be operating throughout the year with sizable balances of unused capacity and idle manpower."

Johnson Tells Congress:

Nation 'Cannot Wait' To War on Poverty

The nation cannot "and need not wait" for the gradual growth of the economy to lift the "forgotten fifth of our nation above the poverty line," Pres. Johnson told Congress in sounding the call to "unconditional war" on poverty backed initially by $1 billion in federal funds.

The President, in his Economic Report, stressed that general prosperity and economic growth "leave untouched many of the roots of human poverty," adding that "in the decade ahead, the forgotten fifth must be given new opportunities for a better life."

He called for a wide-ranging "versatile attack" at all levels of government to assure that "over $1 billion of new funds in the first year will be invested wisely and well." The President said he will present details of the attack on poverty, including legislative proposals, in a later message.

The scope of the problem was highlighted by the President with figures showing that the per capita income of 35 million men, women and children living in poverty was only $590 in 1962 compared with $1,900 per capita for the nation as a whole.

Substandard Incomes

Since 1947, he said, the incidence of substandard incomes has been reduced from one-third to one-fifth of the nation, but "the erosion of poverty slowed measurably after 1957."

There are "two major prongs to our specific attack on poverty," Johnson said:

- To enable every citizen to build his earning power to full capacity.
- To assure all citizens of decent living standards regardless of economic reverses or the vicissitudes of human life and health.

To "open wide the exits from poverty to the children of the poor" under the first line of attack, he urged programs to improve and upgrade education and health, improve opportunities for acquiring skills and jobs, push community and area rehabilitation and assure equal opportunity.

To assure decent living standards in face of economic reverses he urged strengthened unemployment compensation, hospital insurance for the aged under social security and an easing of eligibility requirements for public assistance.

The Council of Economic Advisers, in a chapter of its report on poverty, set out the following characteristics of those living in poverty:

- Twenty-two percent are non-white; nearly half of all non-whites live in poverty.
- The heads of over 60 percent of all poor families have only grade school educations.
- Of all non-white families headed by a person with eight years or less of schooling, 57 percent are poor. This falls to 30 percent for high school graduates and to 18 percent for those with some college education.
- Non-whites are poor about twice as often as whites with the same level of education.
- One-third of all poor families are headed by a person over 65 and almost one-half of families headed by such a person are poor.
- Of the poor, 54 percent live in cities, 16 percent on farms, 30 percent as rural non-farm residents.
- Over 40 percent of all farm families are poor. More than 80 percent of non-white farmers live in poverty.
- Less than half the poor are in the South but a southerner's chance of being poor is roughly twice that of a person living elsewhere in the country.
- One-quarter of poor families are headed by a woman; nearly half of all families headed by a woman are poor.
- A family headed by a young woman who is non-white and has less than an eighth grade education is poor in 94 out of 100 cases. If she is white the chances are 85 out of 100 that she and her children will be poor.

Johnson Names Rowan New Director of USIA

Carl T. Rowan, former Minneapolis newspaperman and lately ambassador to Finland, has been named by Pres. Johnson as director of the U.S. Information Agency, succeeding Edward R. Murrow.

Rowan, 38 years old, joined the Kennedy Administration in 1961 as deputy assistant secretary of state for public affairs and was named by Kennedy last year to the U.S. embassy in Finland.

Murrow resigned as USIA director, in a letter dated Dec. 19, following an operation for lung cancer. A famed newsman and television figure, he was considered to have revitalized the worldwide operations of the information agency, including its Voice of America broadcasts.

Rowan gained a national reputation as a reporter for the Minneapolis Tribune with stories and books on U.S. racial problems. He was an active member of the Twin Cities Newspaper Guild during his years with the newspaper.

Johnson, in announcing his intention of naming Rowan to the USIA, called him "young and dynamic," with "great perception" into the problems of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

A strongminded individual, Rowan is known to have earned Johnson's respect while serving as the then Vice President's press officer during a round-the-world tour and later as his adviser in a Scandinavian visit. Johnson termed him "superbly qualified" for his new post.

Johnson Says Tax Cut 'Vital' to Budget

Presses for 'Earliest' Enactment To Spur Economy, Create Jobs

rate starting Feb. 1, Treasury Sec. Douglas Dillon told newsmen a more realistic target date would be Mar. 1. He said the Treasury Dept. has the machinery ready to put the lower rate into effect within a week after enactment of the cut.

The expansionary stimulus of the tax cut in its first stage is expected to boost the gross national product to $623 billion in calendar 1964, an increase of about 5 percent in real dollars, Johnson said, resulting in a net rise rather than a drop in receipts from individual and corporation income taxes.

Growth Surge Seen

For fiscal 1965—the last half of this calendar year and the first half of next—Dillon said the government is anticipating a big growth surge, sending gross national product up by an average of $13 to $14 billion a quarter, or $50 to $55 billion for the year.

The proposed increases in spending to meet human needs have been made possible under an economy budget, Johnson said in his message, by substantial cutbacks in other areas, principally defense and agriculture.

The President said that because of "notable increases in military readiness" over the past three years, defense capability can be maintained with a $54 billion administrative budget expenditure, down $1.3 billion from fiscal 1964. The reduction for agriculture, expected to occur mainly in farm commodity programs, will amount to about $1.2 billion.

War on Poverty Set

In addition, the sale of government financial assets, chiefly mortgages, is expected to offset spending by about $2.3 billion, an increase of some $700 million over fiscal 1964.

The bulk of these savings, under the proposed budget, will be channeled into such programs as the attack on poverty, for which the President has asked a special allowance of $500 million, about half of which would be spent in fiscal 1965. In addition, Johnson said he was seeking another $500 million in new obligations for other programs which will be directly applied to the anti-poverty campaign.

More Skills, Jobs

The president keyed his "war" on poverty to an educational drive to increase the skills and job opportunities of young people and enable them to break out of "the vicious circle . . . in which one generation's poverty, ignorance and disease breed the same problem for the next."

He called again for federal aid to elementary and secondary schools, putting a cost estimate of $118 million on the first year of the program. He asked for $127 million in expenditures for vocational education, up from $73 million. He estimated manpower development and training needs for the year at $325 million, an increase of $189 million. And he urged enactment of proposed youth employment opportunities legislation at a first-year cost of $96 million.

To supplement general educational aid, the President also said he was recommending "an expanded program" of grants to meet special educational needs of school children "particularly for use in connection with community action programs to combat poverty."

On the other hand, the budget transmitted to Congress omitted any extension of the accelerated public works program launched in fiscal 1963.

Other highlights of the President's budget and legislative proposals included recommendations for:

- Creation of a new Cabinet-level Dept. of Housing & Community Development, not unlike the Dept. of Urban Affairs & Housing proposed by Kennedy but rejected by Congress.
- Enactment of hospital insurance for the aged financed under the social security system.
- A comprehensive program by federal agencies and the 10 states in the Appalachian region to develop the area's economic base and lift it from stagnancy and depression.
- Extension of the area redevelopment program, with spending of $130 million for fiscal 1965.
- An additional 200,000 public housing units over the next four years, with expenditures of $222 million in fiscal 1965.
- An increase in direct loans for housing for the elderly from this year's $33 million to $49 million.
- Extension of the Hill-Burton hospital construction act with special emphasis on modernization of existing facilities, and an expanded program of aid to nursing education.
- Foreign economic assistance and military aid totaling $3.4 billion, the lowest amount in 16 years and $1.1 billion below the amount Kennedy requested last year.
- An increase in the size of the Peace Corps to 14,000 volunteers, up from 10,500.
- Establishment of the proposed National Service Corps to provide volunteer aid in community welfare and work programs.
- Enactment of proposed legislation to improve state unemployment insurance programs, extending coverage to more people and lengthening the duration of benefits.
- Amendment of the Fair Labor Standards Act to extend federal minimum wage and maximum hours protection to 2 million more workers and authorize higher penalty pay for overtime "in covered industries in which it is found to be appropriate."
- A program of federal grants to states, costing $15 million in the first year, to acquire and develop land for recreation facilities.
- Reduction of federal civilian employment by at least 1,200 workers, probably more.
- Pay raises totaling $544 million for civilian government workers and $143 million for military personnel to bring salaries closer to comparable rates in private industry.
- An increase of $590 million in expenditures for the space program to help put the "moonshot" project back on schedule.

While the administrative budget is the one most commonly referred to with regard to federal spending, the President cited several other measures of government budgetry activity.

The consolidated cash budget, which includes social security, highway and other trust fund transactions as well as administrative budget estimates, will be $122.7 billion in fiscal 1965, matching the figure for the previous year, Johnson noted. This will result in a cash deficit of $2.9 billion, against $9.1 billion in fiscal 1964.

In sending his estimates of spending to Congress, the President also transmits requests for "new obligational authority," largely congressional appropriations for which much of the actual spending will occur in later years. For fiscal 1965, Johnson has budgeted $103.8 billion in new obligational authority, against $102.6 billion estimated for the previous year.

An additional measure of the impact of government spending on the economy lies in the amount of direct federal purchases of goods and services. These are estimated at $69.1 billion for fiscal 1965, an increase of $1.3 billion.

LBJ 'Agenda for Action' Supported by Meany

cent, which the President has asked Congress to approve, Meany termed this reduction needed "to provide the economy with an immediate rise of consumer buying power which will rapidly lift sales, production and employment."

The President's program is the "minimum" the country must have in this decade, Meany warned, "to adjust our society to the realities of job-displacing automation and the vast changes in science and technology."

The AFL-CIO will press for "early enactment" of the program, including the specific attack on poverty on which Johnson is expected to spell out details in a later special message, he pledged.

The tax bill and other programs now offered are nevertheless "but a beginning," he said.

Standing alone "they cannot bring us to full employment or eliminate poverty," but "must be supplemented by additional steps as rapidly as possible."

Labor Program Broader

The AFL-CIO therefore "will press forward for adoption of the additional measures" labor considers necessary to achieve "full employment and a healthy, balanced society," Meany declared.

He listed among these measures "increased expenditures for job-creating public works, a rapid reduction of working hours, double time for overtime work and the development of a comprehensive program of government and private procedures to adjust our society to the dislocations of rapid technological changes."

In the public works field, the Johnson budget failed to carry a recommendation for extension of the $900 million accelerated public works program approved by Congress in 1962. Without extension, this program will expire upon the exhaustion of funds appropriated under the 1962 act.

Meany also listed "substantial improvements" in wages, fringe benefits and job security as among objectives "that workers need" and are "both clearly desirable for a balanced economy and attainable through collective bargaining."

"Rapidly increasing productivity and sharply rising profits" are expected to grow "at twice the rate of national output in 1964 for the third consecutive year," he noted, and these facts "provide the basis for such collective bargaining gains."

Adoption of "the full civil rights bill" now before the House Rules Committee is a commitment of both the AFL-CIO and Johnson, Meany said, to deal with "one of the greatest unmet social needs of our times."

"We consider enactment of this bill a top priority legislative goal of the AFL-CIO," he said.

Goldfinger Forecasts Higher Profits in 1964

Philadelphia—A continued rise in corporate profits in 1964, on the heels of 1963's record-setting performance, was predicted by AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger at the annual forecasting conference of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce.

Speaking on the "Outlook for Profits," Goldfinger warned, however, that the profits boom could spell future danger for the entire economy, including the corporations themselves.

After-tax gains of U.S. corporations rose about 13 percent from 1961 to 1962, he noted, and went up nearly 10 percent the following year.

"Thus," he said, "from 1961 through 1963, corporate enterprise has been getting an increasing share of national product. Indeed, in 1962 and 1963 the rise in corporate profits was twice as fast as the increase in gross national product."

In 1964, he continued, assuming the tax cut is enacted, total national production will probably rise by $30 billion or more—an increase of 5 to 5.5 percent.

"With productivity continuing up at a rather rapid pace," Goldfinger went on, "profit margins will probably continue to increase somewhat. Such margins plus an increase in sales and a $1 billion cut in corporation taxes will probably boost profits after taxes by about 11 percent in 1964, bringing them to about $30 billion."

This, he noted, would mean that for the third straight year corporate profits will have increased twice as fast as total national production.

"With the persistence of idle productive capacity," the AFL-CIO research director observed, "it is no wonder that in 1963 the retained cash flow of corporations—undistributed profits after taxes plus depreciation allowances—was about $4 billion more than the corporations invested in new plant and equipment."

Thus, he noted, part of the cash flow which comes out of the economy has not been put back into it through productive investment, and some of the excess funds have gone into speculative business operations or overseas investments, "sometimes resulting in the export of jobs."

"This situation cannot continue for too long," Goldfinger declared, "without the development of troubles for the economy as a whole, including the business community."

Laredo Labor Asks 'Poverty War' Aid

Laredo, Tex.—A hope that the national drive to eliminate "pockets of poverty" will include a focus on the Mexican border area was expressed by Pres. Jose Vazquez of the Webb County AFL-CIO in a telegram congratulating Pres. Johnson for launching the program.

Hundreds of thousands of citizens in the section, he said, "are barely able to earn food for their children." He noted "with Texas pride" that Mrs. Johnson had visited one poverty-stricken area, Appalachia, and urged that she visit the Mexican border also.

"We hope that proposals to Congress for remedial legislation," Vazquez said, "will include some wage floor provisions applicable to areas of chronic poverty such as ours."

Strike Settles 500 Disputes At Buick Plant

Flint, Mich.—Auto Workers at the Buick plant here ended an eight-day strike over grievances by ratifying an agreement hailed by Local 599 as a major victory for its 15,000 members.

Local members walked out Jan. 8 and ratified the new agreement Jan. 16. The pact, according to UAW Reg. Dir. E. S. Patterson, settles more than 500 disputes over production standards. An important byproduct was the "satisfactory adjustment" of several backpay claims and of disputes over other issues, Patterson said.

In the course of the Buick strike, the Michigan Employment Security Commission ruled that several thousand workers laid off at other General Motors Corp. plants were not eligible for unemployment insurance. UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock advised Gov. George Romney of the ruling and called on him, if it is not reversed, to ask the legislature to change the law.

Romney himself sponsored the bill last May with the assurance that the law would not penalize a laid-off worker "if he has no interest in a strike" at another plant.

Equity for Workers

AMERICAN BUSINESS and industry are in the somewhat embarrassing position of being caught with their profits showing to the extent that the government is advising price cuts.

While the President's Council of Economic Advisers in past years has suggested that industry reduce prices where there have been sharp gains in productivity, in its 1964 report the point is stressed and underscored.

What's bothering the CEA? Essentially the question of price stability that will allow the economy to expand and grow without raising the spectre of inflation.

To achieve this goal the council, and Pres. Johnson in his message to Congress, strongly reaffirmed the wage-price guideposts of earlier years. The President announced that an early-warning system would be established within the government to spot price rises in time for the government to take necessary action.

The Administration apparently arrived at the point of laying new emphasis on price cuts in terms of what has happened to prices and wages over the past two years. The CEA reports that wages have kept pace with the general increase in productivity. The facts are that in key industries productivity—output per manhour—has outstripped wage gains.

But on profits—the direct result of price policies—the picture is different enough to lead the council to declare "there will be ample room" for price reductions in 1964 because large industrial enterprises "have not widely heeded" advice to cut prices when productivity gains exceed the national trend.

What's happened to profits to cause the CEA to reach this conclusion? The President told Congress that corporate profits rose from a rate of $38.5 billion in early 1961 to roughly $55 billion at the end of 1963. And, he said, this is "notable" for a number of reasons: the 14 percent annual rate of increase "is high by previous standards"; the rise is prolonged in that at the same stage in previous expansions of the economy profits had declined from their peaks; the rise in profits occurred while new depreciation rules transferred $2.5 billion from taxable profits into non-taxable depreciation.

The extremely sharp rise in profits spilled over directly into dividends paid to shareholders. In 1961 dividend payments, according to the CEA, totaled $15.3 billion; by the end of 1963 the total has soared to a yearly rate of $18.8 billion.

The Wall Street Journal reported recently that dividend payments in December 1963 were 50 percent above payments in the same month five years ago and that dividends for all of 1963 set a new record.

There is wide consensus that the current profitability of American business and industry stems from the sustained and increasingly high rate of productivity, a rate that has outstripped gains to either the worker or the consumer.

The CEA notes accurately "there is no justification, on either economic or equity grounds, for distributing above-average gains in productivity exclusively through the profits channel. The real way out of this dilemma is for the firms involved to remove its cause by reducing prices."

We maintain that the worker's equity in increased productivity cannot be ignored and that along with price reductions for the consumer there must be substantial wage increases for the worker.

'Let's Start Building'

Ex-Gov. Collins Says:

The South Has Let Extremists 'Incite Sick Souls to Violence'

The following is excerpted from an address by Leroy Collins, former governor of Florida and now president of the National Association of Broadcasters, to the Greater Columbia Chamber of Commerce in South Carolina:

I DO NOT BELIEVE anyone is more genuinely proud of his southern birth and "raising" than I am. I love this land. Some thoughts have been brooding in my mind lately and I think South Carolina is a good place for me to talk these out.

I have not come to address old grievances. It is the future of the South and of our nation I wish to take up with you.

I would hope first that we might consider as our own the creed of Pres. Lyndon Johnson who, once exasperated by his critics in the Senate when he was the leader of that forum, sought to explain himself in these terms: "I am a free man, an American, a United States Senator and a Democrat, in that order."

I do not like it when people speak of southerners as if they are not human parts of the United States. But the prime reason they do this is that for too long we have permitted the South's own worst enemies to speak for it.

We have allowed the extremists to speak for the South—the very ones against whom we in the South have had to struggle in our towns and in our state capitals for much of the progress we have made.

They have done it in speeches on the floor of Congress which have sounded like anti-American diatribes from some hostile foreign country.

They have done it in the national press and on the national radio and television to such an extent that citizens outside the South would be entitled to wonder if they might not need visas to pass through our region.

And all the while, too many of the rest of us have remained cravenly silent or lamely defensive while Dixie battle cries have been employed to incite sick souls to violence—egged on by the rabblerousers' call to "stand up and fight!"

And I ask you tonight, how long are the majority of southerners going to allow themselves to be caricatured before the nation by these Claghorns? How many Sunday School children have to be dynamited to death? How many Negro leaders have to be shot in the back? How many governors have to be shot in the chest? How many Presidents have to be assassinated?

All these evil happenings have been the products of environments where hatred has been preached and lawlessness extolled—environments which you and I know are foreign to the South.

It is time the decent people in the South, with all their might and strength, told the bloody shirt-wavers to climb down off the buckboards of bigotry. It is time we started speaking and acting together more like loyal Americans and self-respecting southerners.

Yet, too many politicians down our way have been hoodwinking the people on the civil rights issue. They have been trying to pretend, for their own personal political advantage, that the changes which are coming over the hill really are not there. They talk defensively of "states' rights" when they and we well know that there can be no such thing as a state's right to default on a national duty.

Any rational man who looks at the horizon and sees the South of the future segregated is simply seeing a mirage.

"THAT ALL MEN are created equal" is not an empty cliche. It was not put in our Declaration of Independence by Jefferson merely to stir our revolutionary forces to greater sacrifice.

It is a mighty idea that is the keystone of our nation's whole meaning and perpetual commitment. It is the basic idea which supports the dignity of man as an individual.

It is an idea that can never be stopped—not by custom—not by prejudice—not by hate—not by murder—not by armies—not by any mortal force.

It may be thwarted—it may be delayed—its triumph may be at great cost of sacrifice—but it will keep coming on and on, for it has the invincibility of simple truth, justice and right.

I feel that we should mount in this country a massive plan under which the nation would assure to every child an education adequate to the full development of his talents. This would call for the supplementing of local resources in proportion to need. It could enable us to close our educational gap.

This is not only a national need: I say it is a necessity. We must do this to enable the nation better to meet its adversaries in a hostile and competitive world. But, more importantly, we must do it to provide for American children a seed bed of simple justice which is now their rightful heritage, although for millions it has not been their inheritance.

Morgan Says:

Civilized Methods of Reform Help Salvage Wayward Boys

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

NEW YORK—Several years ago I drove over from New York City to Charles A. Lindbergh's former estate outside Hopewell, N. J., to observe an unusual experiment in the rehabilitation of young boys who had managed to get themselves fouled up with the law.

Morgan

The rambling hilltop mansion from which the Lindbergh baby was kidnaped had been converted into a home for 16- and 17-year-olds. There at Highfields, as the 390-acre estate is called, they lived and worked and untangled their problems in an atmosphere about as far removed from that of the old-fashioned reform school as you could possibly imagine.

The doors were not locked. There were no bars on the windows. The boys could read whatever newspapers, magazines and books, including comic books, they wished, listen to any radio program they fancied (though television was barred as too much of a distraction) and there was no censorship on their mail, either incoming or outgoing.

They worked 40 hours a week, either at farm chores on the place or jobs at a nearby state neuropsychiatric institute, and they were paid 50 cents a day.

They could leave Highfields for important family events, like a wedding, spend the daytime visiting with their families on national holidays and, by meeting certain requirements, win a three-day weekend furlough. On such missions a boy was on his own responsibility without official overseeing of any kind.

Once, soon after Highfields opened in 1950, two new arrivals simply couldn't stand it. They took their freedom as a threat or a gag and they fled, realizing too late, after they had been picked up and sent elsewhere, that the non-institutional atmosphere of Highfields was a basic quality.

As an uninitiated visitor I learned my own lesson quickly. After dinner every night, except Saturdays and Sundays, they held "guided group interaction sessions," as they were called, with 10 boys in each. We had been given permission to tape record these gatherings and I suggested to the director, a genial man named Albert Elias, it might be better to conceal the microphone so the boys wouldn't be discouraged from pursuing their ordinarily highly candid discussions. Almost sharply he said that was impossible because it would be cheating the boys even if they didn't find out what had been done.

Trust, he said, was a vital ingredient at Highfields. So he told them frankly what was happening, explained nobody would be identified in the subsequent broadcast, and said anybody could skip this session if he objected. Nobody left, the boys soon forgot the presence of the mike and the result was a moving oral document, a bull session in which the boys hashed out their problems among themselves and freely criticized each other, with Elias holding his psychological guidance almost imperceptibly in the background.

I HAVE OFTEN wondered how the experiment progressed and the other day I came across a book entitled "Youthful Offenders at Highfields" which gave an interesting answer. In it an authority on juvenile delinquency named H. Ashley Weeks and other sociologists gave a qualified but encouragingly positive evaluation.

One of the distinctions of the Highfields pattern is that no offender is kept there longer than four months. Several judges felt that a formal institution was no place to send first offenders even though they had some background of misbehavior. Perhaps the main purpose of Highfields was to salvage a boy as a citizen before he became a hardened delinquent. This was the concept of two remarkable men, F. Lovell Bixby and Lloyd W. McCorkle, who hatched the idea of Highfields after they had watched encouraging results of group therapy on military prisoners in World War II.

While emphasizing that Highfields does not provide every answer to the so-called delinquency problem, Weeks' book gives it high marks. He discovered, for example, that 63 in every 100 Highfields boys complete their treatment and get into no further mischief serious enough to send them back to an institution. Furthermore, 77 percent of those who did finish have been successful, so far, in rejoining society.

Indeed I learned from Elias, who recently became superintendent of New Jersey's entire reformatory system, that that is only part of the story. Encouraged by Highfields' record, the legislature has had three similar plants built, including one for girls. A fourth, financed by $200,000 from the Ford Foundation, operates in downtown Newark with the boys going home at night.

Instead of self-righteously wondering what the younger generation is coming to, some members of the older generation seem to be coming to their senses with non-vindictive, civilized approaches to the juvenile problem.

Washington Reports:

McCormack Voices Confidence House Can Pass Medicare Bill

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE John McCormack (D-Mass.) asserted he has every confidence that if a bill for social security hospital insurance for the aged comes out of the Ways & Means Committee, "we have the votes in the House to pass it."

The speaker made the statement in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

Sen. Everett Dirksen (R-Ill.), Senate minority leader, said on the same program that he expected the $11 billion tax cut bill to be on the President's desk "sometime around the first of March." He said that as a member of the Finance Committee, where the bill now rests, he had discussed the prospects with Pres. Johnson.

McCormack also said he was hopeful that "an effective" civil rights measure will be enacted into law. He called attention to the fact that there are two sessions of each Congress, and that what was not accomplished in the agenda last year may be acted upon this year. He considered that the Congress had been most successful in its first session in 1963.

The second session has begun well, he said, with five authorization bills acted upon after "coming up from the Executive Dept. earlier than they have ever come up before." That is "very important" in connection with adjournment later this year, he added.

Dirksen, on the other hand, said: "Unless all signs fail, I think we will be coming back" [after the conventions].

He said he was confident that the tax bill would be made retroactive to the first of the year, and that the Treasury Dept. can work out the immediate reduction of the withholding tax to 14 percent as asked by Johnson.

McCORMACK SAID he was "very strong" for the pending Youth Employment bill, passed by the Senate but currently held up in the House Rules Committee.

"We will need 30 to 40 Republican votes in the House to put that bill through," he added. "Unfortunately, there aren't that many Republican votes for it at the present time.

"The great majority of the Republican members of Congress are just blindly opposed to everything. They have a duty and responsibility, under our constitutional government, to be a constructive party. Further, each elected member owes an obligation to his people to vote in their best interests."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

SLOWLY BUT WITH SURE STEPS the federal courts are moving to implement and spell out the full significance of the Supreme Court's 1962 decision that judges have a right to hear complaints by taxpayers against inequitable state legislative and congressional districts—the districts that give disproportionate power to rural voters and deprive urban-area citizens of equal representation. In a parallel development, voters are refusing to ratify proposed redistricting plans, submitted by legislatures, that seem to fall short of equity.

A Maryland plan for redistricting seats in the U.S. House of Representatives was rejected by voters in a referendum before the 1962 election. Another plan offered by the 1963 legislature is now under attack.

A three-judge federal court in Oklahoma rejected a proposed state legislative reapportionment plan previously approved by the state supreme court. The federal court ruled last July that both houses of the legislature must be districted according to population and held that a state constitutional provision limiting populous counties to a maximum of seven representatives was null and void. In its latest decision the federal court reaffirmed this order.

A three-judge federal court in Pennsylvania now has under consideration an attack by five AFL-CIO officials on a state legislative apportionment plan pushed through a special session under the leadership of the state's Republican Gov. William W. Scranton. The new law creates districts "irrationally," the suit says, and is also invalid because it lumps together people in large districts and provides for election of a multiple number of representatives.

The U.S. Supreme Court itself has heard arguments in a large group of key cases involving, in one way or another, the basic issues of whether the states can legally deprive citizens in populous areas of substantially equal representation in state legislatures and in the House of Representatives.

The court's decisions in these cases are expected during the current session—perhaps soon after the four-week recess the justices have set aside for consideration of pending matters.

ONE OF THE PROBLEMS for Republicans in Congress is what kind of party record they will write as a background for the presidential election.

Some Democratic members observe that in 1963 GOP representatives "seemed to be oriented toward a Goldwater-like congressional record," which would be an entirely appropriate record for the senator in case he should be nominated. But what if he is not?

When Pres. Truman was running for election in 1948 he deliberately campaigned against the record of the "no-good, do-nothing Republican 80th Congress." (The record was not quite as bad as all that; the 80th Congress gave Mr. Truman full support in foreign policy issues, including the Greek-Turkish intervention and the launching of the Marshall Plan.) But in the area of domestic policy Republicans had a totally conservative record that embarrassed and restricted Gov. Dewey's efforts to portray himself as a modern and moderately liberal GOP leader.

The voting record of the Republicans in this session of Congress will be a fact of life for the presidential nominee, whoever he may be. He cannot promise progress in the civil rights field if a majority of his party members in House and Senate have shown themselves disinterested or opposed. He cannot pledge leadership in the fields of education and health care, housing and the "war on poverty," if GOP congressional leaders have cut the ground from under him by their legislative tactics and votes.

For example, all 10 members of the House Ways & Means Committee are opposed to the King-Anderson bill to provide social security hospital care for aged people. Just two of those 10 GOP representatives would be sufficient to vote the bill out for a House floor test, where it would certainly pass. What is the Republican candidate going to say next fall about the high cost of health care for older people and what the government should do about it?

THE TAX CUT BILL will be on the President's desk by March, according to Sen. Everett Dirksen (R-Ill.), Senate minority leader, left, and hospital insurance for the aged can be approved by the House this year, according to Speaker of the House John McCormack (D-Mass.). They made the statements on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

Here's a Profitable New Game—Comparison Shopping for Food

By Sidney Margolius

THE BUSINESS PAPERS report that playing games in supermarkets has become the big activity right along with collecting trading stamps.

These new games include "Hidden Treasure," "Spell C-A-S-H," "Split the Dollar," "The Price Is Right," and so on. In most, the check-out cashier gives you a card or token. If you get a series of four that make up a word like C-A-S-H or a series of numbers like "1964," you win anywhere from $1 to $100, depending on the game your supermarket features. In some of these games you have to dampen the card to reveal the magic word.

It doesn't cost you anything to play; except, of course, the extra cost of the prizes and the promoters' fees which are added to the price of your food, and added whether you play or not.

But we've got another supermarket game for you to play, and you are guaranteed winnings.

This game is called "Supermarket Comparison Shopping—Find the Best Buys!" It can save you 10 to 20 percent of your food bill. The object is to serve your family nutritious, appetizing meals at a cost of $4 to $6 a week for each pre-school child; $5 to $7 for subteens; $7 to $9 for teen-age girls and $8 to $10 for teen-age boys (depending on age); $6 to $7 for Mother; and $7 to $9 for dear old Dad.

Thus, for a family of four with two school children, you would try to get your weekly food bill as close to $25 a week as possible, and in no case over $32, or you're out of the game. This is just for food for the family, including lunches, but not including special foods and beverages for entertaining, or soaps, paper goods and other non-foods you may buy in a supermarket.

If you average about $1 a day per person for food you are certain to be a winner. Some weeks or months you may go over, but the average is what counts. If you go over one week you have a chance to catch up another week. A family of five should be able to beat the above costs-per-person by 5 percent, and a family of six by 10 percent, the U. S. Agricultural Research Service estimates.

Here is how you play "Supermarket Comparison Shopping."

● Each Thursday or Friday before you go shopping, check the supermarket ads to see what specials they are offering. You then plan your meals for a half-week or even a full week ahead on the basis of these specials. This enables you to take advantage of the more-abundant and thus lower-priced foods.

A Stanford University study found that advertised specials averaged 20 percent less than prices of non-specials. In general, advertised specials may reduce food bills up to 10 percent.

IT HAS BECOME especially important to look for specials nowadays, because the supermarkets themselves are secretly playing a game among themselves. The present tendency of retailers is to avoid a general price decrease when such important foods as beef are in heavy supply, but to offer specials on a few other items.

● Shop with a prepared list of the specials you are seeking. This avoids impulse buying and also gives you more time to dampen the "Spell C-A-S-H" cards.

● Buy in bulk to make even further savings in money and time. A whole ham usually costs less than the two halves. The whole loin of pork often costs 10 percent less than buying chops.

● Buy the raw form and simplest version of foods instead of processed. This gives you a chance to see if you can cook any better than a factory. The potential financial rewards are large—you will be able to provide lean meat for sandwiches at a cost of 60 to 80 cents a pound instead of paying $1 to $1.50 a pound for cold cuts.

Thus, if you save 15 percent of a $30-a-week food bill, you can win $234 a year playing "Supermarket Comparison Shopping!"

From Soup to Nonsense:

This Togetherness Stuff Works So Long as the Husband Yields

By Jane Goodsell

I'VE BEEN THINKING of sending this memorandum to my husband: Darling: I believe I've found a solution to our problem—well, one of our problems, anyway. For years now, you've encouraged me to accompany you on backpack hikes in the wilderness. You've painted marvelous word-pictures of the joys of tramping through evergreen forests, breathing the pine-scented air, gazing at sparkling mountain streams and reveling in the freedom of escape from the complexities of civilization.

On a couple of occasions, you actually talked me into my hiking boots and onto the trail and—let's be honest—those excursions weren't very successful, were they? As you expressed it that day I fell off the log and into the creek, "Here I am with a loaf of bread and two cans of beans, and thou beside me, whimpering in the wilderness."

Remember? After that, both of us agreed that I wasn't cut out for hiking, that I had neither the energy nor the spirit for long walking stints.

Well, we were wrong. It's simply not true that I wilt easily and lack energy. And what's more, I can prove it. On our recent trip to New York, I hiked all the way up Fifth Avenue from 34th Street to the East Sixties. Now, that's quite a hike. I'll bet it outdistances the mileage between Scudder Creek and Green Lakes, and inasmuch as I was walking in high heels, I think that proves I'm not lacking in stamina.

The point is, I'm really a superb hiker and I have unflagging energy. I just prefer to do my walking in town. Why do you insist on dragging me off to the wilderness? Oh, trees are awe-inspiring, I guess, but you must admit that there's a certain sameness about them. I mean, there's so little excitement and suspense. You know what you're going to see next. More trees.

FIFTH AVENUE isn't like that. You never know what you'll see next. And talk about awe-inspiring sights! The bathroom accessories in the windows at Saks left me speechless with wonder. The dolls at F. A. O. Schwarz, the ski clothes at Bergdorf-Goodman, the yoga machine at Hammacher Schlemmer's—well, I've never seen a fir tree that affected me so deeply, that gave me such a feeling of awe.

When I arrived back at the hotel, all pink-cheeked, sparkly-eyed and bubbling with exhilaration, there you were—flaked out in bed, exhausted from the rigors of trying to flag down a taxi on Madison Avenue. Me, I wasn't even tired.

So let's not have any more talk about me being a sissy. Okay? If you want me to join you on a five-mile hike, meet me on the corner of Fifth and 52nd in Manhattan. Then we'll see who's made of sterner stuff.

POLICIES AND PROGRAMS of new Intl. Wage Research Center in Tokyo were discussed at meetings that brought Gen. Sec. Eiichi Ochiai of Shinsanbetsu, Japanese labor federation, to Washington. AFL-CIO Largest Donor:

U.S. Committee Aids Homeless Refugees

ANYONE WHO has been stranded overnight knows how terrible it is to be homeless and a stranger. Intensify this feeling many times and multiply by 13 million persons and you have the extent of the pain faced by the innocent victims of political upheavals. Forced to flee their native lands with nothing except their inner resources, they are denied the security of homes and the dignity of jobs. Without outside help their children face the same bleak future. They will remain citizens of nowhere.

Fortunately the nations of the world do care and do help. Through United Nations' agencies and other national and international, sectarian and non-sectarian groups, the homeless are being resettled, rehabilitated and retrained. In this country, the U.S. Committee for Refugees, a voluntary non-sectarian group, acts as an informal clearing house, publicity arm and referral service for more than 50 refugee relief agencies.

The AFL-CIO is the largest single contributor to the committee with an annual donation of $10,000. Pres. George Meany, one of the committee's founders, is a vice president; Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers and, Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers are members of the board.

Latest figures show that at least 13 million persons are still refugees of one sort or another: victims of war, persecution or natural disasters. The majority are considered "national" refugees—persons who, although uprooted from their homes, are living in countries in which they can claim citizenship.

However, more than 2.5 million remain "stateless" refugees and cannot claim citizenship in the countries to which they have fled. Some, particularly in Europe, are holdovers from the great flood of displaced persons victimized by the Nazis during World War II.

About half have escaped from Communist-controlled countries. The birth of new nations in the Middle East, North Africa and Asia accounts for many. Still others are victims of governmental discrimination on racial, religious or political grounds.

Some of these refugee situations are familiar to Americans: Palestinian Arabs in Jordan, Tibetans in India, Indian refugees in Pakistan, anti-Castro Cubans in Florida.

Others are not so familiar: 200,000 Angolan refugees in the Congo, 30,000 Spanish Republicans in France and 1,800 Russians in Turkey.

WITH POLITICAL UPHEAVAL an everyday occurrence, the refugee situation has become a permanent feature of our civilization. It condemns millions to life in surroundings which look more like a prison than a refuge. Though they are hopeful and healthy at first, the long, dreary struggle for food, shelter and clothing inevitably takes its toll. Skills become rusty, youth dissolves into middle age. The best years of countless lives are spent in needless waiting and new generations grow up knowing no other home than the impersonal temporary barracks of a refugee camp.

Resettlement and rehabilitation is the main concern of the committee, a citizens' group established in 1959. In addition to its services to American agencies, it assists UN refugee agencies by providing them with public information and program assistance in this country. It keeps before members of Congress and appropriate agencies information and recommendations on refugee and immigration legislation and provides testimony for Congress.

The committee and the agencies through which it works try to find jobs for skilled persons and to train the unskilled. UNRWA, one group involved in these projects, is doing outstanding work with Arab refugees. So far it has opened 11 vocational and teaching training centers to educate some of the 30,000 refugee children who reach maturity each year. The centers, with enrollment of 4,400, graduate about 2,000 annually—secretaries, machinists, auto mechanics, nurses and other badly needed workers.

A $500 contribution will support a student during one year of a two-year program. To date the AFL-CIO has established 10 such grants.

More detailed information is available from the U.S. Committee for Refugees, 20 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y. 10018.

Pennsylvania Upset Asked:

Labor Hits Scranton On Redistricting

Scranton, Pa.—The Pennsylvania AFL-CIO has asked a special three-judge U.S. court to declare unconstitutional and invalid the recent reapportionment of the state legislature.

The reapportionment was approved by a special session of the 1963 General Assembly and signed into law by Republican Gov. William W. Scranton, a possible GOP presidential nominee, on Jan. 9, 1964.

The action brought by five state and local officers of AFL-CIO organizations in the state charges that the reapportionment "creates districts which arbitrarily, irrationally and without justification contain widely varying numbers of people."

Harry Boyer, Pennsylvania AFL-CIO president, said the bill redistricting the House of Representatives also provides for multiple representative districts and that the "practice of lumping together a number of representatives in a single large district dilutes and weakens representative, democratic government."

To prevent this weakening of democracy, the unionists asked the court to enjoin the holding of primary and general elections this year under the terms of the reapportionment measures.

Boyer pointed out that the intent of the U.S. Constitution is that "the vote of one citizen cannot and should not have a greater value than the vote of another." Using this standard, he said, the state must be divided into legislative districts on a "one-for-one basis."

The complaint, initially brought before the U.S. District Court here, asked for the appointment of the special three-judge court which was granted.

The five AFL-CIO officials, representing 1.25 million members in the state, are Michael Johnson, executive vice president of the state AFL-CIO; Sec. Harry Block of the state organization; Pres. Henry P. Groton of the Delaware County AFL-CIO; Pres. Eugene J. Considine of the Greater Wilkes-Barre AFL-CIO; and Vice Pres. Frederick B. Highes of the state AFL-CIO.

The state Democratic Party had filed suit earlier to enjoin the legislature from acting on the governor's reapportionment plan, but a special court turned down the request on the grounds that until the legislature acted there was no question before it. The same court is now hearing the case brought by the AFL-CIO officials.

Rehabilitation Group Cites ACWA Leader

New York—The Clothing Workers' pioneering programs to rehabilitate disabled workers and return them to jobs were recognized at a testimonial dinner here honoring ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky.

Comeback, Inc., a rehabilitation organization, sponsored the dinner at which it presented Potofsky with its Citation of the Year award.

Also cited for their work in the field were Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes, ACWA Vice Pres. Louis Hollander, and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO.

Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze, the principal speaker at the dinner, praised the ACWA and the local labor council for the rehabilitation projects they have undertaken with matching grants from HEW's Vocational Rehabilitation Administration.

Celebrezze declared that such government aid is designed "not as a substitute for individual initiative but as a means of giving individual initiative a chance. . . . Men want the opportunity to be useful, contributing members of society. And of all those who want this chance, who among us desire it more than those who are handicapped?"

Potofsky outlined the history of ACWA's health and welfare programs and the rehabilitation project begun in 1961 at the Sidney Hillman Health Center. Its success, he noted, led the city central body to launch its own rehabilitation program last April.

Booklet on Pension Plans Offers Aid to Negotiators

Pension benefits must be "more closely geared" to wages at the time of retirement and be made adjustable to changes in the cost of living after retirement, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in the preface of a new federation booklet, "Pension Plans Under Collective Bargaining."

In addition, he said, organized workers will seek to end the "shortchanging" of widows and to achieve more flexible retirement programs in order to eliminate compulsory retirement at age 65.

The 144-page booklet was prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security. It is intended to guide unions in improving present pension plans and to assist them in bargaining for such programs. It concedes that the problems of pension programming are ever-changing and complex, so that the services of specialists must be used, but asserts also that a union member responsible for bargaining must know what a pension plan can and cannot do, and how much various benefits may cost.

A dictionary of pension terms and a sample pension plan and trust agreement, are included in an appendix of technical assistance.

Copies of the booklet may be had from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 Sixteenth Street, N.W., Washington, D. C. 20006 at $1.75 each; 50 or more $1.50 each and 100 or more, $1.25 each.

DIAMOND LAPEL PIN attesting to 50 years as a Machinist was presented to Pres. J. F. Friedrick of the Milwaukee AFL-CIO by IAM Pres. A. J. Hayes at ceremonies in nearby Cudahy. Shown are (left to right), Pres. Arthur Jenss of the IAM state and district councils, who presented Friedrick with a ring; Ray W. Taylor, toastmaster; Friedrick; Mayor Henry Maier of Milwaukee; Hayes, and Business Mgr. John Heidenreich of IAM Dist. 10.

Johnson Names Editor Head of Women's Group

Pres. Johnson has named Margaret Hickey, public affairs editor of the Ladies Home Journal, as chairman of the recently-formed Citizens' Advisory Council on the Status of Women.

The advisory council is the successor to the President's Commission on the Status of Women, originally headed by the late Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt. Miss Hickey was a member of the commission, as was AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler.

The continuing committee, set up by Pres. Kennedy before his death, will seek to further goals established by the short-term presidential commission. One of the commission's chief accomplishments was activity leading to passage last year of the equal pay for women law, which had long been urged by labor and women's groups.

In addition to her work on the presidential commission, which included chairmanship of two of its committees, Miss Hickey is deputy to the chairman of the American Red Cross and a member of the State Dept.'s advisory committee on voluntary foreign aid.

She is a former president of the National Conference on Social Welfare, an honorary president of the National Federation of Business & Professional Women's Clubs and a leader of that organization's United Nations program.

Firm Required to Yield Job Data on Exclusions

A union's right to information used by an aerospace firm in excluding "administrative" employes from the bargaining unit has been upheld by the National Labor Relations Board.

Auto Workers Local 300, the board held in a 3-0 vote, was entitled to names, job descriptions and wage data used in classifying certain jobs as "administrative" and therefore not covered by the contract with the Curtiss-Wright Corp., Wright Aeronautical Div., at its Wood-Ridge N. J., plant.

Such information, the board said in affiriming Trial Examiner Frederick U. Reel's recommendation, bore a "reasonable relation" to the union's role as bargaining representative. Reel, and the board, applied the same reasoning to information about "confidential" employes and denied the UAW's request.

Reel had found the case turned on a "narrow and novel issue" and handed down an order aimed at the firm's insistence that it did not have a legal duty to furnish the data it finally did supply after the union filed a charge. The firm must furnish information on specific points laid down in the ruling, the examiner and the board held.

The union filed a request for information on the excluded employes in 1962 because of the "erosion" of its unit. According to union estimates, not challenged on the NLRB record, it had 4,500 persons in the bargaining unit in 1957 as against 2,100 in the excluded group. Five years later, it said, the percentages had shifted until the exclusions were larger than the number of workers in the unit.

Management's claim was that the union had no legal right to the information on workers outside the "blue collar" unit.

N. J. Labor Backs Proposed Airport

Newark, N. J.—"Wholehearted endorsement" of Gov. Richard J. Hughes' request that the Port of New York Authority evaluate sites in Northern New Jersey as the location for a new major airport has been expressed by Pres. Vincent J. Murphy of the State AFL-CIO.

A new airport is needed, he maintained, because adequate transportation facilities are essential for the growth of New Jersey and the metropolitan area. Construction and operation of the airport," he added, "would mean more than 134,00 new jobs" with a payroll exceeding $700 million annually.

IAM Hails Friedrick on Anniversary

Milwaukee, Wis.—Pres. J. F. Friedrick of the Milwaukee AFL-CIO was presented with a gold card signifying his 50 years of membership in the Machinists by IAM Pres. A. J. Hayes, who also read a letter how AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany hailing Friedrick as one of the country's outstanding trade unionists.

The presentation was made at a joint installation meeting for IAM lodges in the Milwaukee area. Hayes also presented Friedrick with a diamond lapel pin and an official certificate of recognition. Arthur Jenss, president of the IAM state and district councils and of Lodge 66, gave him an engraved ring on behalf of local IAM groups.

Hayes called him one of the men "who served as my tutor and inspiration" in his early days. Hayes began his career as an apprentice machinist on the Milwaukee Railroad.

In acknowledging the tributes Friedrick recalled some of his early experiences in organizing and servicing local unions. He said his greatest thrill was successfully negotiating a contract cutting the workweek in the shop in which he worked from 55 hours to 44 hours.

Mayor Henry W. Maier of Milwaukee praised Friedrick and Hayes as "two local boys who made good."

Toastmaster Ray W. Taylor, editor of the Milwaukee Labor Press, pointed out that as president of the University of Wisconsin board of regents Friedrick holds a post rarely attained by a union leader.

Musicians Press Fight For 'Live' TV Talent

The Musicians have made a new request to the Federal Communications Commission to deny a license renewal to a New Orleans television station which, the union said, has not met a commitment to provide an outlet for local talent.

Last year, after a similar protest from the Musicians, the FCC gave Station WWL-TV a short-term extension of its license—to Dec. 1, 1963—coupled with a warning that it had found "a substantial variance" between the station's promises and performance with respect to "live" programs.

Since then, the AFM petition contended, the station has "done nothing to improve its local live programming, to ascertain the needs of the New Orleans community, or to encourage and utilize local live musicial talent."

The union asked the FCC to schedule a hearing on the license renewal application of the station, which is operated by Loyola University.

An FCC spokesman said the government agency has not yet acted on the license renewal issue despite the Dec. 1 expiration date. The station is permitted to continue operations pending formal action.

AFM Pres. Herman Kenin has described the union's opposition to the license renewal as part of an effort "to close the shocking gap between promise and performance" by TV stations.

When the license for WWL-TV was first granted in 1957, Kenin noted, the AFM's New Orleans local actively supported the Loyola University application on the basis of promises for extensive use of local live talent and live music. The original program proposals to the FCC listed 38 live local programs, of which 13 would use local live music, the union noted.

During the past year, the AFM petition stated, the station employed only a single staff musician, a pianist whose primary duties were "to act as a master of ceremonies and who occasionally touched a piano keyboard."

Senior Citizens Ask Medicare Passage

'This Is the Year,' Elders Declare At Hearing on King-Anderson Bill

By David L. Perlman

The silent witnesses spoke most eloquently during the final week of hearings by the House Ways & Means Committee on social security hospital care for the aged.

Neatly-dressed men and women, with the lined faces and hands permanently calloused by a lifetime of hard work, sat patiently through long hours of testimony by public officials, experts in the health and social service fields, union leaders and their own senior citizen spokesmen.

Sometimes there weren't enough seats—more than 1,000 retirees made the trip to Washington—so they stood, straining from the back and sides of the room to catch the words of the witnesses, to hear the soft, encouraging questions from committee supporters of the King-Anderson bill and the blunt interrogation of opponents.

There were vigorous retired workers, members of unions and senior citizen clubs in cities from Boston to Los Angeles. And there were men and women in their 80's, frail, bowed in body, but proud in spirit. Some carried with them receipted hospital and doctor bills to show to any congressman willing to listen.

An occasional polite tap of the gavel by Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) stilled the murmurs of agreement with one of their spokesmen—or the buzz of disagreement when a representative of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce or American Medical Association told the committee that there was no serious hospital care problem and, besides, social security taxes are already too high.

If the rules of congressional decorum checked applause, they didn't stop heads from nodding in vigorous approval when George Orth, president of the Senior Citizens Council of the Trainmen's lodge on the Long Island Railroad, declared "the older people of America are losing their patience."

Looking at the committee members, searching for the additional votes necessary to send the medicare bill to the House floor, Orth concluded:

'This Is The Year'

"I hope this is the year Congress will act. I hope we do not have to come back to you next year to tell you again what you already know—that a program of health care for the older people of America is urgently needed."

He was followed as a witness by a young working housewife from Mt. Vernon, N. Y., Mrs. Alfred Connable, who told why she had joined the busloads of oldsters who came to Washington.

Answering a persistent trio of committee Republicans — Representatives Thomas B. Curtis (Mo.), Bruce Alger (Tex.), and Steven B. Derounian (N. Y.)—who had repeatedly expressed distaste for the thought that persons already retired would be given hospital care which would be paid for by higher payroll taxes on younger workers and their employers—Mrs. Connable declared:

"I would be glad to pay a dollar or two a month so that my parents would be protected now and I would be protected later."

If severe illness struck her parents, she pointed out, her younger generation would be forced into debt to pay the bills—and the third generation of children would be deprived as well.

"My generation is paying a large part of its income for the defense of our democracy," she told the committee. "Is it asking too much that this democracy have a heart? There will be much more to be proud of when we can say that Americans grow old in dignity—without charity, without burdening their children, but with confidence and self-respect."

From All Parts of U.S.

And so it went, as new busloads arrived to replace those who left. There were retired Auto Workers from nearby Baltimore, delegates sent by the 3,500-member Golden Age Council of Greater Boston, groups from New Jersey, Ohio and Michigan.

They clustered about New York's Mayor Robert F. Wagner and Governors John W. Reynolds of Wisconsin, Endicott Peabody of Massachusetts and William W. Barron of West Virginia. These and other public officials told the committee that the Kerr-Miller Act health grant program can't, by itself, provide medical security with dignity for older Americans.

New York State AFL-CIO Pres. Raymond R. Corbett testified to the inadequacy and high cost of private insurance available to elderly people in his state. And Sec.-Treas. Joseph C. Bober of the Connecticut State Labor Council had evidence that the same was true in the Nutmeg State.

Dr. Kenneth W. Clement of Cleveland, president of the National Medical Association which speaks for 5,300 Negro physicians, and Dr. Benjamin Spock, world-famous child care expert, were among a number of doctors who told the committee they dissent vigorously from the AMA's opposition to medicare.

Clement said the King-Anderson bill would mean better medical care and contains "adequate safeguards" for patient-doctor relationships and private control of hospital care.

Dr. Spock Testifies

"I know from my own practice," Spock said, of the sacrifices that children with families of their own make to pay the hospital bills of aged parents.

The King-Anderson bill "will help physicians," he said. "I certainly believe it should be passed."

Not all witnesses favored the King-Anderson bill. One, Joe Belden of Dallas, who told the committee he was appearing as an "expert witness" at the request of the Texas Medical Association, told how he had demonstrated through an "extensive study" that only 8,000 of the 745,000 Texans aged 65 or older needed or wanted financial help for medical care.

He struck from the list 221,000 persons who were already receiving old age assistance, an additional 283,000 who had some form of health insurance policy—regardless of its adequacy. He then knocked out 37,000 other persons with "sufficient savings" to meet their medical needs, 23,000 with "sufficient incomes," which he defined as "incomes no lower than the average for the entire population of Texas."

That still left 181,000, but of those 52,000 receive some financial help from their families and were thereby disqualified, he said; 37,000 have children who would be willing to help out financially if necessary and 45,000 have children who are doing well enough financially, according to Belden, so that they could help out.

There are 24,000 of the aged, he added, who say they think they should take care of their own needs. Another 15,000 had less than $100 in medical expenses in the year of the survey, leaving—according to Belden—only 8,000 aged people in Texas "who needed or wanted help."

SENIOR CITIZENS, "silent witnesses" for the King-Anderson bill, await the start of hearings before the House Ways & Means Committee. More than 1,000 retired men and women came to listen and testify during the week of hearings on social security hospital care.

Republicans Introduce New Health Care Bill

Six Republican senators have joined in introducing a health care for the aged bill which they say "accommodates the views of those who advocate a plan under the social security system and of those who want to make use of the private insurance system."

Sen. Jacob K. Javits (N. Y.), the chief sponsor, said the bill is based on recommendation made by the bipartisan National Committee on Health Care of the Aged after a year-long study.

The first part of the measure closely resembles the Administration's King-Anderson bill. It would use social security financing to provide 45 days of hospital care, up to 180 days of nursing home care, or 200 days of post-hospital home care, without deductibles.

The AFL-CIO is supporting the King-Anderson bill.

Javits' bill would also create a federally-chartered association of private insurance and group service companies which would offer a standard supplementary policy with medical and surgical benefits. Javits estimated the cost at about $2 a week per person.

In a speech on the Senate floor and in testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee, Javits said that "private insurance alone cannot do the job of providing protection" at a cost most older people can afford.

If social security covers hospital bills, Javits said, private policies can offer additional benefits at a moderate cost. This principle, he asserted, would also be a "built-in limit" on future expansion of the government health care program.

Co-sponsoring the bill were Senators Clifford P. Case (N. J.), John Sherman Cooper (Ky.), Kenneth B. Keating (N. Y.), Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.) and Margaret Chase Smith (Me.).

Role in Bargaining Asked of Congress

Hartford, Conn.—Congressional involvement in collective bargaining of major disputes—at least on a watchdog basis—was urged here by Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen.

Addressing the Economic Club at Trinity College, Gilbert expressed fear that the compulsory arbitration law passed by Congress in the railroad work rules dispute "may be the beginning of government-controlled labor relations." He called for more congressional interest in the bargaining process.

Rail management, he said, "openly lobbied for compulsory arbitration after successfully thwarting all avenues of settlement in collective bargaining."

'Legislative Inoculation':

ican Medical Association's opposition to social security hospital care.

In the first phase of the hearings, last November, three Cabinet members strongly endorsed the King-Anderson bill—HEW Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman.

Meany, in spelling out the case for medicare, noted that previous hearings and studies have established beyond dispute the "scope of the problem," even for those who at first "honestly disagreed" that there was need for federal action.

No Longer a 'Real Dispute'

There is no longer "real dispute," he said, that "the aged get sicker oftener, and for longer periods of time; that they require much more institutional care; and that they have much less money to meet the costs of illness."

Both public welfare—through the Kerr-Mills Act—and private insurance—through highly-touted senior citizen policies — have been tried and found wanting, the AFL-CIO president said.

Premium costs have shot up in many of the so-called State 65 (pooled risk) plans offered in some areas, he noted, and fewer than 8 percent of the senior age group in Connecticut, Massachusetts and New York have enrolled in the program.

The "record proves," Meany said, that "private insurance can not do the whole job." Both it and Kerr-Mills, he declared, have failed to help the pensioner "whose income is enough to sustain him under ordinary conditions, but who can neither afford to pay for a severe illness, nor afford to pay for a private insurance policy that will give him a realistic degree of protection."

A single severe illness, he noted, can destroy "overnight" an elderly couple's "pride and independence."

Spells Out Position

The Kerr-Mills program, which labor has tried to implement in the states, could be "transformed into a very effective piece of social legislation" by passage of the King-Anderson bill, Meany declared.

"Our attitude toward Kerr-Mills is very much like our attitude toward private health insurance," he said. "Both are welcome; both are needed; both will function effectively in conjunction with the kind of basic protection the King bill would provide."

Meany noted caustically that in regards to the social security plan, "the American Medical Association, the insurance industry and certain candidates for public office have all complained about this terrible tax burden we [are] trying to saddle on wage-earners . . . Almost everyone seems to be worried but the workers themselves."

This, said Meany, is because "workers have somehow mastered an economic point that has escaped a good many others, including some with higher educational status. They know that old-age security—whether in pensions or health care—has to be paid for. And they are convinced that the best way to do it is in a working lifetime of small installments."

Workers want "more benefits" and they are willing to pay for them through a one-quarter of 1 percent rise in the social security tax and an increase in the taxable wage base from $4,800 to $5,200, he told the committee.

He said recommendations by a bipartisan National Committee on Health Care of the Aged, which recommended both a basic social security hospital plan and a supplemental low-cost medical-surgical policy available through a federally-chartered association of private insurance firms, deserve "serious consideration" by Congress. The committee—headed by former Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Arthur S. Flemming, a Republican—"may be too optimistic in estimating what private insurance can do," he said. But, he added, the commitee's report is "clear and categorical on what private insurance cannot do. On this we are in full accord."

Sees Spur to Insurance

Meany pointed out that "the social security system was the best thing that ever happened to the private insurance industry, though they fought it bitterly." He suggested that "hospital care for the aged, as an extension of social security, may prove even more rewarding" by spurring sales of supplementary policies.

"We have repeatedly experienced this ironical turn of events since 1933—that those who most stubbornly oppose social progress wind up by making money from it," he noted.

Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. reminded the committee that "5 million persons 65 and over have died during the six-year period" in which medicare legislation has been before Congress.

Carey, who is president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and an AFL-CIO vice president, stressed that the nation had chosen social insurance over "public relief and charity" with the passage of the Social Security Act in 1935. He described the social security system as "the first and most solid line of defense against poverty."

PROMPT PASSAGE of social security hospital care for the aged was urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee. Meany is flanked by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, left, and Social Security Dir. Nelson Cruikshank, right.

Senior Citizens Demand Health Insurance Probe

The National Council of Senior Citizens has urged Congress to investigate what it calls "unwarranted and exorbitant" increases in rates charged persons over 65 for private health insurance.

John W. Edelman, acting president of the NCSC, cited an announcement by Continental Casualty Co. that as of Jan. 28 it will impose a $4.50 rate hike, bringing to $22.50 the combined monthly cost of three coverages it offers persons over 65. Edelman noted that these rates are not subject to federal or state review.

He also reported that the state of Connecticut had recently approved a 10 percent rate increase, cutting in half a request for 20 percent, by Connecticut 65, a program operated by a pool of private companies within the state.

The council official said Congress also should study "highly exaggerated claims" by the Health Insurance Association of America as to the number of older persons "allegedly 'protected' by private insurance."

More than 8 million of the 17.5 million Americans 65 or older have no health insurance whatsoever, Edelman said, and 8.5 million more have insurance coverage "so inadequate that by no stretch of the facts or of the imagination can it be described as 'protection.'"

Coverage Limited

He pointed out that most aged persons with any coverage have policies that pay $5 to $10 a day toward hospital service charges whereas the average cost per day is $36.

"Would you be 'protected,'" he asked, "if you owned a $40,000 home which burned to the ground and the insurance company paid you only $10,000?"

Edelman recalled that many insurance companies predicted a sharp drop in life insurance sales following enactment of social security retirement legislation in 1935.

'Dead Wrong'

"They were dead wrong, and life insurance sales have soared to unbelievable heights," he said. "A similar opportunity awaits the organized health insurance industry when it drops its opposition to 'medicare' and seeks efficient ways of insuring older people for those health care needs which will not be met under the King-Anderson bill." The bill would use the social security system as the vehicle for old-age hospital insurance.

The NCSC, organized in 1961, now includes more than 1,700 affiliated clubs of older people with a combined membership of nearly 2 million.

3 Insurance Firms Back Medicare Bill

Two insurance executives broke with the industry pattern of opposition to social security hospital care and told the House Ways & Means Committee the King-Anderson bill would be good for the insurance firms as well as the senior citizens.

Pres. Murray D. Lincoln of Nationwide Insurance Companies said financing of basic hospital costs through social security would enable private firms to offer and sell "attractive supplementary plans."

Frank Blackford, vice president of the Life Investment Management Co. of Miami, Fla., said the industry could do "a better job" by supplementing social security. Earlier the Standard Security Life Insurance Co. had announced its support of the social security hospital care program.

New Jersey Labor Seeks $2 Minimum

Newark, N. J.—A $2 state minimum wage and doubletime pay for overtime after 35 hours a week highlights the 1964 legislative program of the New Jersey AFL-CIO as announced by Pres. Vincent J. Murphy.

The provisions, he said, are intended to "discourage overtime payments by employers" who instead "should hire additional workers to help cure New Jersey's high rate of unemployment."

New Jersey now has no state minimum wage act and no laws concerning the number of hours worked or overtime wage rates—a situation Murphy described as "a disgrace to . . . a leading industrial state."

"Too many employers are exploiting their employes," he said, "by paying them $1 an hour and less. It is high time the legislature took official notice of the ridiculously low wages many employer pay and pass corrective legislation."

The program also calls for:

- Revision of the workmen's compensation law to set the weekly maximum benefit at two-thirds of the average wage of covered employes.
- Extension of unemployment compensation and temporary disability benefits to 39 weeks, and extension of coverage to all workers.
- A ban on extension of temporary injunctions in labor disputes unless all parties agree.
- Imposition of penalties upon an employer who fails to pay wages or fringe benefits he has agreed to pay.
- Inclusion of gratuities as remuneration under unemployment compensation and temporary disability benefits.

Letter Carriers Dedicate Apartments for Retirees

East Lake Wales, Fla.—The Letter Carriers dedicated their 500-apartment village here—NALCREST—as a place where retired union members can live in comfort on moderate pensions.

Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, who represented the AFL-CIO at the dedication ceremonies, congratulated the union on being among the first to utilize the labor-backed Senior Citizens Housing Act, passed in 1962. Low-cost, long-term federal loans were made available under the act for construction of rental or cooperative housing for persons over 62.

The apartment village, especially designed with the health and safety needs of the elderly in mind, borders on a large, fish-stocked lake. Rentals range from $69.50 a month for efficiencies to $84.50 for two bedrooms.

Schnitzler noted that as the dedication ceremony was taking place, hearings were under way in Washington on hospital care for the aged. He pointed out that the means test imposed by the Kerr-Mills Act program in Florida would disqualify most pensioners, since it would bar assistance to those with incomes of more than $1,200 a year.

The King-Anderson bill, he stressed, would make this care available "to all on the basis of their right—not when they have become pauperized."

UPWA Aide Named By Illinois Governor

Chicago—Addie Wyatt, program coordinator for Packinghouse Workers Dist. 1, has been named by Gov. Otto Kerner to the Illinois Commission on the Status of Women. She is the only labor representative on the 18-member group.

Mrs. Wyatt previously served as a member of the committee on protective legislation of Pres. Kennedy's Commission on the Status of Women. The Illinois group will consider programs to help women as wives, mothers and workers, as citizen volunteers, and in education.

Kennedy Speech Film In Growing Demand

Fifty-two copies of the new AFL-CIO Film, "John F. Kennedy's Last Words to Labor," have been purchased by union groups since the Jan. 1 release date, the Dept. of Education reported.

The 29-minute film preserving the late President's speech to the AFL-CIO's New York convention last Nov. 15 may be purchased for $35 or rented for $3 a showing. A promotional leaflet now being distributed among central bodies and their affiliates cites the value of the film for extensive use in the community.

Price of the film reflects the actual cost of production and a discussion guide accompanies each print. The film currently is being featured at the 1964 series of COPE conferences.

Inquiries should be directed to the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington 6, D. C.

Labor Opposed:

Higher Prices Seen In Stabilization Bill

A Quality Stabilization bill now pending in Congress would mean "higher prices for the consumer" and would not help small business, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared.

Testifying before a Senate Commerce subcommittee, Biemiller said labor considers the measure a "price-fixing" device "which has nothing to do with either quality or honest stabilization of prices."

The Administration-opposed bill, already approved by the House Commerce Committee, would permit manufacturers of brand-name products to fix and enforce the retail selling price of their products.

"Good products, which consumers want, do not need artificial price supports," Biemiller declared. "Under free competition in a healthy economy, a genuinely good product will command a sufficient volume of sales at a price adequate to insure its production."

Another labor witness, Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., cited surveys showing that consumers in states with so-called "fair trade" price-fixing laws pay from 19 to 27 percent more for brand name merchandise than buyers in states without such laws.

Flouting of Law

He predicted that attempts to enforce a national price-fixing law would lead to the establishment of the "price-easy," comparable to the speakeasy of the prohibition era.

Biemiller rejected an argument used by some supporters of the bill that its objectives are comparable to those of federal labor legislation and that it would give businessmen protection similar to that accorded wage-earners.

"If the principles of quality stabilization were applied," he told the subcommittee, "labor unions would no longer have to engage in collective bargaining at all—employers would simply be ordered by the courts to pay whatever was demanded by labor and would cease to have any voice in the wage bargain.

"Nor is the Fair Labor Standards Act, which establishes legal minimum wages for labor, in any way comparable to the quality stabilization proposal. The amount of the minimum wage is set in the law and is thus determined, not by labor unions, but by the public.

"For a minimum wage law to be comparable, you would have to allow labor unions simply to announce what minimum wage ought to be paid—we are now advocating $2 an hour—and immediately make that price binding through the courts on all employers."

Instead of helping small business, Biemiller charged, the proposed legislation would deliver small business "lock, stock and barrel into the hands of the manufacturers." The retailer, he noted, would be unable to compensate for some special disadvantage, such as poor location or lack of credit facilities, by lower prices. Nor could he sponsor temporary sales to move slow-selling inventories.

At the same time, the AFL-CIO spokesman said, chain stores and mail order establishments would be able to undersell the small merchant through private labels on identical merchandise made by the same manufacturer.

Labor does not agree that the quality stabilization bill "would in any way improve the serious unemployment problem facing the nation," Biemiller said. In fact, he added, "by encouraging artificially high prices, the bill might very well result in fewer purchases by consumers, lower levels of production" and a consequent loss of jobs.

He suggested that Congress explore "less dangerous and dubious routes to the preservation of small business." These, he said, could include strengthening the power of the Federal Trade Commission to deal with "genuinely predatory price-cutting." Others might deal with tax benefits, loan programs and encouragement of pooled purchasing arrangements.

Public Schools Enroll 40.2 Million in Fall of '63

The public elementary and secondary schools enrolled a record 40.2 million pupils in the fall of 1963, the U.S. Office of Education reported on the basis of the annual survey it conducts in cooperation with state departments of instruction.

The total is 1.5 million above the 1962 figure. In addition, an estimated 6.7 million pupils were enrolled in non-public schools.

Enrollment is increasing more rapidly in high schools than in elementary schools, the survey showed. The 25.8 million elementary school children represent a 2.2 percent increase, while secondary school enrollments increased by 6.8 percent to 14.4 million. The Office of Education attributed the latter growth to the fact that the larger number of postwar babies have finished grade school and are now of high school age.

The study also showed:

- More than 10 percent of the nation's 31,700 school districts—3,900—operate no schools but pay tuition for pupils who attend schools in adjacent districts.
- About 1,576,000 teachers held full or part-time posts, an increase of 69,000 or 4.5 percent. Of these 908,500 were in grade schools and 667,500 in secondary schools.
- About 83,000 teachers—5.3 percent of the total—failed to meet full state certification standards. The Office of Education pointed out that each state sets its own standards and that most permit the employment of teachers with substandard credentials.
- Public high schools graduated 1,711,000 pupils in 1962-3—71 percent of those who entered the 9th grade four years earlier.

Harvard to Compile History of Plumbers

The Plumbers & Pipe Fitters have commissioned Harvard University to write a history of the union and have called on members—particularly the older ones — for help.

All sources of information are being explored including international union files and library, and other public and private libraries, but the union is also after historically valuable documents in local files or in the possession of union members.

"It would be deeply appreciated," the union said, "if local union officers would inform the membership of this project and forward to the general office any materials which would be helpful to researchers—especially material predating 1920. This would include old correspendence on significant matters, photos, old journals and other official publications of both the UA and the old international association."

1st Wage-Hour Administrator Dies After Fall

Elmer F. Andrews, first administrator of the Fair Labor Standards Act and a former New York State industrial commissioner, died in a Fairfax, Va., hospital after being injured while inspecting an urban redevelopment site near Bluefield, W.Va. He was 73.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who had known him for many years, mourned the loss of "a sincere, loyal and devoted friend of all the working people of America." Pres. Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers said he was "a friend of ours when we didn't have too many."

A native of New York, Andrews attended Renssalaer Polytechnic Institute, specialiizng in safety engineering. After service as an Army flier in World War I he held several posts in the New York City government and then was deputy state industrial commissioner for four years before succeeding Frances Perkins in the commissionership.

He came to Washington in 1938 to initiate enforcement of a wage-hour law that set a minimum of 25 cents an hour and called for overtime pay after 44 hours a week. He later established his own industrial relations consulting firm and for the past 10 years had been with the Housing & Home Finance Agency.

His home was in Vienna, Va. His first wife, Ruth, died in 1944. Surviving are his widow, the former Mildred Gwinn; a son, two daughters and seven grandchildren.

Fate of 'Big Three' Bills Seen Key to Congress

Reviewing the first session of the 88th Congress the AFL-CIO termed its accomplishments "reasonably good," but stressed that "the big three" items of unfinished business—civil rights, tax cuts and health care for the aged—will largely determine labor's "final judgment" of the record at adjournment this year.

A report and evaluation by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller takes note of "historic" first session actions in both the foreign and domestic fields despite "creaky, cumbersome" congressional rules and the continuing power of the "stand-pat" conservative coalition.

"Labor Looks at Congress, 1963," Publication No. 77E, can be ordered from the Pamphlet Div., AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 Sixteenth Street, N.W., Washington 6, D. C. Single copies are free. For orders up to 100, the price is 15 cents a copy or $13.50 per hundred.

The federation's legislative director praised "far-reaching" education and training bills enacted, including federal aid to colleges and medical schools, modernization and expansion of vocational education, and improvement of the Manpower Development & Training Act.

He cited on the "plus side" enactment of an equal pay for women law and a drive against mental illness and retardation.

Senate ratification of the limited nuclear test ban treaty, Biemiller said, "was an important first step" towards the goal of an effectively-controlled ban on nuclear testing.

These accomplishments, the pamphlet stresses, "cannot hide" the failure of Congress to act on other major items of the Kennedy-Johnson program.

The AFL-CIO list of unfinished legislative business includes a renewed accelerated public works program, increased area redevelopment funds, passage of youth employment legislation, federal standards for unemployment compensation and legislation to include fringe benefits in prevailing wage determinations under the Davis-Bacon Act.

The federation has asked Congress to help create more job opportunities by cutting the basic workweek under the Fair Labor Standards Act and requiring double-time to discourage overtime work. Labor is seeking expanded coverage and an increase in the federal minimum wage.

The AFL-CIO legislative program, Biemiller noted, also asks mass transit legislation with safeguards for workers, federal aid to elementary and secondary schools, establishment of a "domestic peace corps," federal pay raises, passage of consumer protection bills, development of natural resources, and loans for group practice health facilities.

Support was asked for an "effective foreign aid program" as a keystone of U.S. foreign policy.

Congress should "lay the groundwork" for action in 1965 to reform its rules by establishing a bipartisan study commission this year, the AFL-CIO said.

It is "the total record" of the 88th Congress which American voters must weigh at the polls next Nov. 3, the pamphlet noted.

UAW Signs First Pact at Missile Plant

Detroit—Detroit area contract standards have been combined with certain fringe benefits standard to the areospace industry in a first contract between Auto Workers Local 809 and the LTV Michigan Div. of Ling-Temco-Vought, Inc., covering employes at a Michigan army missile plant in Sterling.

The fringes include five days of paid sick leave, two weeks of paid vacation after one year and eight paid holidays.

The UAW and the LTV Michigan Div. have had amicable relations for 15 years. The two-year contract for the missile plant was negotiated after the union won a National Labor Relations Board election. The present 135 employes of the plant are expected to increase many-fold.

Wage adjustments, retroactive to Oct. 21, 1963, establish rates in a range of $2.45 to $3.71 an hour with an annual improvement factor of 6 cents an hour or 2.5 percent, whichever it higher, effective Nov. 9, 1964.

Union security and dues check-off are included, as are the union's standard cost-of-liivng clause, a supplemental unemployment benefit program, and company-paid hospital - medical - surgical protection.

House Adds Fringe Benefits To Davis-Bacon Wage Law

Rejects Proposal For Court Review

By David L. Perlman

The House passed the Davis-Bacon fringe benefits bill by an overwhelming 357-50 vote after decisively rejecting a labor-opposed attempt to make the Labor Dept.'s prevailing wage findings on federal construction projects subject to court review.

If approved by the Senate, where a bipartisan companion bill has 20 sponsors, contractors on federally-financed construction would be required to match the fringe benefits as well as the wages found to be prevailing in the area. As an alternative, they could add the amount that local employers pay to union welfare plans to the cash wages they themselves pay employes.

With a growing portion of wage costs going into fringe benefits, unorganized employers who do not provide these benefits have had a competitive advantage in bidding on government construction contracts. The Davis-Bacon Act, passed in 1931 to protect local labor standards, covers only direct wages.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a letter to House members urging approval of the bill "without irrelevant or crippling amendments," pointed out that "fringe benefits such as health, welfare, insurance and pension plans scarcely existed" when the Davis-Bacon Act was passed.

"Today," he said, "these fringe benefits are as much a part of the wage structure as the cash wage payment itself." The fringe benefit provision, he said, is "essential to protect local wage rates and local community living standards."

The key House vote came early in the debate, on the normally routine procedure of adopting the rule under which the House was to consider the bill.

Under the customary procedure,

Staff Posts Opened to Negro MDs

By Eugene A. Kelly

Chicago—Negro doctors have scored a major victory against discrimination in hospital staff appointments by winning a negotiated settlement of an anti-trust suit filed against 56 hospitals and five medical groups here.

The settlement, to be entered Jan. 31 in the court of U.S. District Judge Hubert L. Will, was hailed as a turning point in the long fight of the doctors for parity in practicing their profession and having access to hospital services. It was won, said John P. Morris of counsel for the eight doctor-plaintiffs, with substantial aid from organized labor, including the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

In the pact the hospitals agreed to set up a seven-member grievance and hearing commission similar to those in Fair Employment Practice structures.

A physician claiming racial discrimination in denial of a staff appointment may file a complaint and, after investigation, the commission may direct cor-

Amendment Battles Ahead:

Congressional Logjam Broken; Rights, Tax Bills Head for Floor

A dramatic break in the congressional logjam sent the long-awaited tax cut bill to the Senate floor and cleared the way for House action on a second Administration top-priority bill—a broad-ranging civil rights measure which includes a ban on job discrimination because of race, color, religion or national origin.

The $11.6 billion tax bill was sent to the Senate floor by a 12-5 vote of the Finance Committee—a larger margin than most observers anticipated several months ago. It closely resembles the bill passed by the House last September and its main provisions are identical—an average 20 percent cut in individual income taxes and a drop in the corporation tax from a 52 to 48 percent ceiling. (See story on page 6 for details of bill.)

A number of senators prepared to offer amendments—in some cases to provide additional exemptions or lift special taxes, in others to cut the amount of relief for corporations or individuals.

The House takes up the civil rights bill under an "open rule," allowing amendments, and efforts are expected to knock out two key provisions which the AFL-CIO and civil rights groups argue are vital—fair employment guarantees and a ban on discrimination or segregation in establishments serving the public.

Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.) of the House Rules Committee, who had been joined by other southern members in delaying tactics on the bill, agreed to cut off hearings and permit a vote as the alternative to having the measure taken out of his hands by a bipartisan committee majority.

Northern Democrats had pressed for speedy action last November, when the bill came out of the Judiciary Committee, and had initiated a discharge petition to dislodge it from the Rules Committee. House Republicans, long-time coalition allies of Smith, held back from any overt pressure at the time. The Committee bottleneck was broken when House GOP leaders decided that Republicans needed action on the rights bill before traditional Lin-

Dakota Jobless Pay 'Means Test' Ruled 'Inconsistent' with U.S. Law

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has ruled that a recent amendment to South Dakota's unemployment compensation laws was "inconsistent" with federal law because it amounted to a "means test" denying benefits to certain groups of claimants.

The secretary's determination resulted in voiding that part of the law under terms specifically set forth in the amendment.

The change in the state's jobless insurance program would have denied benefits for a period ranging from seven to 13 weeks to unemployed workers who earned more than $6,000 during the base period.

If such a provision were allowed to stand, the unemployment compensation program would "change overnight from wage insurance to relief benefits for the lowest paid unemployed workers," the AFL-CIO declared in a memorandum to Wirtz signed by Social Security Dir. Nelson Cruikshank, Assistant Dir. Raymond Munts, and Leonard Lesser, social security director for the Industrial Union Dept.

Wirtz, in reaching his decision, said legislative history showed that Congress clearly intended unemployment tax credits and grants to be conditioned on a state's having "a genuine unemployment insurance law."

Both the Social Security Act and the Federal Unemployment Tax Act limit the use of unemployment funds, he noted, adding:

"This limitation was regarded as one of the most important requirements in the federal law. When Congress specified that 'compensation' was a cash benefit to a worker with respect to his unemployment, it meant that unemployment—and not need or lack of need—must be the test of a worker's eligibility for compensation."

He found that the ineligibility provisions proposed by the state would introduce a "means test"

Racist Lobby Hit on Wooing of Union Members

A right-wing segregationist lobbying outfit, largely financed by the tax-supported Mississippi State Sovereignty Commission, is flooding union members with propaganda outbursts purporting to demonstrate that passage of the pending civil rights bill would damage them. The segregationist outfit calls itself the Coordinating Committee for Fundamental American Freedoms, and a spokesman is one John C. Satterfield, who once used his post as president of the American Bar Association to denounce the expanding civil rights movement.

Andrew J. Biemiller, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation, has sent out the following memorandum on Satterfield and the CCFAF, prepared by the federation's Legal Dept.:

JOHN SATTERFIELD, who has been described as the "brains" of the segregationist lobby group masterminding the battle against the civil rights bill, apparently wants to give the impression he is alarmed about what he suggests is "the adverse effect the bill will have on labor-union membership." To back up his views, he has recently circulated the arguments of the bill's foes on the House Judiciary Committee, who claim that the proposed legislation would endanger seniority in referral systems and job rights.

Satterfield, a resident of Yazoo City, Miss., is not known to the AFL-CIO as a champion of American labor. His previous endeavors, indeed, seem directed along other lines. Ten years ago, for example, his name appeared as president of the Circuit Riders, Inc., a group fighting "socialism and communism and all other anti-American teachings in the Methodist Church."

If Satterfield has now become genuinely disturbed about impediments to union membership, the AFL-CIO invites him to join it in the fight against such real anti-labor measures as state right-to-work laws. Certainly his present campaign to derail long-overdue civil rights legislation does nothing to serve the cause of good unionism.

The portion of the spending bill dealing with employment makes it unlawful for an employer or a union to discriminate in hiring or employment because of an individual's race, color, or creed. A federal commission is created to enforce these provisions. The ban on job discrimination would not become effective until one year after the bill's passage, so all parties would have a chance to correct any improper practices. Seniority rights already acquired would not be affected.

Criticisms leveled by the House Judiciary dissenters, and quoted by Satterfield, are either grave distortions or outright misinterpretations of the civil rights proposal. Thus it is argued that under the bill, if a hiring hall had "20 men awaiting call, the first 10 in seniority being white," the union "could be forced to pass them over" in favor of applicants of lesser seniority "but of the stipulated race." This insinuates a kind of racial discrimination in reverse, which is totally at odds with the provisions of the bill. A hiring hall operating on a non-discriminatory basis would simply not be placed in the position imagined by the civil rights opponents.

Similarly, it is contended that "contractors could be forced to actively recruit employes of a specified race and upgrade them into skilled classifications, although this would displace union members in the skilled trades." As we read the bill, no such displacement would ever be demanded of a contractor who operates non-discriminatorily after the effective date of the act. And, as previously indicated, no existing seniority would be touched.

What Satterfield is arguing for is the "right" of white workers to continue in the future to acquire seniority at the expense of their colored fellows. The AFL-CIO, on behalf of American labor, rejects the shabby notion that the honor and value of seniority status should be given to a man not on the basis of time on a job, but on the basis of the color of his skin.

What Satterfield conveniently fails to mention is that right now federal law, as declared by the Supreme Court, requires unions to represent all employes fairly and impartially, without regard to race or color. Furthermore, at its November 1963 convention, the AFL-CIO formally called upon all affiliates "to seek the inclusion of effective anti-discrimination clauses in all collective bargaining agreements."

In short, the proposed legislation would not alter a union's present substantive obligation under federal law and federation policy. It would simply provide a meaningful administrative remedy for an injured employe. Moreover, a highly significant point is omitted entirely in the Satterfield critique. The pending bill would forbid racial discrimination on the part of employers whether they were organized or not. At present, federal law reaches racial discrimination in employment only where a union is also involved. Obviously, this supplies a segregationist employer with a special incentive for keeping out a union. Under the proposed bill that special incentive would be abolished.

The fair employment practices provisions of the civil rights bill are moral imperatives. They take away nothing from the American worker which he has already acquired, and they will never keep him from anything to which he has a just claim. They simply impose on employer and union alike a set of duties that the overwhelming majority of American labor organizations has voluntarily approved.

The AFL-CIO considers itself in a far better position than John Satterfield to judge what is in the best interest of American unions. The AFL-CIO fully endorses the civil rights bill and the fair employment practices provisions it contains.

Anti-Bias Stand Dates Way Back

The AFL-CIO and its parent organizations, the former AFL and former CIO, have been on record for many years as favoring enforceable civil rights legislation, including a fair employment practice section.

Testimony in favor of civil rights legislation was given by labor as long ago as the 40's. On July 17, 1963, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany testified before the House Judiciary Committee in favor of pending civil rights legislation, and specifically in favor of a fair employment practice section, in these words:

"The plain fact is, Mr. Chairman, that Negro workers as a whole, North or South, do not enjoy anything approaching equal employment opportunity.

"We ask you now, as we have asked the Congress for many years, for effective, enforceable legislation to correct this glaring injustice, which must be corrected in order to make the other aspects of a civil rights program effective."

Central Body Officers Confer on Legislation

Labor's legislative and political goals ranked high on both the business and after-hours agendas of officers of AFL-CIO state and local central bodies during their national conference in Washington.

Two of the three days of business sessions were earmarked for a legislative conference, including talks by ranking congressional leaders. The 150 delegates, from nearly every state, also scheduled dinner and breakfast meetings with congressmen and senators from their home areas.

The program included opening day discussions led by AFL-CIO Organization Dir. John Livingston on the role of central bodies in organizing and Roy Reuther, director of the AFL-CIO register and vote campaign, on the 1964 registration drive. Delegates were welcomed by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler.

Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, gave a luncheon address on the role of central bodies in today's labor movement, and Stanton Smith, coordinator of state and city central bodies, reported on the operations of his office.

The legislative portion of the program included talks by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), House Majority Leader Carl Albert (D-Okla.) and Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.).

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller led a discussion of the pending civil rights bill and Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger spoke on tax legislation. Staff members of the Dept. of Legislation reported on other major bills.

The program concluded with round table discussions with a group of Senate administrative assistants and a discussion on improving communications on legislative matters by AFL-CIO Public Relations Dir. Albert Zack, Publications Dir. Saul Miller and Willard Shelton, managing editor of the AFL-CIO News.

Layoff Pay To Ease Blow Of Shutdown

Elliott Lake, Ont.—Members of two locals of the Steelworkers will collect severance pay under recently-negotiated contracts when Denison Mines, Ltd., the world's largest uranium producer, closes operations in July.

The local representing production workers completed bargaining shortly before the closing was announced. The agreement provides not only for a wage increase of 5 cents an hour but dismissal pay of $6 per month of service up to $450 should operations cease.

The local representing office and technical employes had negotiated a similar severance pay clause several weeks ago, with an increase of $5 monthly retroactive to last Sept. 1.

Denison Mines, with about 1,000 employes, was ordered closed when management was unable to persuade the Canadian government to continue stockpiling uranium. Seven other uranium operations here have closed in less than four years.

Production at Stanrock Uranium Mines is expected to continue until the end of this year, with Rio Algom Mines continuing in operation until November 1966.

City's Desegregation Speeded by COPE

Atlanta—The COPE conference here, for delegates from Georgia, Florida and South Carolina, desegregated the Dinkler-Plaza Hotel two days before 18 major city hotels and motels formally announced they would halt discrimination.

Negro delegates and staff members, registered without incident by previous agreement, were asked to show their room keys when they went to hotel restaurants; desegregation, it appeared, applied only to residents.

One word from COPE and there were no more key checks. Outside the hotel, Negro delegates dined at restaurants being picketed by the Ku Klux Klan because they had desegregated.

Kingsport Pickets Take Credit Break

Kingsport, Tenn.—Management of the struck Kingsport Press was caught off guard when pickets withdrew their lines for the first time in 10 months and 200 strikers marched in a body into the plant.

The marchers were members of the plant credit union, bound for the annual meeting. Later they marched out again and resumed their picket stations.

The strikers had enough votes to win control of the credit committee and the supervisory committee, and to elect three directors out of nine, with the company president later named credit union president.

The credit union has functioned feebly since 1,600 members of five unions struck for an adequate contract last Mar. 11.

COPE Sessions Stress Threat from Far Right

Attendance at regional conferences of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education averaged close to 400 in the first three meetings in this election year.

At the conferences, keyed to a study of the political threat of the radical right, delegates to sessions in Knoxville, Tenn., Atlanta, Ga., and Little Rock, Ark.—which covered the southeastern United States from North Carolina to Louisiana—confirmed that Birchite radio and TV programs are numerous and are having a "significant" impact on union families.

This was brought out in discussion groups following a COPE filmstrip, "The Extremists," which names the leading far-right groups and stresses the scope of their operations.

FCC Stand Outlined

At each conference a representative of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Public Relations outlined the Federal Communications Commission stand on controversial broadcasts and how it can be enforced.

The COPE sessions his year also seek to explore the political and legislative past, present and future. A question-and-answer session with two or more federal legislators is a regular feature. The AFL-CIO film from the 1963 convention, "John F. Kennedy's Last Words to Labor," is shown. And a film of Pres. Johnson, expounding his program for the nation, is on view.

Addresses by COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan and Assistant Dir. Joseph Rourke emphasize the link between the radical right, racists and the anti-labor coalition in Congress. Separate state sessions explore progress and plans on registration and voting.

Another goal of the conferences is to step up coordination between AFL-CIO organizations and other liberal community groups. Representatives of the latter are invited to attend and are guests of COPE at a luncheon designed to bring about free interchange of opinions.

This year's meetings are held to a single day, though it may be a 12-hour day or longer.

Future COPE area conferences will be held on the following schedule:

Feb. 12—Texas, Oklahoma, Arlington, Tex.

Feb. 28—Pennsylvania, Delaware, Philadelphia.

Mar. 6—California, Hawaii, Nevada, Sacramento, Calif.

Mar. 9—Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Pocatello, Ida.

Skilled Trades Meet Told:

UAW Will Demand 'More Than Ever'

Chicago—The profit-heavy auto industry will have to come up with more than ever before in the way of benefits for those of its employes who are members of the Auto Workers, UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther said here.

"The workers' equity during a year in which the industry produces 7.5 million cars is not the same as during a year in which it produces 5 million cars," he told more than 1,200 delegates attending the union's 10th annual Skilled Trades Conference.

Negotiations with the Big Three auto firms will start about July 1 and Reuther indicated that working conditions, job security and the creation of job opportunities and purchasing power will loom large during these talks.

"We will seek full equity not only because we're entitled to it as a matter of economic justice but as part of the solution to the economic problems facing our country," he said. "We will solve the unemployment problem only if we increase purchasing power."

Reuther told the delegates that the UAW convention next March will spell out the bargaining demands, "but I would like to point out in a general way two priority areas which we will have to consider."

Overtime 'National Scandal'

"One is the whole question of working conditions," he said. "The other is the creation of job opportunities for the thousands of unemployed youngsters walking the streets of America and for the jobless members of disadvantaged minority groups."

UAW bargaining teams may have to explore various avenues of approach, he said, including those of earlier retirement, shorter workweeks, longer vacations and more paid holidays.

"The fact that millions of American workers are forced to work overtime while other millions are unemployed amounts to nothing less than a national scandal," he continued. "If managements find it cheaper to pay time-and-a-half for overtime than to hire new employes, then we had better raise that penalty high enough to meet that problem."

He also cited improvements in supplemental unemployment benefits (SUB), pensions, insurance and medical care as among other avenues of approach to the workers' problems.

In regard to pending legislation to provide medical care for the aged under social security, Reuther challenged industry to "either join us in Washington" to get the necessary laws passed "or we will get it at the bargaining table."

He declared "we will tell the captains of industry that we are not looking for a fight this summer, but we are looking for justice" and he cited corporate profits of $50 billion in 1963, an "all-time record." Productivity and profits have far exceeded wages, he said, and pointed out that General Motors' net profits after taxes in 1963 reached just under $1.6 billion.

He praised Pres. Johnson's "declaration of war on poverty" to help the 15 million "have-not Americans" who, in the richest country on earth, live "deep in the sub-basements of our social structure."

Among the 25 resolutions passed by the delegates, who represent about 125,000 skilled tradesmen in UAW plants, were calls for a shorter workweek, earlier retirement and higher overtime pay.

"MORE THAN EVER BEFORE" will have to be given by the auto industry in negotiations opening next summer, Auto Workers 10th annual Skilled Trades Conference hears UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther say. About 1,200 delegates, some of whom are shown above, attended the Chicago parley.

Anti-Union Speeches Kick Back on Firm

The National Labor Relations Board has ordered a new election at a Montgomery Ward store in Texas because store officials made anti-union speeches to employes during working hours but denied a union's request for a similar free speech opportunity.

The union—Operating Engineers' Local 826—lost the election last May 10 and filed unfair practice charges against the Big Spring, Tex., store. The board, reaffirming the principle it had asserted previously in the May Dept. Stores case on employer "free speech," said an "imbalance" had been created by Montgomery Ward's conduct. The board added that "we respectfully disagree" with the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which had rejected the NLRB's reasoning and refused to enforce an order against the May Co.

The facts supporting an unfair-practice finding in the Texas case are "much stronger" than in the May case, Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and Members John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown observed. They cited the store manager's action in notifying employes they would be fired if they "talked union" during working hours, even at lunch and coffee-break periods.

By so doing, the board said, management "did more than merely promulgate a broad, privileged, and hence lawful no-solicitation rule." It announced a rule "which not only prohibited union discussion in selling areas but which also unlawfully forbade such activities within non-selling areas" regardless of whether the employes were on free time or not, and "even forbade legitimate union activities off the store premises during store business hours."

Even more clearly than in the May case, said the board, management's "broad and unlawful no-solicitation rule," coupled with its own use of company time and property "to impress its anti-union propaganda on employes," created a "glaring imbalance in organizational communication that justified the union's request to address employes."

In its decision the board not only set aside the lost election but also directed the firm not to make anti-union speeches to employes during company time without honoring a union's request similarly to address the employes.

General Board To Meet Feb. 24

The AFL-CIO General Board will meet in executive session at 10 A.M. Feb. 24 in the Americana Hotel, Bal Harbour, Fla.

The AFL-CIO constitution provides that "the General Board shall decide all policy questions referred to it by the Executive Officers or by the Executive Council." The board consists of all Executive Council members and the president or other chief executive officer of federation departments and affiliates. A policy has been adopted barring substitutes or alternates for official members.

Pilots Back CAB Fight on Lightning Peril

Chicago—The Air Line Pilots have commended the Civil Aeronautics Board for seeking to prevent aircraft accidents due to lightning strikes or fuel explosions and agreed to support any program aimed at solving the problem.

"Our pilots and safety representatives, who have accumulated thousands of hours of experience in thunderstorm flying, are at your disposal for any assistance they can provide," ALPA Pres. C. H. Ruby said in a letter of thanks to the CAB's bureau of safety for recommending intensified studies and tests of accidents caused by lightning.

The CAB safety recommendations were made after a Pan American World Airways jet crashed at Elkton, Md., last Dec. 8, killing all 82 aboard. Preliminary investigation indicated the cause as jet fuel possibly ignited by lightning but no formal finding was made pending a hearing Feb. 24 in Philadelphia.

In its letter the union called for an "intensive research program" and recommended procedures, based on past ALPA studies of plane accidents, such as these:

Tests to determine under what conditions the fuel-air mixture in jet aircraft or vent systems can become flammable; development of instruments to warn crewmen of danger; experiments with lightning rods and flame arresters.

Seafarers Win New Taxi Unit

St. Louis—The Seafarers' transportation services division defeated Teamsters Local 405 in a National Labor Relations Board election among drivers of the Marcella Cab Co. here. The vote was SIU 140, Teamsters 105.

Negotiations for a new contract will begin, the SIU division said, after the board certifies the new bargaining agent. The drivers formerly were represented by Local 405. The Teamsters were expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957 on findings of domination by corrupt interests.

The victory was the fourth for the SIU over the expelled union in recent months. The SIU recently won bargaining rights for Yellow Cab Co. employes here and also represents 400 cab drivers in Detroit and more than 5,000 in Chicago who rejected the Teamsters.

60 to Divide $50,000 In Strike Settlement

issues to end the dispute that began when Keiner's firm bought the plating works from Huyler's, a New York corporation.

The union and management signed, and the National Labor Relations Board approved, a settlement stipulation under which Keiner will bargain with the union and sign any agreement reached; put 168 former employes on a rehiring list and recall them to work after laying off all present employes; and make whole 60 laid-off employes by dividing $50,000 among them in equal proportions.

The dispute with Keiner began, the union said, when he opened negotiations to buy the plant and launched a publicity campaign painting the union as irresponsible, despite a strike-free record of more than 12 years of previously harmonious relations.

Keiner had charged that the union initiated an "excessive" number of arbitrations—seven in 12 years—and hinted he might move.

When the sale went through, the new owner immediately closed the plant for two weeks and sent discharge notices to all employes. Keiner then refused, the union said, to recognize the "successors" clause of the union-management agreement and began to rehire employes on a selective basis, openly seeking anti-union workers and refusing to recall those identified as active unionists.

The USWA at one time obtained a temporary court order restraining the company from hiring new personnel while former workers were on layoff. When that injunction was dissolved, USWA Local 4779 struck the firm and filed unfair labor practice charges.

Later the NLRB general counsel, in a unique action on behalf of a complaining union, got a temporary federal court order in Cincinnati restraining the firm from closing or threatening to close, refusing to hire USWA members or threatening workers with dismissal for joining the union.

Last summer the union won a fight for distribution of nearly $500,000 in delayed profit-sharing benefits among the workers under the contract signed with the former owners, Whitehouse said.

Raises for 5.6 Million Reported by Labor Dept.

More than 2.7 million workers got wage increases averaging 3.4 percent as a result of union contract negotiations concluded in 1963, the Labor Dept. has reported in a survey.

Another 2.9 million workers received deferred wage increases under union contracts negotiated in previous years, the department said in a report by its Bureau of Labor Statistics on wage settlements among units of 1,000 or more workers.

The average wage increase negotiated in 1963 was less than in 1962 but higher than in 1960 or 1961., the department said. Applied to all the 3.6 million workers covered by major settlements, the median adjustment was 3.1 percent of estimated straighttime average hourly earnings, said the BLS.

Most of the workers who got deferred wage increases last year, the report said, were in the automobile, farm equipment and trucking industries. Approximately 1.4 million other workers were covered by agreements that did not provide for bargaining on wages in 1963, or were employed where negotiations had not been concluded by the end of the year—railroad workers, coal miners, and some apparel workers.

Reporting that most of the 1963 settlements changed one or more fringe benefits, the BLS gave this summary of negotiated wage increases for last year:

- About 1 out of 5 workers got increases of 3 percent but less than 3.5 percent. Included were about 300,000 in the communications industry and 50,000 employes of the General Electric Co. Other GE employes got wage boosts of 2 to 3 percent.
- Another 1 of 5 workers received increases averaging 5 percent or more. Included were longshoremen on the East and Gulf Coasts, Philadelphia area truck drivers, West Coast lumber workers, and Boeing Co. employes.
- Increases of 5 percent or more also were won for workers in the men's apparel industries and some workers in retail trade. For apparel workers, the increase was their first since 1960.

Let the House Vote!

A CROSS-SECTION of America paraded before the House Ways & Means Committee last week adding thousands of words of new testimony and pleas for the passage of hospital care for the aged through social security.

The aged and young, labor, church and social service groups, physicians and governors and mayors, all joined in a united plea for committee action at the current session of Congress.

The testimony for action on health care for the aged is overwhelming. There is no longer any question of the need for a program to help the elderly meet their health needs; the question has boiled down to how—what is the best approach and how should it be financed.

The alternatives to hospital care for the elderly through social security have been examined and found wanting. The Kerr-Mills Act approach has fallen far short of meeting the problem or the need. The only logical and equitable approach is to use the social security system.

This is the question before the Ways & Means Committee. All available facts and opinions have been heard; the arguments have been hashed and rehashed. Now it's time to bring the King-Anderson bill to the House floor for a vote.

To deny the aged and their children the justice of their demands is to prolong suffering and tragedy.

Next on the Poll Tax

THE 1964 PRESIDENTIAL and congressional elections will be unique in the sense that no American will have to pay a tax as a condition of voting.

The 24th Amendment to the Constitution, passed by a two-thirds vote of each house of Congress and ratified by three-fourths of the states, will remove finally the blight of making it more difficult for persons with low incomes to cast their ballot.

Yet a problem remains, an imperfection of democracy calculated to complicate voting procedure. In the five states that maintained poll taxes through the ratification of the 24th Amendment, new devices are being proposed to continue the per capita tax for state elections.

In those states—Virginia is an example—voters will be checked on two lists, one for voting for federal office where no poll tax is required, the other for state office where a tax must be paid if the voter is to be declared eligible.

This means that in the states that insist on maintaining the poll tax for state elections, a voter may be allowed to vote for federal candidates but denied the vote for state candidates if he has not paid the tax.

Preserving the poll tax for state elections is a direct bit of nose-thumbing at the great majority of Americans who, through their congressional and state representatives, have said firmly that such a tax should not be a condition of voting in a democracy.

There is at least an argument that the thrust of the 24th Amendment, taken in conjunction with basic guarantees of the 1st and 15th Amendments, effectively prohibits the states from imposing poll taxes in state as well as federal elections.

A case challenging the new Virginia act has been filed and it should be prosecuted, in Virginia and in other states where local legislatures seek to violate basic principles of democratic government in defiance of the nation's decisive action.

Enough for an Answer

Father Rice's View:

'Featherbedding' Held 'Needed' To Meet Automation Problems

The following is excerpted from an article in the January 1964 U.S. Catholic by the Very Rev. Charles Owen Rice entitled "We Need Featherbedding in the United States."

"FEATHERBEDDING" is a wonderful phrase if it is on your side. It is a sloganeering phrase which argues as it describes. It is the sort of phrase that advertising men dream of inventing; and here it lies easy to hand for use in a labor-management controversy.

It is management's phrase and it wars against labor's position in the deadliest argument going on in America today. In this decade 22 million jobs will be eliminated, according to the U. S. Dept. of Labor. So many new people are going to enter the labor market that all told the nation needs to generate 35 million new jobs just to hold even.

Estimates are that this will not be done and we may be short 14 million jobs by 1970.

The term featherbedding comes to us from the railroad industry and was coined by an executive years ago who sarcastically inquired if the workers wanted feather beds in the caboose instead of straw. It implied that workers were sleeping on the job and trying to make the job too easy. Today featherbedding has a different meaning and refers to efforts of workers to hold on to jobs which have changed. The fireman on the railroad no longer has the brutal task of shoveling coal into the hungry belly of a speeding locomotive.

Trains are longer and longer. As the railroads stage a comeback, they eliminate jobs on the highway as well as on the right of way. Will mile-long monsters hurtling through countryside and city be manned by only one person, or is it reasonable to propose that two men work them for their own safety, the safety of the general public, and the protection of jobs?

As jobs are dwindling due to automation and rationalization it surely is not in the best interests of the country to prune them away fanatically. All automated industries will have to be lenient, humane, and sensible in the reduction of jobs. Changes are coming so fast that they will wreck our economy and cause massive social damage unless reason and common sense come into play.

We are not suffering from too few workers but from dwindling jobs. Workers without jobs will have to be taken care of somehow. Industry must bear some of the burden.

There is no point in conducting the discussion with the arguments of yesteryear when capital was scarce and everything had to be done by hand. Arguments taken from the days when machines simply replaced the bodily efforts of individuals at a slow pace and made more jobs than they destroyed now miss the mark.

ALL LABOR UNIONS develop a system of assignment of duties according to which men confine themselves to certain tasks in a certain order. Men get a vested interest in their jobs and acquire security. This is a social good. It has been called featherbedding, but, no matter what it is called, it should be respected, not scoffed at and not legislated away.

A. H. Raskin, highly respected labor reporter for the New York Times, throws additional light on the subject. He points to featherbedding in the executive suite and all down the line. Raskin says:

"The surest way to kill the country would be to enforce a law abolishing all featherbedding at once. . . . We need featherbedding in the United States. . . ."

As Raskin points out, the No. 1 evil in this country today is not unnecessary employes at work but the millions who have lost useful jobs, whose talent lies idle and morale wastes away.

We have not been coming to grips with the social problem posed by automation. Some are complacent because they are well off, others so puzzled and frightened that they are unable to move or suggest movement. We need to have the drastic nature of the problem rubbed into our consciousness for our own sake as a nation and a people.

That is why the railroad firemen are doing us all a favor by their stubborn attitude. They are trying to force us to think and to change. They are not calmly accepting an economic sentence of death.

Railroading is becoming healthy again and if it were freed from certain shackles, it could become enormously profitable to its investors. But it would be social folly so to free the industry if it is going to eliminate its blue collar personnel with ruthless efficiency.

This and other industries must bear some of the burden, not all. Industry's portion can be borne in part by a sensible toleration of work rules and practices and by institution of a shorter work week.

Morgan Says:

Business Homier with Johnson, Though It's Hard to Figure Why

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

ONE OF THE MANY mysteries of Washington is why the American business community feels more calm and comfortable with Lyndon Johnson, whose fiscal philosophy was fired by the social revolution of the New Deal, than it was with John Kennedy, who bore many of the earmarks of economic conservatism his father taught him.

Morgan

An official in the Johnson Administration with a big business background has come up privately with part of the answer—which is not too flattering to some of the country's industrial leaders. Emphasizing that in his view the Johnson and Kennedy approaches to economics are quite similar, this source suggests that neither has been hostile to business but that business at large may have let its emotions more than factual analysis color its judgments and shape its images of the two men.

This official said when he first came to Washington he was astonished to discover how much better briefed and more knowledgeable organized labor leaders were on economic issues than their business counterparts.

"You might not have agreed with their point of view or their interpretations," he said, "but they certainly knew the subject."

Business leaders, he found, were more inclined to talk—and sometimes think—in cliches. They distrusted new ideas, they were suspicious of government economists, especially if they had been recently borrowed from a university, and they seemed to be more than a trifle uncomfortable about Pres. Kennedy himself when he appeared on the scene. His youthful energy and incisive intellectualism were "different." Then the thin crust of their confidence collapsed when the President attacked the steel industry for its sudden—and abortive—attempt to raise prices.

Two months after that crisis, in a major speech at Yale in June 1962, Kennedy appealed to the public in general and business in particular to dispense with the "myths" that unnecessarily supported so many controversies. He chided us all when he said "we enjoy the comfort of opinion without the discomfort of thought."

He admonished the country to "move on from the reassuring repetition of stale phrases to a new, difficult but essential confrontation of reality . . . What we need is not more labels and more cliches, but more basic discussion of the sophisticated and technical questions involved in keeping our mighty economic machine moving steadily ahead . . .

"If there is any current trend toward meeting present problems with ancient cliches," Kennedy concluded, "this is the moment to stop it—before it lands us all in a bog of sterile acrimony."

This advice is particularly apt and pointed now with both parties beginning to crank up their propaganda machines for the campaign.

Happily, the dialogue between businessmen and Pres. Johnson continues to develop with friendly warmth notwithstanding the fact that he is fully committed to enactment of the Kennedy legislative program. When he addressed business executives in the White House recently he said, "We will not harass or persecute you. We want to help you . . . So . . . I say banish your fear, and shed your doubts and renew your hopes. We have much work to do together."

THE PRESIDENT has issued similar reassurances and a similar summons to trade union leaders. But if government, business and labor are going to accomplish the jobs they have to do together, then each is going to have to develop more thoughtful approaches than any have demonstrated so far. For the problems of an exploding population, automation, manpower retraining, education and many others cannot be solved with cliches, or as Kennedy put it, "incantations from the forgotten past."

It is possible but by no means a certainty that a recently published book by Columbia University's Prof. Richard Hofstadter may encourage more national thoughtfulness on these matters.

I qualify the hope because, as the New Yorker magazine's favorable review of it sardonically points out, being a book, it may never be read by those who need it most. Hofstadter calls his work "Anti-Intellectualism in American Life." Our contempt for the workings of the mind is far more widespread than most of us care to admit.

"The anti-intellectual impulse," says the New Yorker, "is found in business and labor . . . on the Right in politics . . . the Left, and every intervening gradation. It is common to those who have little money and those who have a great deal. It is evident among the cultural vigilantes, strident of voice and red of neck, who delight in attacking our schools, and it also can be seen—lamentably—among those milder persons who teach them."

Hofstadter's not asking us to become a nation of philosophers. He'll settle, apparently, for a nation of doers who think a little before, during and after the deed is done.

Washington Reports:

Wirtz Presses Public to Back Campaign Against Joblessness

SEC. OF LABOR W. Willard Wirtz, chairman of the President's Task Force on Manpower Conservation, called upon the people to support and Congress to act upon measures planned by the task force to cut down the current chronically and consistently high unemployment rate, particularly among young men.

The secretary, interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations, said the program is a good investment.

Wirtz said it is broad-gauged and must be carried out on many fronts, but that he was immediately interested in seeing that the pending youth employment opportunities bill, passed by the Senate and now in the House Rules Committee, is enacted; that a supplemental appropriation be voted for the Manpower Development & Training Act, and that other steps be taken to make effective a program to meet the needs of young men who do not qualify for military service.

In 1962, he said, half the young men who went up to be drafted into the army failed the armed forces qualifications test, "a quarter because of mental inadequacy of one kind or another, which really means lack of education, and another quarter because of physical disability of some kind or other."

THE TASK FORCE proposed that all youngsters be given the armed forces test when they reach 18 instead of at the ages of 22 or 24, as at present. There would be no change in the induction policy, Wirtz said, but there would be an earlier opportunity "to do something" about those who fail.

Those who fail for physical reasons, he said, would be referred, principally through the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, to doctors or to local community organizations.

"We found in interviewing some 2,500 of these young men," Wirtz said, "that there is a very close relationship between educational lack and unemployment. Also, a high percentage of these boys come from homes characterized by poverty, from parents who have not had educational opportunities, or from broken homes. . . .

Wirtz said he was of the firm opinion that unless action of this kind is initiated, young people will continue to be jobless, and the "cycle will start all over again."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE PRESENT GUESS about the probable results of the Mar. 10 Republican presidential primary in New Hampshire is that they will be totally inconclusive. So many candidates now seem certain to be entered, in one way or another, that what once shaped up as a head-on clash between Gov. Rockefeller and Sen. Goldwater has become murky and confused.

Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge will have delegates "favorable" to him. So will Gov. Scranton of Pennsylvania. Harold Stassen, who in the last 20 years hasn't stopped running for almost any office that came up for grabs, will have his name on the ballot. Former Vice Pres. Nixon will be represented by a slate of "favorable" delegates and Nixon is reported by the eminent pollster, Louis Harris, to be "far ahead" of other potential GOP nominees.

Besides, Sen. Margaret Chase Smith of Maine has declared herself an open candidate for the nomination, and her name will be on the ballot. Mrs. Smith's speech in announcing her candidacy was an impressive affair. She isn't the first woman to run but she is the first with sound credentials in political experience and a conscientious record of public service.

Rockefeller and Goldwater are the only candidates with fully-equipped organizations and the assembled money to run the traditional kind of primary race. But a New Hampshire newspaper, observing the plethora of aspirants, suggests that a good many of the state's Republican voters may be confused enough to vote for "I. M. Undecided."

THE GOLDWATER RECORD for the past couple of months is that of a candidate running down hill. It is not only the changed circumstances of his southern prospects, now that Mr. Johnson of Texas will be the Democratic nominee, but also the impression he has given in public appearances of thinness and of astonishing ineptness in discussing serious public affairs.

His Meet the Press performance early in January could be described only as a disaster and reports of his New Hampshire campaigning indicate that he has baffled audiences with inconsistencies and with comments best described as enigmatic.

Gov. Rockefeller, on the other hand, has picked up impressive support among party figures, including Sen. Kuchel of California as his state campaign manager. But Rockefeller started from so far back, because of the plunge in his prestige following his remarriage, that he faces the same problem John F. Kennedy had in 1960; he is compelled to prove his appeal by winning primaries.

He is running out of primaries in which to establish himself. He cannot try Pennsylvania, because Scranton wants to head an uncommitted delegation, or Wisconsin, where Rep. John Byrnes got agreement that he could be a favorite-son candidate.

Maryland, West Virginia and the District of Columbia are available to him, but the only big industrial state remaining is California in June, with the Oregon primary in May intervening. The Illinois primary is merely a popularity contest, with no binding effect on delegates.

IT IS EASY ENOUGH, therefore, to speculate that the principal effect of the once-exclusive Rockefeller-Goldwater race will be to kill off both men, with the convention in July turning to some other candidate. The names most frequently mentioned are Nixon and Scranton, and Nixon—who is by no means unperceptive in judging political trends—now is openly inviting a "draft."

A truly impressive California victory for Rockefeller might alter the picture; if he should roll up impressive totals wherever he runs his position would be greatly strengthened. But the California primary comes so late—only about five weeks before the convention—that the timing runs against him.

The best bet is simply that the one-time "southern strategy" pushed by Goldwater advocates—a dogma about winning the election with southern and Mountain State electoral votes added to the midwestern GOP heartland—is dead. The candidate, whoever he is, will feel compelled to try to beat Mr. Johnson by appealing to northeastern industrial state voters.

THE WAR ON POVERTY should begin with the youth of 18 who do not qualify for military service, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, chairman of the President's Task Force on Manpower Conservation, declared in an interview with Harry W. Flannery (left) on the AFL-CIO public service radio program Washington Reports to the People.

coln Day addresses.

Faced with a committee revolt, Smith declared:

"I have been here long enough to know the facts of life. This bill is going to have to go to the floor, and it will have to go pretty soon."

The committee agreed to cut off hearings Jan. 30 and vote a rule clearing the way for an immediate start of debate.

The bill came to the showdown with strong bipartisan support led by Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) of the Judiciary Committee and the committee's senior Republican, Rep. William M. McCulloch (O.).

After expected passage, the battle will shift to the Senate, where a southern Democratic filibuster is certain. Administration leaders estimate they will need close to 25 Republicans joining 40 to 45 Democrats to break a filibuster by the required two-thirds vote and pass an effective bill.

The Senate Labor Committee, by a 12-3 vote, recently approved a fair employment bill with broader coverage and simpler enforcement than the provision in the House civil rights measure. The votes against the bill were cast by Chairman Lister Hill (D-Ala.), Sen. John G. Tower (R-Tex.) and Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.).

Elders Spurred In Medicare Fight

Members of the Golden Ring Council of Senior Citizens who came to Washington to testify and lobby for social security hospital care were encouraged to continue their campaign by speakers at a luncheon held in the Senate Office Building.

The 125-member delegation was addressed by New York's Mayor Robert Wagner, Senators Kenneth B. Keating (R-N.Y.) and Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), Assistant Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Wilbur J. Cohen, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank and AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.

The council is a national non-partisan, non-sectarian federation of trade union retirees and golden age clubs of churches, synagogues and community centers. Zalmen J. Lichtenstein is the executive director, Adolph Held is president, and David Sullivan, president of the Building Service Employes, is vice president.

CPI Closes Year In Rising Trend

The cost-of-living index climbed two-tenths of 1 percent during December to end the year at 107.6—the equivalent of a $10.76 charge for consumer expenditures which would have cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period.

The rise over the year was 1.7 percent, the highest annual increase in five years of relative price stability. The average of the consumer price index in 1963, however, was only 1.2 percent above the average for 1962.

and therefore were inconsistent with federal law.

The AFL-CIO memorandum recalled that similar disqualifications had been proposed in 1959 in Alaska and Oregon and in 1963 in Wyoming, Oregon and Idaho as well as South Dakota.

All were withdrawn or failed to pass, however, with the exception of the South Dakota measure. The memorandum noted, too, that many other proposals advancing "needs" concepts had been put forth in recent years to alter state jobless insurance laws.

The federation's social security experts observed that the President's Labor Management Advisory Committee had cited "grave problems" of joblessness flowing from automation and had urged major improvements in duration, coverage and amount of unemployment compensation as well as supplementary benefits paid by employers.

If the South Dakota amendment were upheld, the memorandum declared, it would create "a major obstacle" to meeting these recommendations and "open a Pandora's box of notions alien to wage insurance that will completely alter the program.

AFL-CIO Analysts Report:

Social Security 'Only Device' To Give Elders Hospital Care

The age group which most needs hospital care is the group least able to pay for it.

This bitter paradox hangs over one-tenth of the nation—18 million Americans over the age of 65. It is the cornerstone of the case for a social security hospital care program.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Research has documented—with facts, statistics and charts—what it terms "The Health Care Tragedy of Older Americans" and has analyzed the various proposed solutions. The department's findings were featured in the Labor's Economic Review section of the January issue of the American Federationist, official AFL-CIO monthly magazine.

Scope of Health Problem

Here are some of the facts cited to demonstrate the scope of the health care problem of the elderly:

- More than two-thirds of those over 65 have some chronic ailment, such as arthritis, diabetes or heart disease.
- Those over 65 require three times as much hospital care as younger people. The annual hospitalization rate per 1,000 people in a recent year was 2,800 days for the elderly and only 900 days for persons under 65.
- Average medical care expenses for older persons in 1961 were more than twice those of the younger age group. Half the older individuals who are hospitalized during any one year have an annual medical bill of more than $700.
- The average daily expense of hospital care rocketed from $9.39 in 1946 to $34.98 in 1961.

A report by the President's Council on Aging pointed up another phase of the health care problem in these words:

"Many older Americans do not get the care they need because they are too proud to accept charity or outside financial help. And they do not want to be a burden on their families."

At a time when their medical costs are mounting, the incomes of those over 65, on the average, drop to less than half of those under 65. More than 30 percent of all elderly couples have less than $100 in assets which can be readily converted to cash, and nearly half the aged have less than $1,000 in assets. Not only do older persons have considerably less hospitalization insurance than younger people, but the insurance they do have covers a smaller portion of the hospital bill.

Against this backdrop, the Research Dept. analyzed the major proposed solutions:

Private Health Insurance: After examining the principal programs available to older persons, both through Blue Cross and commercial insurance companies, AFL-CIO economists conclude that the aged face a choice between "a low-cost policy whose coverage is practically meaningless" or a comprehensive policy at a most prohibitively high.

Federal subsidies to private insurance: "There is no sound reason," for the government to use its power "to provide revenues for private business."

Kerr-Mills Act: Although it was the intent of Congress to provide a medical assistance program for those who need help, even though not on welfare rolls, most of the states which have adopted programs imposed strict eligibility standards, requiring financial investigations of both the applicants and their children. Only a tiny minority of the aged have received help through this program.

King-Anderson bill: This would establish a national insurance program, under the social security system, to provide financial protection to all older people against the major costs of hospital care and hospital-related health services.

"Social security is the only device which is able to spread the risk of illness and the cost of huge hospital bills in two dimensions.

"It first covers the entire working population and thereby balances losses at the lowest cost per person of any insurance program. It secondly extends over the entire working period of workers' lives and thereby accumulates premiums large enough to cover the costs of future hospital care."

Comparisons Between Senate, House Tax Bills

Cuts for Individuals: Senate and House bills are identical, with two-thirds of the tax cut to take effect the first year, the balance in the second year.

The tax rate would range from 14 percent in the bottom bracket to 70 percent at the top, compared with the present 20 to 91 percent range. The average taxpayer would pay about 20 percent less than at present. A typical wage-earner would receive the equivalent of a 7.5-cent hourly raise in take-home pay.

The lowest income bracket—now taxed at 20 percent—is currently the first $2,000 of taxable income for an individual and $4,000 for couples. This would be subdivided into four equal brackets, with the tax rate beginning at 14 percent for the lowest bracket and moving up to 17 percent at the top.

Withholding Tax: The House bill would drop the present 18 percent payroll withholding rate to 15 percent for 1964, and 14 percent in 1965. The Senate bill, in recognition of the lag in passage of the measure, would drop the rate to 14 percent immediately.

This would give most taxpayers the full impact of the tax cut immediately and would speed up the stimulus to the economy.

Minimum Standard Deduction: Both House and Senate bills provide an alternative to the present minimum standard deduction of 10 percent of income, up to $1,000, for persons who do not itemize their deductions. They could take, instead, a $300 deduction for the taxpayer plus $100 for each dependent. This would benefit low-income taxpayers and moderate-income families with children and would remove about 1.5 million persons from the tax rolls.

Cuts for Corporations: Both bills would drop the top tax rate on corporate profits from 52 percent to 50 percent this year and to 48 percent in 1965. Smaller companies would benefit from an immediate drop from 30 to 22 percent on the first $25,000 of profits.

Dividend Tax Credit: Under present law, a stockholder may subtract 4 percent of his dividend income from his tax bill. This provision, described by the AFL-CIO as a "special privilege for wealthy stockholders," would be abolished in two steps in both the House and Senate bills. However, the amount of dividend income which is tax free would be doubled from the present $50 for an individual and $100 for a couple.

Sick Pay Exclusion: Under present law, persons who receive sick pay can exclude up to $100 a week from their pay, beginning with the first day of hospitalization or the seventh day of a non-hospitalized illness. Both House and Senate bills would remove this exclusion until after 30 days of illness. This would impose a particular hardship on workers under negotiated agreements which provide 50 to 70 percent of regular pay during illness.

Child Care Deductions: Deductions for child care by one-adult families such as widows and widowers, and by low-income families where both parents work, are liberalized slightly in the House bill, more so in the Senate committee bill. At present the maximum child care deduction is $600, and working wives can qualify for the maximum only if the joint family income is under $4,500. The House voted to allow a $900 deduction for child care expenses of two or more children under the age of 13. The Senate bill would allow up to $1,000 for three or more children and boost the ceiling on joint earnings of husband and wife to $7,000.

Political Contributions: The Senate bill, but not the House version, would allow a tax deduction of up to $50 for an individual or $100 for a couple for contributions to a political candidate or campaign committee.

Capital Gains Tax: The House bill would widen the capital gains tax loophole by dropping the maximum levy on profits from the sale of stock and real estate from 25 percent to 21 percent. The Senate committee rejected this change.

Investment Credit: Both bills would grant corporations an additional tax bonus when they buy new machinery.

In 1962, Congress gave corporations a tax credit of up to 7 percent of the price of machines they buy. The new bill would permit them to depreciate (write off) the total cost of machinery for tax purposes, including the 7 percent on which they took a tax credit.

The Senate and House bills would also prohibit federal regulatory agencies from ordering public utilities to pass on to consumers the money they save from the investment credit on the purchase of machinery.

Itemized Deductions: The House bill, but not the Senate committee measure, would bar itemized deductions for payments of state and local gasoline taxes and auto tags.

At Georgetown Forum:

Spotlight on Poverty Held 1st Step in 'War'

Pres. Johnson's call for an all-out war on poverty in America has focused public attention on the deprivation suffered by some 30 million Americans at the bottom edge of the economy, it was generally agreed by participants in a Georgetown University seminar on Poverty in Plenty.

It was also widely agreed that while the President's call may represent a needed awakening of the nation's conscience, the $500 million of spending he has proposed for the first year of the program can produce at best only a small beginning.

The Swedish economist, Gunnar Myrdal, who in his opening address called the elimination of poverty "a moral imperative" for the United States, nevertheless warned that the problem is so vast it demands extensive national planning.

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger, participating in a panel with Dwight Macdonald of the New Yorker magazine and Charles R. Bowen, education director for Intl. Business Machines Corp., called for a change in national "thinking" on economic and social issues and a shift in basic policies "from the regressive and growth-inhibiting policies of the past decade."

An "expansionary economic policy," Goldfinger said, is vital to achieve sustained full employment as rapidly as possible, but to make rapid inroads against hard-core poverty over the next 10 years will require income distribution programs as well.

He called for a series of measures to lift incomes and job opportunities for the poorest segment of society at a faster rate than the general rise for the nation as a whole.

Aids Cited

Among these, Goldfinger listed aid to distressed areas, relocation allowances to help unemployed workers move to areas where jobs are available, a higher minimum wage and broader coverage, improvements in jobless insurance and workmen's compensation benefits, increased social security disability and retirement benefits and extension of the system to hospital insurance for the aged, a public housing program much bigger than the current rate of 30,000 units a year and an upgrading of our entire educational and vocational training system.

Goldfinger's remarks underscored Myrdal's thesis that while economic expansion is a prerequisite to the elimination of joblessness and the beginning of a major attack on poverty, huge public expenditures in social reforms also are necessary, ending the "relative niggardliness" of America in comparison to other advanced nations.

Among other speakers at the seminar, held in conjunction with Georgetown's 175th anniversary, were:

Economists Oscar Ornati and Robert Theobald; Michael Harrington, author of The Other America; Leon H. Keyserling, chairman of former Pres. Truman's Council of Economic Advisers; Rev. Benjamin L. Masse, S.J., editor of the Jesuit weekly, America; Wilbur J. Cohen, assistant secretary of health, education and welfare; and Burton Weisbrod, who presented a paper on behalf of Walter W. Heller, chairman of Johnson's CEA.

Kircher Named Aide to Livingston

William L. Kircher has been named by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Organization. Kircher has been assistant AFL-CIO regional director in Ohio, with headquarters in Cincinnati. He will work out of Washington under Dir. of Organization John Livingston.

IUE to Aid Its Retirees, Unemployed

East Lansing, Mich.—The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers is starting to organize Unemployed & Retired Workers' Councils for retired or jobless workers whose normal occupation was a job in a plant where bargaining rights were held by the IUE, Pres. James B. Carey announced here:

Speaking Jan. 28 at Michigan State University, Carey told an audience at the School of Labor & Industrial Relations that the IUE is "deeply concerned" about those who are no longer gainfully employed, and is not satisfied with the "barely visible progress that stems from industry predictions and present government programs."

"For many of our members, technological displacement is not an economic theory; it is a brutal fact," the IUE president said. "Unemployment is not a Labor Dept. notation; it is a loss of income when a family must be supported."

The IUE will seek to organize councils in all major communities for retired and unemployed workers formerly covered by contract, Carey announced.

Each council will have its own charter with nominal dues, and will be encouraged to work with IUE locals, with state organizations and the international headquarters on political and economic action, including an effort to find new plants willing to hire a skilled labor force.

Six States Join in Banning Job Discrimination in '63

Six states passed or strengthened laws prohibiting discrimination in employment last year, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Boris Shishkin reported.

Fair employment laws were passed for the first time in Hawaii, Iowa and Vermont, while Indiana provided for enforcement of its previously voluntary law.

Colorado made its ban on job discrimination applicable to apprenticeship programs and the Maine legislature voted to require a nondiscrimination provision in standards for apprenticeship agreements.

Both Hawaii and Nebraska barred job discrimination because of age, Shishkin reported. He said 25 states and Puerto Rico now have mandatory fair employment laws and 18 jurisdictions bar age discrimination.

Mayor Nicholas Franco, left, who signed the new ordinance, exchanges a handshake with Lew Hermann, legislative representative of the Typographical Union. At right is Pres. William Brown of Local 1335, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, a leader in the Orange labor movement's campaign for the anti-strikebreaker law.

Banned Unionist Given Guiana Court Hearing

Georgetown, British Guiana—A magistrate's court here will begin hearings Feb. 5 on an appeal by a U.S. trade unionist from a government expulsion order labeling him a "prohibited immigrant."

Gene Meakins, a Newspaper Guild member working on assignment with the Guiana labor movement, will be permitted to remain in the country while the courts decide the issue.

Magistrate Frank Vieira set the hearing date after rejecting the argument of a police legal adviser that Meakins was not entitled to an appeal, even though the government of Prime Minister Cheddi Jagan gave no reason for the expulsion order.

Meakins, 36, is a former vice president of the Guild's national local of wire service employes. He is on leave of absence from the Denver bureau of United Press Intl. while advising the British Guiana Trades Union Council on public relations matters. He came here last Sept. 23 at the TUC's request as a special representative of the Inter-American Federation of Working Newspapermen's Organizations, which includes among its member unions the Guild, the Printers' Industrial Union here and 24 other newsmen's organizations in the hemisphere.

He has been working directly with the TUC, which is an affiliate of the Caribbean Congress of Labor, the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) and the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Meakins' work here has included establishing a daily radio program of union news and education sponsored by the TUC; helping Guiana's largest union, the Man-Power Citizens' Association (MPCA) with its weekly paper, the "Labor Advocate"—the only free trade union publication in the country—and assisting the printers' union in preparations for contract negotiations.

TUC Pres. Richard Ishmael, who also heads the MPCA, labeled the expulsion order "a deliberate attack on the free trade union movement" and the latest in a series of attempts by the pro-Communist Jagan government to destroy organized free labor here.

Jagan's Peoples' Progressive Party (PPP) controls the government even though it won fewer than 50 percent of the votes in the 1961 election. British Guiana does not have independence from Great Britain, but does have internal self-rule.

Last summer, the TUC unions won a major victory in an 80-day general strike which forced the government to withdraw its proposals for legislation which would have controlled unions politically.

In announcing the TUC's determination to press Meakins' appeal through the courts, Ishmael said the declaration that the U.S. newsman is a "prohibited immigrant" amounts to labeling the TUC as subversive.

Meakins, accompanied by his wife, Shirley, and their two children, came here on a three-month visa. His request for a six-month extension was denied without explanation and he was to leave the country by Jan. 15. The announcement of the ban, TUC officials noted, came the same week the government lifted a 10-year-old barrier against Richard Hart, a Jamaican lawyer.

The British barred Hart in 1953 when they suspended the British Guiana constitution, noting his connection with a Jagan move to have the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade unions take over the labor movement here.

Meany Greets Union Parley In Turkey

The AFL-CIO shares the pride Turk-Is must feel in its accomplishments since the Turkish labor federation was founded in 1952, Pres. George Meany said in a message to the organization's fifth general congress.

"We have followed your growth and responsible organizational development with an awareness reserved for close friends, and our admiration for your accomplishments has not abated," he said.

"With the passage of the trade union law and the collective bargaining, strike and lock-out law, Turkish labor has taken a step forward in the development of a free labor movement. With the ever-increasing knowledge and experience your leaders are assimilating, the primary obstacles are now successfully overcome; and the hard work of organizing and educating loyal union memberships should become a priority function," Meany continued.

"Nor can your days be spent in looking inward. Like ourselves, you have a stake in democracy and the free world. A threat to freedom and democratic trade unions anywhere in this world is a threat to free society and our way of life.

"We salute you as a nation which has borne the burning heat of ideological opposition with calm efficiency. Let no one feel that the American worker has not recognized the heroism of your deeds, whether at home or in Korea. We are brothers not only because we are workers, but because we share the same thoughts and hearts.

"I join with you and extend to you the heartfelt and most sincere greetings of the AFL-CIO and wish you a most successful congress."

Union Asks Revision In Dumping Act Rules

The Steelworkers have urged the Treasury Dept. to revise procedures it follows in administering the Anti-Dumping Act to permit U.S. firms claiming an adverse effect from imports to present evidence in their own behalf and answer any evidence presented against them.

USWA Counsel David E. Feller, in a statement submitted to the department at hearings on proposed changes in the 42-year-old law and its administration, criticized the present practice of "treating virtually all information as confidential."

Without making specific proposals, Feller urged the Treasury Dept. to try to develop procedures that "at least approximate" the "due process" requirements of the Constitution in cases where life, liberty or property are at stake.

The Anti-Dumping Act, in general terms, is designed to protect domestic industry against heavy sales of imported goods at "less than fair value"—in effect, cut-rate pricing.

Feller said that the USWA had consistently supported free trade policies and opposed protectionism, but declared that dumping is "unfair competition," not free trade. While the USWA statement, he said, was not submitted either to support or oppose substantive changes in regulations sought by the steel industry, he urged the department to give these proposals "the most careful and serious consideration."

In urging revised administrative procedures, the steel union counsel rejected the argument that foreign producers would be unwilling to provide information unless they were assured it would not fall into the hands of American competitors. Most of this information is available through normal trade channels, he said, and the Treasury Dept. itself could determine what types of information should properly be treated as confidential.

"It seems to me," he continued, "that the foreign exporters have as much to gain as their domestic competitors from a procedure which provides each side with a maximum opportunity to examine and respond to adverse evidence.

"What I am urging is not a one-side access to evidence but a hearing—a procedure not calculated to give either side an unfair advantage. Such a procedure . . . is designed to promote fair administration of the act, and that would appear to be in everyone's interest."

'A Decent Home for Every Family':

Johnson Asks Aid for Suburbia, More Housing, Slum Clearance

By John M. Barry

Extended programs of public housing and urban renewal and a new proposal for federal aid in the development of suburban communities were key provisions urged by Pres. Johnson in his special housing message to Congress.

Noting that the 100,000 public housing units authorized in the Housing Act of 1961 are now fully committed, the President called on Congress to provide for construction, purchase and lease of 240,000 more units over a four-year period, doubling the present rate.

His message made it clear that adequate shelter for low-income families would be a major objective of the "war on poverty" the Administration has urged the nation to undertake.

"Whether we achieve our goal of a decent home in a decent neighborhood for every American family rests, in large measure, on the actions we take now," the President declared.

Legislation embodying most of Johnson's housing proposals was introduced by Sen. John Sparkman and Rep. Albert Rains, the Alabama Democrats who head the housing subcommittees of Senate and House. Hearings were scheduled to open Feb. 3 before the Senate group and Feb. 17 on the House side.

A bill to implement the President's request that the Housing & Home Finance Agency be elevated to a Cabinet-level department was introduced by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) and co-sponsored by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.). An almost identical proposal by the late Pres. Kennedy for creation of a Dept. of Urban Affairs & Housing had strong labor support but was rejected by Congress.

Johnson also called for "early enactment" of the mass transit program proposed by Kennedy and approved by the Senate.

And he pledged continued efforts to translate "into meaningful practice" Kennedy's executive order barring racial discrimination in federally-assisted housing.

The major new proposal in the President's message would set up a system of federal aid to make sure that expansion of communities and suburban areas is not carried out "in a sprawling, space-consuming, unplanned and uneconomic way."

The program calls for:

- Grants and loans to state and local governments to plan and provide the public facilities needed by entirely new towns and cities being pioneered by private developers.
- Loan insurance to aid developers constructing such new communities.
- Public facility loans to local governments, with deferred payments, to enable them to build sewer and water systems and other facilities in advance of anticipated growth.
- Public facility loans to states and communities, with deferred payments, to buy or option land they will need in the future for school sites, rights-of-way and other facilities to serve expanding populations.

In the area of public housing, the President recommended 50,000 additional units a year over the next four years. The total would consist mostly of new construction, but would provide also for the purchase and rehabilitation of a number of units originally built for private housing purposes.

In addition, Johnson recommended that local housing authorities be empowered to lease existing privately built housing, to a maximum of 10,000 units a year over the four-year period.

Other features of the Administration housing program call for:

- Extension of low-interest direct federal loans for housing for the moderate-income elderly, replenishing authorizations that will soon be exhausted and permitting $100 million in loans during the next fiscal year.
- Revision of eligibility requirements to permit single elderly persons to benefit from special housing for the aged.
- A stepped-up program of loans and loan insurance for rural housing and legislation to help the housing needs of farm laborers, particularly migrant workers.
- Authority for the Federal Housing Administration and the Veterans Administration to finance the correction of "substantial" structural defects that develop in housing approved by either of the agencies.
- Legislation strengthening FHA forebearance procedures to encourage postponement of foreclosures against homeowners who default on their mortgages "through circumstances beyond their control."
- An increase in the maximum mortgage the FHA will insure on a single-family home from $25,000 to $30,000.
- An additional $1.4 billion in urban renewal funds over the next two years to continue the program. The original authorization of $4 billion under the Housing Act of 1961 all will be earmarked by the end of the current fiscal year.
- Additional allowances to aid low and moderate-income families and small businesses displaced by urban renewal projects.
- A program of federal insurance and low-interest loans, with deferred payment of principal, to help elderly homeowners rehabilitate their existing housing.

Performers are from Lincoln Center, Manhattan, also built with labor support.

New Farm-Labor Ties Urged for Mutual Aid

Trenton, N. J.—Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers called on farm leaders taking part in an agricultural forum here to help "re-forge the political and economic links" between the farmer and the worker based on their "essential unity of interests."

Beirne, who is also an AFL-CIO vice president, represented Federation Pres. George Meany as one of the principal speakers at the state-sponsored forum called by Gov. Richard J. Hughes.

Both Have Stakes

Observing that agriculture and labor both have stakes in a full employment economy and are both affected by technological change, Beirne declared that despite this identity of interests "we have too seldom acted togther for the solution of our common problems."

He noted that in the past legislators from rural areas were among supporters of anti-union laws and that, on the other hand, there were periods when the labor movement insisted on high tariffs at the expense of the farm community.

"In all candor I must tell you that the labor movement has moved faster and further in support of farm legislation than the other way around," declared Beirne.

He cited the AFL-CIO's support over the years for basic farm legislation and such auxiliary programs as rural electrification, rural housing and area redevelopment, and he urged farmers to reciprocate by backing improved wage-hour legislation, urban renewal and other programs of concern to the city worker.

Beirne emphasized that his appeal was not put in terms of "you scratch my back and I'll scratch yours," but was directed to the point that farmers and workers are dependent on each other for prosperity.

"Poor farmers and poor workers only add up to a poor nation," he declared, adding that by working together, "we can accomplish great things for America."

Dress Firm, ILGWU Form Study Group

New York—Establishment of a continuing labor relations committee to study contract problems and recommend solutions has been announced by Pres. David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers and Pres. Maurice Saltzman of Bobbie Brooks, Inc., women's apparel maker whose 7,000 employes produce $80 million in merchandise annually.

The two men said David L. Cole, arbitrator who advises other unions and industries, will serve as committee chairman. The committee will meet on call to discuss any problem placed before it, and its recommendations must have the consent of both parties to become effective.

The parties since Jan. 1, 1961, have been bound by a company-wide agreement, the first negotiated by the ILGWU.

The union said the committee is the first of its kind in the garment industry, though other industries have joined the trend toward study groups. The plan is designed, it said, to avoid crisis negotiations at the 11th hour in bargaining.

Fund-Raising Unit Withdraws Chart

The National Foundation-March of Dimes has withdrawn from use in one of its brochures a chart depicting high administrative costs of government health and welfare programs.

The chart was withdrawn after it was called to the attention of the National Foundation by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security and Community Services Committee, that there was no factual basis for the allegation.

The National Foundation has notified the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare that it is eliminating the chart showing government administrative costs of health and welfare programs far exceeding costs of private agencies.

House Backs Fringes Under Davis-Bacon Act

an amendment to subject Davis-Bacon wage determinations to court review would have been out of order as not germane to the pending bill. Supporters of judicial review, led by Rep. Charles E. Goodell (R-N.Y.) and Rep. Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.), sought to prevent the adoption of the rule and rewrite it to make the judicial review proposal in order.

Maneuver Beaten Back

This maneuver lost by an impressive 297-105 vote—a margin large enough to assure supporters that the fringe benefit bill, which has been introduced in each Congress since 1955, would have smooth sailing.

Opponents went through the motions of seeking to limit the effectiveness of the bill through roundabout methods—including an attempt to impose judicial review on the fringe benefit determinations only. But these were routinely defeated and, with Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) as floor manager, the measure was opposed by only a small hard core of opponents on final passage.

AFL-CIO building trades unions, most directly affected, led the drive for the bill with active backing from all segments of the labor movement

Fringe benefits specifically listed in the bill as a factor in the calculation of prevailing wages include medical care, pensions, insurance, disability and sickness benefits, vacation and holiday pay, and apprenticeship programs.

The Labor Dept. took some of the steam out of the demand for judicial review earlier this month by announcing that it would establish an appeals board to provide an impartial review, on request, of area wage determinations.

The department contended that it would be unworkable to provide court review of the thousands of separate wage determinations made each year.

A brief submitted by attorneys for unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. pointed out that giving the courts a final say on wage determinations would force contractors to "gamble" on the court decision in making cost estimates.

Chicago Negro Doctors Win Anti-Bias Accord

rective action. In case of noncompliance, an offending hospital may be expelled from the Chicago Hospital Council and, if discriminatory conduct is flagrant or widespread, the doctors who brought the suit may renew their anti-trust action within the next two years.

Since the doctors filed their suit under the anti-trust laws, the number of Negro physicians admitted to the 56 defendant hospitals has grown from 5 to 58 and further admissions are expected under court supervision of the agreement.

Discriminatory practices against Negro physicians in Chicago hospitals, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared on Nov. 13, 1962, are a proper concern of labor since they affect the operation of union-negotiated health and welfare plans and "run contrary to the principle of improving the quality of medical care" long supported by labor and others.

The issue, the council said, is "essentially a matter of making high quality health services available to all citizens, with assurance of free choice of physician and hospital." An initial grant of $5,000 was made to assist the Chicago physicians to pursue their legal action and other aid was given later.

The suit was brought to the council's attention by the Chicago Flat Janitors Union, Local 1 of the Building Service Employes. The council declared that the suit presented "more than a local issue since the decision there will affect similar practices" throughout America.

Passage Expected:

Senate Nears Vote On Tax Slash Bill

By David L. Perlman

A tax cut bill designed to give the nation's economy a multi-billion dollar injection of buying power was on the verge of Senate passage as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Its principal provisions closely match the bill passed by the House last September, and for most workers it would have the effect of a 7.5-cent hourly increase in take-home pay. The slash is "essential," the AFL-CIO has said, "to open up more job opportunities."

During the first week of debate, the Senate backed the Administration—and the position taken by labor—on three key votes which centered on the issue of special tax relief for the well-to-do.

The issues and votes were as follows:

Dividend Credit—Under existing law, persons whose income comes from dividends on stock are taxed at a lower rate than persons whose income comes from wages.

This bonus for wealthy stockholders, termed "unjustifiable" by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller in a letter to senators, costs the government more than $300 million in lost revenue.

The House closed this loophole by eliminating the 4 percent tax credit on dividend income, and the Senate Finance Committee followed suit. Senate Republicans, led by GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.), tried to restore a modified version but was narrowly defeated, 47-44. All votes to beat it came from the Democratic side of the aisle, while 13 Democrats joined 31 Republicans for the amendment.

FEP Called Essential to Rights Bill

Hailing the civil rights bill as "the most important moral issue" on which Congress will vote this year, the AFL-CIO called on the House to reject any attempt to weaken or kill the equal employment opportunity guarantee.

At the halfway point in the House debate, a bipartisan northern coalition had beaten back a series of crippling amendments to the bill's public accommodations and voting rights provisions. Southern Democrats had picked up some GOP votes, primarily from the Midwest, but had not been able to force any major changes in the Judiciary Committee's broad-ranging bill.

As the showdown neared on a key fair employment clause, the AFL-CIO reiterated in strong terms that labor considers the job discrimination ban essential to the bill and vigorously opposes any move to sacrifice it as a sop to opponents of civil rights.

Employes Coerced, NLRB Vote Quashed

Tactics used by a big non-union construction firm in a 1961 National Labor Relations Board election infringed the labor laws and a new election will be necessary, the NLRB has ruled.

Board members voted 4-0 to set aside the results of an election held among 1,500 Daniel Construction Co. workers at 50 jobsites in North and South Carolina, Georgia and Tennessee.

The board, upholding charges by the Plumbers, found that higher management officials had coerced employes in the exercise of their right to decide freely whether to join the union and had also expressly authorized certain foremen to engage in such misconduct as:

- Interrogating employes about union sympathies.
- Threatening them with reprisals if they voted for the union.
- Using a no-solicitation rule as a pretext to discourage union support.
- Conducting repeated secret polls of worker sentiment toward unions without any legitimate reason.

A union spokesman said the NLRB ruling is "good for the construction industry," but left unanswered some of the questions raised by the Plumbers in the original charges that the election was "tainted." The union asked the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia to review the ruling for its failure to find other law violations in management's conduct.

The Daniel firm is said to be the second largest general construction company in the United States.

A majority of Daniel's construction employes joined the union prior to the election, the Plumbers said, and the NLRB conducted balloting in two parts from Nov. 16 through 21, 1961. At various jobsites the vote was about 300 for the union, about 600 against. Some 651 workers cast mail ballots but the tabulation was held up when the union

January Total Up 700,000

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's unemployment picture remained dark in the first month of the new year as the jobless rate edged up to 5.6 percent, according to the Labor Dept.'s summary job report for January.

The ranks of the jobless swelled by 700,000 between December and January to a total of 4.6 million—"about the usual increase for this time of year," the report said.

"Adult workers looking for full-time jobs accounted for all the over-the-month rise in unemployment," the report added.

Total employment fell by 1.4 million, all in the non-farm sector, to 67.2 million. The report called this drop "slightly less than usual for January."

The key 5.6 percent jobless rate, adjusted to take account of seasonal influences, compares to 5.5 percent for December and to 5.7 percent in January a year ago.

The January report showed a slight improvement for some groups and a slight worsening for others.

For adult men, the jobless rate held at 4.3 percent, the same as in December. Over the year this rate was down from the 4.8 percent recorded in January 1963. Adult women showed a rate of 5.5 percent in January, up from December's 5.3 percent and almost unchanged from the 5.4 percent of January 1963.

Teenage Rate Climbs

The teenage jobless rate, however, jumped over the year. It moved up from 14.7 in December to 14.9 percent in January; a year ago it was 14.1 percent.

Johnson Asks Extension of FLSA, Double Overtime in Some Industries

By John M. Barry

Pres. Johnson has submitted to Congress draft legislation aimed at opening up job opportunities by requiring doubletime pay for overtime work in certain industries and extending the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act's wage and hour protections.

The bills follow up proposals by the President in his State of the Union message Jan. 8.

The overtime measure would authorize industry committees named by the secretary of labor—with equal representation from the public, workers and employers—to fix a ceiling on working hours in a given industry beyond which doubletime rates would be required.

The second bill would extend coverage of the FLSA for the first time to 735,000 workers, mostly in hotels, restaurants and laundries, and set maximum standard workweeks for 1,881,000 workers now exempt from the act's overtime protection.

Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.) promptly introduced the legislation in the Senate. On the House side, Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) sponsored the bill to extend coverage of the wage-hour law and Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) introduced the overtime measure.

House hearings on the FLSA extension were scheduled to open Feb. 7, with Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz set as the leadoff witness before the General Subcommittee on Labor headed by Roosevelt. Starting Feb. 17, the Roosevelt subcommittee will sit with the Select Labor Subcommittee headed by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.) for hearings on the overtime bill. Wirtz again will present the opening testimony.

In a letter transmitting the draft bills to Congress, Johnson said the proposed legislation would be "another step toward our goal of eliminating labor conditions detrimental to the maintenance of a minimum standard of living necessary for health, efficiency and general well-being."

The President also forwarded to Congress a letter from Wirtz noting

Chicago AFL-CIO Hikes Per Capita

Chicago—An increase in per capita from 3 to 5 cents per member per month was voted by the Chicago AFL-CIO.

Discussion at the monthly meeting of the body indicated that the additional funds would be used in part to expand COPE activities and place political education on a permanent, year-round basis.

The delegates' action supported a recommendation by the central labor body's executive council urging the increase in per capita to finance expanding activities.

Candy Local Of 4,500 Joins ABC

New York—The 4,500-member Candy & Confectionery Workers Local 452 voted at a meeting here Jan. 31 to leave the expelled Bakery & Confectionery Workers and to join the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

Members first voted to accept the recommendation of the local executive board for reunion with the main stream of labor represented by the AFL-CIO. After the vote, ABC Executive Vice Pres. John DeConcini presented a charter to the new ABC Local 452 and AFL-CIO Reg. Dir. Michael Mann congratulated members on their return.

The B&CW was expelled from the federation in 1957 on findings of domination by corrupt elements.

DeConcini said Local 452 is the largest U.S. local union of candy and confectionery workers. Its affiliation raises ABC membership to 90,000 and reduces B&CW membership to less than 60,000.

Pres. James Landriscina of Local 452 said members were "sick and tired of disunity" and were unhappy outside the AFL-CIO. He said that when AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany "made a sensible proposal" to bring about merger, officials of the B&CW "rejected the proposal and broke off negotiations."

Landriscina predicted that other B&CW local unions will take merger action.

Shishkin Gets Full Time Housing Role

Because of the importance of housing problems in America, Boris Shishkin, secretary of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee, will devote full time to that assignment, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced.

Meany said he was relieving Shishkin of other responsibilities, including the directorship of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights.

"The housing needs of America are tremendous," Meany said. "We have made substantial progress since Franklin Roosevelt reported that one-third of the nation was ill-housed. But, despite that progress, it must be reported in honesty that today one-fifth of the nation is ill-housed.

"The AFL-CIO has always given grave attention to this problem. We now think more can and should be done and Mr. Shishkin will devote his entire time to this matter."

Meany said that Don Slaiman, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, will become acting director.

Youth Programs Unified by Wirtz

Consolidation of the Labor Dept.'s manpower programs for youth under the Manpower Administration has been announced by Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

The move, he said, will "eliminate duplication of effort and the overlapping of programs," and will let the department "focus better all of its youth activities on the problems facing our young people."

Wirtz also announced that Samuel V. Merrick, special assistant to the secretary for legislative liaison, will direct the new program as assistant manpower administrator for youth programs. Merrick will retain his legislative liaison post and also will continue to serve as executive director of the President's Committee on Youth Employment.

January Jobless Rate Edges Up to 5.6%

—jumped to 1.1 million in January from December's 928,000.

The long-term jobless total has held stubbornly at about the 1 million mark for most of the past year. The figure for January compares to 1.2 million a year ago. The postwar high for the month was 1.4 million in the middle of the 1958-59 recession; the postwar low was the 268,000 in January 1953.

Half a million persons who had been jobless six months or longer were included in the January long-term unemployment total, the report said.

On the employment side of the picture, the total of 67.2 million jobholders, while down 1.4 million over the month, was 1.3 million higher than in January a year earlier.

The non-farm sector, which accounted for all the December-January decline, was up by 1.5 million over the year.

Agricultural employment, virtually unchanged over the month at 4 million, was down from the 4.2 million of a year ago, continuing the long-term decline in farm jobs.

Counted among the employed were 2.1 million non-farm workers on part-time for economic reasons. This total was about unchanged from December and was 150,000 lower than a year ago.

The overall labor force totaled 74.5 million in January, down 700,000 from December as "temporary Christmas-season workers" left the labor force, the report said.

The labor force gained 1.2 million over the year, about the same as the year-to-year rise recorded throughout 1963, the report added. It noted this increase was in line with long-term projections of labor force growth for the 1960s.

The summary report is based on household data produced by census surveys.

Two Seamen's Unions Agree on Pacific Fleets

San Francisco—The National Maritime Union and the Seafarers have agreed to suspend organizing rivalry in two major government fleets for the rest of this year.

The fleets are the Pacific Area Command of the Military Sea Transportation Service (MSTS), which operates Navy transport and service vessels manned by civil service crews, and the Portland, Ore., District of the Army Engineers, which operates civilian-manned dredges, tugs and support vessels.

The two unions, agreeing that further competition among both fleets might be destructive of trade union objectives, said they have reached this decision:

- The SIU will suspend its organizing campaign among unlicensed seamen employed by the Engineers in Portland and will not be on the ballot there throughout 1964.
- The NMU will stop trying to organize Pacific Area Command seamen and will withdraw from any representation election scheduled in that unit for the remainder of this year.

The agreement, reached by Vice Pres. Shannon J. Wall for the NMU and Vice Pres. Morris Weisberger of SIU, provides that neither union will interfere in the other's unit unless the active union fails to win exclusive recognition.

Both unions were on the ballot last year in a hotly contested MSTS election in which neither won a clear majority though 80 percent of the seamen voted for union representation. This year NMU applied for an election in the Portland unit and the SIU sought a place on the ballot, but now has agreed to withdraw.

Union Boycotts Adam Hat Firm

New York—The Hatters have launched a nationwide don't-buy campaign against Texas-Miller Products, Inc., makers of Adam Hats and other popular brands of men's headwear.

Pres. Alex Rose of the union said union central bodies in 600 cities have been asked to buy only union label headwear and to urge union members to refrain especially from buying Texas-Miller hats.

Besides Adam Hats, the company plant in Corsicana, Tex., makes Ashley, Dorsey Jay, Hampshire Club, Repell-X and Sea Spray brand hats.

Detroit White Collar Training Center Opens

Detroit—The international office of the Auto Workers and Local 412 have jointly opened the first union-sponsored white collar training center in Detroit under the Manpower Development & Training Act.

Referendum Date Set:

Oklahoma to Vote May 5 on 'R-T-W'

Oklahoma City—The voters of Oklahoma will decide May 5 whether to outlaw the union shop and the agency shop through a so-called "right-to-work" amendment to the state constitution.

The proposed amendment, put forth through an initiative petition supported by a right-wing coalition, will be on the ballot in the state's primary election.

"We are ready to take our case to the people," State AFL-CIO Pres. Roy Tillman declared. "Oklahoma working people and their friends will be out in force May 5 to vote 'No' and protect their pay checks."

Gov. Henry Bellmon (R), who set the ballot date after the State Supreme Court had upheld the petitions, said he will remain neutral and not participate in the campaign.

Oklahoma, a state almost entirely surrounded by "right-to-work" areas, has for years been a prime target of the nationwide union-busting effort.

The "work" petition campaign was launched two years ago after successive sessions of the legislature had refused to pass bills to ban the union shop or put the issue to referendum. The National Right-to-Work Committee and the statewide Oklahomans for Right-to-Work were joined by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's Committee for Voluntary Unionism, which held its first meeting in Oklahoma City to help plan the drive.

Professional Solicitors Used

With paid solicitors on the job, the "right-to-work" forces turned in more than 213,000 signatures—approximately 77,000 more than needed.

For nearly two years, opponents of "right-to-work" blocked the referendum by challenging signatures against voter registration rolls and by challenging other alleged irregularities, including pressure by employers. At the same time a counter-campaign was marshaled to publicize the disadvantages of "work" laws.

Last month, the Oklahoma State AFL-CIO convention served notice that labor will not support any candidate for public office who does not take a clear stand against the "right-to-work" proposal. The state body called on union members to finance, through voluntary contributions, a campaign to defeat the proposal.

Sponsors of the amendment had asked that the issue be presented to the voters as a constitutional amendment guaranteeing "freedom of choice" to belong or not to belong to a labor organization. State Atty. Gen. Charles Nesbitt ordered the wording revised, however, eliminating the "freedom of choice" phrase.

Tillman, calling on the state's voters to reject "right-to-work," declared:

Oklahoma Negroes Ask 'Work' Defeat

Oklahoma City—Four Oklahoma Negro leaders have called for defeat of this state's proposed "right-to-work" amendment, declaring it would mean fewer jobs, lower pay and substandard working conditions.

Jake Simmons, Jr., state NAACP president, said Negroes would bear the "heaviest burden" if union shop agreements were banned. He charged that "many of the same reactionaries" who have fought against civil rights are in the forefront of the "right-to-work" drive. He was joined in opposing the "work" proposal by E. Melvin Porter, president of the Oklahoma City NAACP; the Rev. Ben H. Hill, president of the Tulsa NAACP, and Mrs. Clara Luper, youth council adviser of the state organization.

"Oklahoma's economy today is at its peak and labor-management relations have never been better. Why ruin this happy situation with a law that will lower the entire state's economy to benefit a few big employers?"

This will be the first state referendum on the issue since 1958, when voters in five of six states where it was on the ballot defeated "right-to-work" proposals—along with most political candidates associated with the "work" forces.

Had the Oklahoma referendum been put on the general election ballot in November, it would have required a majority of those voting in the election—not just those actually voting on the referendum issue—to adopt the constitutional amendment. In the May 5 election, however, the amendment will carry if it gets more votes in favor than opposed.

COPE Area Parley In Des Moines

The AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education has announced cancellation of the COPE Area Conference scheduled for Des Moines, Ia., Mar. 15, and urged delegates from Iowa, Missouri and Kansas to attend the conference set for Mar. 17 at the Sheraton-Fontenelle Hotel, Omaha, Neb.

OKLAHOMA AFL-CIO at its convention in Oklahoma City was pledged solid labor backing in its fight to defeat "right-to-work" forces in the coming referendum. Visitors to the convention sessions included Speaker J. D. McCarty (third from right) of the Oklahoma House, who is shown with delegates from Transport Workers Local 514. Left to right are Jesse Burns, Robert Shields, Jim Ladd, McCarty, Herman Dennis and Harold Nichols.

In Los Angeles Drive:

Organizing Parley Draws Big Turnout

Los Angeles—Nearly 1,000 persons attended the largest union organizing conference held in the West since the 1930s, with delegates breaking into workshops for detailed discussions of problems in the AFL-CIO's year-long campaign to organize an estimated 750,000 non-union workers in this area.

Most impressive aspect of the conference to union observers was the large turnout, with nearly 80 percent of the participants coming from shops and factories. Others were staff officials of locals and internationals in the area.

Dir. John W. Livingston, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organizing hailed the attendance as evidence that the organizing campaign can draw on the full resources of the 750,000 people in the Los Angeles-Orange County area who already are union members.

Livingston paid tribute to Executive Sec.-Treas. W. J. Bassett of the Los Angeles AFL-CIO for developing a firm commitment to organizing in the central body. The presence of such a large number of rank-and-file members at a Saturday organizing conference, he said, was clear evidence that the local federation's program was stimulating interest within its ranks.

The conference was co-sponsored by the Los Angeles federation and the AFL-CIO Los Angeles-Orange Counties Organizing Committee, directed by William Gilbert. The program was arranged locally by the central body's education committee, headed by Leonard Levy of the Clothing Workers, and its organizing committee, under George E. Smith of the Bookbinders. Materials were prepared in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education and Dept. of Organization.

George Guernsey, assistant education director, summarized the discussions and urged the central body to "capitalize on the evident enthusiasm" among its members by putting them to work as volunteer organizers.

In the workshops, where delegates exchanged organizing experiences, efforts were made to relate techniques and problems to basic community and national issues.

Rank-and-File Experience

One rank-and-file member told of his local's success in organizing a plant after two years of work, only to find that the company would not agree to a contract. When a strike was called, "the company advertised for strikebreakers and got hundreds from the unemployed ranks in the section where the plant is located, and the strike was broken."

"This means unemployment has real meaning for us, not just because we, too, may be out of work someday and because we are interested in helping others, but also because of its obvious negative effect on the whole labor movement and the drive," he reported.

Livingston pointed out that one stage of rapid union growth was triggered by the depression, accompanied by the New Deal Administration of the late Pres. Roosevelt. In that stage, he said, the role of labor's fulltime representatives was relatively small, and workers almost literally organized themselves.

Union assets then, he observed, were "a history of management stupidity and economic hardship that drove us into unionism—it was a real do-it-yourself operation."

The next stage saw almost all organizing done by fulltime staffers, and "the climate was still good for unionizing; management hadn't smoothed out the wrinkles in their anti-union programs, and the New Deal successor, the Fair Deal of Pres. Truman, was still in operation."

Now, in a third stage, Livingston said, a combination of volunteers and staffers is essential to get the job done. Management has developed a science of fighting unions that must be countered by the combination of experienced staffer and volunteer-who is part of the plant operations and knows the people, he said.

James Wishard, research director for the Meat Cutters, told the conference that despite the general rise in the standard of living, the concentration of wealth and corporate power is greater today than it was 30 or 40 years ago. This, he said, will be reflected in the political power of the wealthy if union organizing campaigns are not more successful.

The nation's communications media fail to present an honest picture of union people, he said, declaring that television, for example, never presents the problems of a union man, such as layoffs, speedups or plant closings, but "makes it seem as though 'nice people' don't belong to unions."

Nevertheless, he concluded, the labor movement can be mobilized to overcome these obstacles, and the Los Angeles conference is itself evidence of this.

New York Tug Strike Ties Up Harbor Traffic

New York—More than 3,200 harbor tugmen, who tied up their vessels Feb. 1 in a strike for better working conditions, will stay out until tug owners make an acceptable offer, their union has announced.

The strike has halted maritime traffic in the world's busiest port except for a few passenger liners which docked without tug assistance. Previous strikes over contract terms similarly tied up the port for 36 days in 1957 and for six days in 1959.

Negotiators for Local 333, United Marine Div. of the National Maritime Union, have pressed the employers for a new contract offer at meetings held almost daily since the crews of 350 tugs, harbor tankers and barges voted down a management proposal.

Another meeting was scheduled for Feb. 9 in Manhattan Center, where members will get a report from their negotiators and vote on any new offer made by that time.

City and federal mediators have been lending their services to the negotiators. The strike has gone on without picket lines, strikebreakers or disturbances.

When the last three-year contract with 65 tug firms expired Jan. 31, no agreement had been reached on some six major issues. These involve working conditions and time off.

Besides their services to passenger and cargo ships, tug crews help deliver most of the city's fuel oil and building materials. Much of this traffic has been halted or diverted to other ports.

Poll Tax Amendment Certified, Johnson Hails Rights 'Triumph'

The 24th Amendment outlawing the poll tax as a qualification for voting in federal elections was hailed by Pres. Johnson as a "triumph of liberty over restriction" as it formally became a part of the Constitution.

General Services Administrator Bernard L. Boutin certified the amendment at a White House ceremony, with the President serving as witness. It was the first time a chief executive had performed this function.

The amendment actually went into effect Jan. 23 when South Dakota became the 38th state to ratify it. The certification by Boutin, and publication in the federal register, took formal notice that ratification had been voted by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states. It then was sent on to the National Archives.

Representing the AFL-CIO among supporters of the amendment present at the ceremony were Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and Legislative Rep. Kenneth Meiklejohn.

Johnson told the group that adoption of the amendment reaffirmed "the simple but unbreakable theme of this republic:

"Nothing is so valuable as liberty and nothing is so necessary to liberty as the freedom to vote without bans or barriers.

"There can now be no one too poor to vote. There is no longer a tax on his rights. The only enemy to voting that we face today is indifference. Too many of our citizens treat casually what other people in other lands are ready to die for."

The AFL-CIO carried on a continuing and vigorous campaign through its state central bodies to spur approval of the amendment by the necessary 38 states.

When Congress passed the anti-poll tax amendment in 1962 and submitted it to the states for ratification, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on the state labor bodies to take the lead in organizing broad community efforts to insure swift ratification.

The federation's Executive Council at its meeting a year ago endorsed this role of the state AFL-CIO groups and directed them to pursue ratifications "with the fullest vigor . . . so that by the 1964 elections the last legal barrier to the exercise of the franchise by all citizens will be cleared away."

As more and more states voted to approve the amendment, the drive was pressed in letters from Meany to labor federations in key states, urging them to prod their legislatures for action.

Finally, on Jan. 20, with approval needed from only one more state, Meany telegraphed the state AFL-CIO presidents in Arizona and South Dakota, whose legislatures were then in session, urging a redoubled effort to complete the ratification procedure and wipe out "the one remaining legal obstacle to full citizenship in America."

Three days later South Dakota went down in history as the 38th state to ratify the amendment.

Steel Union Expands Services in French

Toronto, Ont.—Jean-Marc Carle, for nine years in the staff of the French weekly, La Frontiere, in Rouyn-Noranda, Que., has been appointed to the Steelworkers' Canadian public relations staff to handle expansion of the French language section of Steel Labor, the union organ, and to carry out other editorial, publicity and education assignments.

Drive Moves to Senate On Fringe-Benefits Bill

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. hailed House passage of the Davis-Bacon fringe benefits bill and announced a drive for "prompt enactment" by the Senate.

BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty termed the 357-50 House vote to include fringe benefits in determining prevailing wages for federally-financed construction "the culmination of almost nine years of hard and patient effort."

"We wish to thank all of our local organizations and the entire labor movement for their support in furthering this much needed reform," Haggerty said.

Warns of Delay

Declaring that the "greatest danger is delay," he added:

"Final enactment of this legislation will open up many thousand of new job opportunities for union construction workers on government projects. It will end the built-in competitive advantage now enjoyed by non-union contractors bidding on government contracts, because they get away without paying fringe benefits now averaging about 50 cents an hour under union agreements."

Meanwhile a companion bill, sponsored by 20 senators, was given expedited treatment by a Senate Labor subcommittee.

The subcommittee, which has held hearings on similar measures in the past, voted to skip formal hearings and leave the record open for written statements through Feb. 21. After the record is complete, the bill will be taken up in executive session by the full committee. Principal sponsors of the measure are the Senate's assistant Democratic and Republican leaders, Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.).

The major threat in the House came on an attempt to amend the Davis-Bacon Act to make the Labor Dept.'s prevailing wage findings subject to court review. The labor-opposed move was crushed by a 297-105 vote, a larger margin than most observers had anticipated.

Congressional enactment of the fringe benefit bill "without irrelevant or crippling amendments" has been strongly urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who termed it "essential to protect local wage rates and local community living standards."

Ex-College President To Advise Stevenson

New York—Dr. Harold Taylor, former president of Sarah Lawrence College, Bronxville, N.Y., has been named a special consultant to Chairman Adlai Stevenson of the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation.

A former vice chairman of the New York State Commission Against Discrimination in Education, Taylor will conduct a study of human rights problems and recommend appropriate action by the foundation.

Bid to Labor Advisers:

Study of Automation Urged by President

Pres. Johnson has asked his Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy to take a new and searching look into automation and the problems of worker displacement it poses.

At a brief meeting with the 21-member committee, Johnson said he was renewing the late Pres. Kennedy's request for such a study in depth out of respect for his slain predecessor "and out of my own concern with this problem."

The President praised the tripartite committee's first report on automation in January 1962 as a "magnificent statement of our commitment to economic progress and human dignity."

He cited particularly a conclusion of the report that "the achievement of maximum technological development with adequate safeguards against economic injury to individuals depends upon a combination of private and governmental action, consistent with the principles of the free society."

He urged the committee to pursue this approach with a study emphasizing automation's effects on workers, unions and businesses and the problems of adjustment to technological change.

Suggesting that the study may involve sponsoring new research and calling for "appropriate recommendations" for government action, the President urged the committee to seek answers to these questions:

"First, what will the direct impact on the economy be in the face of past and future trends?

"Second, what is being done and what can be done to meet the impact of automation where it does result in displacement?"

Johnson cited the value of "the thinking" developed in the committee and urged "careful nourishing of this process."

"You are proving," he said, "that even in the most controversial areas, honest disagreement is most frequently an open door to understanding. This is a terribly important lesson for a free society to keep in mind and to keep in motion."

He asked the group for comment on three other matters involving problems of unemployment:

- A draft of the manpower message he said will be sent to Congress next month.
- The attempt to detect and correct physical and mental deficiencies among youth through selective service examinations at age 18.
- Recommendations now being prepared by a federal-state commission for a special program of rehabilitation and redevelopment in the 10-state Appalachian region, the largest and most distressed, the President said, of those geographical areas which have been sharply hit by economic change.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz currently heads the labor-management advisory committee, alternating the chairmanship each year with Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges.

Labor members are AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Vice Presidents David Dubinsky, George M. Harrison, Joseph D. Keenan, David J. McDonald and Walter P. Reuther, and Pres. W. A. Boyle of the unaffiliated Mine Workers.

Johnson Asks FLSA Extension, Double Pay for Some Overtime

that 15 million persons regularly work more than 40 hours a week while 4 million Americans have no jobs at all. In manufacturing industries alone, Wirtz observed, about 35 million hours of overtime were worked in 1963.

"This is the equivalent of 919,000 fulltime jobs," he said.

Such overtime practices "cannot be defended," Wirtz declared, in industries where there is enough skilled labor available and the workweek can be cut without "unduly increasing costs."

The tripartite committees proposed in the draft bill, he said, would be composed of labor, management and public experts in each industry who could survey the availability of needed skills and study costs and other factors involved in "replacing overtime hours with new employes."

The committee, after completing its study, would be authorized to fix by majority vote the maximum workweek in the industry (not less than 40 hours) which would have the effect of cutting individual working time and increasing employment "without excessive cost."

After receiving the committee's report, the secretary of labor could either issue an order carrying out its recommendations or disapprove it and order another study.

If the committee were to set, say, 42 hours as the maximum workweek, time and one-half would continue to be paid for work between 40 and 42 hours and doubletime would be required for work beyond that maximum.

The bill's provision would apply only to the estimated 24 million workers in jobs covered by the FLSA prior to the 1961 amendments. Thus, the 3.6 million workers brought under the act that time—mostly in retail service and construction trades—would be excluded, as would any workers newly covered under the companion legislation sought by the President.

Proposed FLSA Extension

The proposed extension of the federal wage floor and hours ceiling would for the first time bring the FLSA's protections to 190,000 hotel workers, 180,000 restaurant workers, 74,000 in retail food service, 80,000 in laundries doing business of at least $1 million a year, 90,000 engaged in processing farm products within the area of production, 34,000 in cotton ginning and 87,000 in small logging operations.

Overtime protection would be extended to workers already covered by other parts of the law but exempt until now from the hours provisions, including 1,211,000 in transportation, 584,000 in agricultural processing and seasonal industries, and 86,000 employes of gasoline service stations.

Provisions of the two bills would be applied under the same schedule used with the 1961 FLSA amendments. This would mean a $1 an hour minimum wage for the first three years after enactment, $1.15 an hour during the fourth year and $1.25 an hour thereafter. Similarly, there would be no ceiling on the workweek during the first two years after enactment, a 44-hour maximum during the third year, a 42-hour maximum during the fourth year and 40 hours thereafter.

Wirtz said that laundry, hotel and restaurant workers are among the poorest paid in the country, and the gap between their wages and those paid in even the low-wage manufacturing industries has been steadily widening.

He noted, for example, that hotel chambermaids in one large city averaged 29 cents an hour in 1948 when the federal minimum wage was 40 cents an hour. By June 1960, four years after the minimum had been raised to $1 an hour, average pay for chambermaids had risen only to 41 cents an hour, he said.

The proposed amendments would define "wages" as including tips, and would authorize the secretary of labor to determine their fair value, but only if the employer keeps an accounting of them and actually apportions them among his workers.

Wirtz said the extension of the hours ceiling to workers in transportation industries is designed to correct a shortcoming of the act which exempts any employe for whom the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power to set maximum hours of service.

In practice, the secretary said, the ICC has exercised this power only with respect to over-the-road truck drivers, operating railroad workers and airline flight personnel. The proposed amendment would provide overtime protection for helpers, loaders, mechanics, clerks and other non-operating employes in transportation and pipeline operations.

Requirements Avoided

In logging, Wirtz noted that operations involving not more than 12 workers have been exempted from the act since 1949. This, he said, has led a number of large pulp and paper companies to avoid the law's requirements by abolishing their own woods departments and using small subcontractors. Because of industry buying practices, he noted, logging workers in these small operations have very low annual earnings and hourly wages and their inclusion under the act is "urgently required."

He also declared that employes of gasoline service stations doing at least $250,000 in annual business, who were first given minimum wage protection in 1961, ought now to be brought under the overtime provisions because their workweeks have been getting longer.

Wirtz reported that 44 percent of gas station workers spent 44 hours or more a week on the job in June 1961 and that within a year this proportion had increased to 58 percent. Even more significant, he said, were studies showing that over the same period the percentages of gas station attendants working 49 hours a week or more went from 24 percent to 36 percent.

The proposed amendments include an effort to consolidate and clarify "the complicated system of exemptions" available to industries handling and processing farm products.

While they would extend coverage to additional workers and eliminate the overtime exemption for others, the new provisions still would permit such industries to qualify for a seasonal exemption of 14 weeks a year during which employes could be worked up to 12 hours a day and 56 hours a week without payment for overtime.

Sheet Metal Union Wins 65.1% of Votes

The Sheet Metal Workers won bargaining rights for 65.1 percent of the workers involved in elections conducted in that trade by the National Labor Relations Board in 1963, Organization Dir. Edward J. Carlough reported in the Sheet Metal Workers Journal, the union's official monthly publication.

The union also conducted other successful organizing campaigns which did not involve the NLRB. The record "might be considered satisfactory" in some respects, Carlough said, but "it is one that we can and definitely must improve upon during the coming year."

Runaway's Workers To Share $200,000

Detroit—A Michigan employer who moved his plant south while holding a contract with the Auto Workers has agreed to pay $200,000 in settlement of lost wages and benefits to the 237 workers he left stranded in this state.

The agreement, settling a suit filed by the UAW after the Hurd Lock Mfg. division of the Avis Co. moved from Almont, Mich., to Greeneville, Tenn., in July 1962, has been ratified by unanimous vote of UAW Local 831 members.

The amount of the settlement "should serve as a warning to would-be runaway employers," said Co-director George Merrelli of UAW Reg. 1, who said the settlement was the most favorable the union ever won in a relocation dispute.

The $200,000 will be paid at the rate of approximately $54 for every year of service. The average payment will be about $890, while 30-year workers will draw $1,620, according to Merrelli.

The firm, which makes auto locks, has had contract relations with the UAW since 1941. Fourteen of its workers had more than 30 years of seniority. The average age of the 237 workers is 50 years, average seniority 15.5 years.

The UAW legal department filed suit after the plant moved, charging the runaway violated the recognition and duration clauses of the contract entered into Nov. 1, 1960, and expiring Nov. 1, 1963. Before settling, Hurd Lock had urged a court to dismiss the suit on the ground that it stated no cause of action, but U.S. District Judge Theodore Levin denied the motion and settlement followed.

ILO Announces Affiliation of Laos

Geneva—The government of Laos has formally accepted the obligations of the Intl. Labor Organization's constitution and has become the 110th member of that tripartite body, Dir.-Gen. David A. Morse has announced.

Disc Royalty Pact Ratified By Musicians

New York — Musicians in the phonograph recording industry have ratified a new five-year contract giving them the right to collect individual royalties.

Approval of the contract in a secret-ballot referendum of rank-and-file recording musicians was announced by AFM Pres. Herman Kenin. The pact is retroactive to Jan. 1 and affects some 2,000 full-time players, arrangers, orchestrators and copyists, plus 8,000 others who do occasional recording work.

Under the agreement, the industry will continue to pay royalties to the Music Performance Trust Funds, which underwrite free music for worthy causes, but henceforth half the royalties will be distributed among the musicians.

Until this "breakthrough," only prominent soloists, band leaders and other special artists under personal contracts collected royalties from record sales.

Fight on Unemployment Stressed:

$361 Million Boost Sought In Budget of Labor Dept.

Emphasis on manpower training and other programs to combat joblessness is reflected in an increase of $361 million Pres. Johnson has asked Congress to provide in new obligational authority for the Labor Dept. in fiscal 1965.

The President's budget asks total authorizations for the department of $831 million, compared with $470 million for the fiscal year ending next June 30. He estimates actual spending by the department to reach $667 million, up $251 million from the fiscal 1964 estimate.

Increases also have been proposed for the independent labor agencies. The appropriations request for the National Labor Relations Board, at $25.3 million, is up $2.8 million from the previous year because of "continuing increases in unfair labor practices caseload and in representation petitions."

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service would get $6.1 million in authorizations, an increase of $413,000, to "permit greater efforts to avoid disputes through preventive mediation."

Most of the increase in the Labor Dept. budget is channeled into a stepped-up program of job training for the unemployed under the Manpower Development & Training Act. Amendments broadening and strengthening the act, the President observed, will make it possible to train 135,000 jobless workers in 1964 and about double that number in 1965.

Johnson's budget asks $411 million in 1965 appropriations for manpower training, an increase of $246 million, and estimates spending on the program to amount to $325 million, up $189 million from fiscal 1964.

$9 Million for Areas

Training under the area redevelopment program, according to the budget, is planned "at the same general level" as last year and will provide retraining and subsistence for about 12,000 jobless workers under the requested appropriation of $9 million.

The President also called for prompt enactment of youth employment opportunities legislation which has been passed by the Senate and is now held up in the House Rules Committee. He urged Congress to appropriate $30 million for the program this year and $160 million for 1965.

The legislation would provide work and training through conservation camps and work projects in local communities for about 60,000 youths in 1965, the budget noted.

Other Highlights

Other highlights of the Labor Dept. budget:

- An increase of $723,000 in the appropriations sought for the Bureau of Labor Statistics, bringing the 1965 total to $18.4 million and providing for improvement and extension of statistics relating to manpower, employment and other fields.
- $345,000 in authorizations for trade adjustment activities, up from $150,000 last year, to cover the department's responsibilities in tariff negotiations.
- $7.7 million in appropriations requested for the Labor-Management Services Administration, an increase of $237,000 to cover additional research and assistance in the collective bargaining field. The cost will be partly offset by greater productivity in the processing of labor-management and welfare-pension reports required by law.
- $452 million in estimated trust fund expenditures for the federal-state employment service, a $30 million rise, to provide for continued expansion and improvement of the service and cover increases in salaries of state employes.
- $3.5 million in appropriations sought for the Bureau of Labor Standards, with an increase of $75,000 relating primarily to the cost of government pay increases.
- A $1.3 million increase in new obligational authority requested for the Wage & Hour Div., bringing the total to $20.5 million, to cover costs of enforcing the Equal Pay Act outlawing job discrimination against women.

Schools 'Downgrade' Role of Labor—Meany

"The quest of workers to win security, dignity and freedom should be a part of the total curriculum of the schools," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Organized labor, Meany stressed, "is a part of the drama of history. It is a part of the study of government. It is a part of the study of literature."

In an article for the Teachers College Journal, published by Indiana State College, Terre Haute, Ind., Meany charged that most schools have "downgraded" labor's role in American life. He said:

"It is not simply that the schools do not teach about unions. They don't teach about the problems of workers, wages, or earning a living."

Teachers whose knowledge of unions is limited to what they read in the newspapers and textbooks which dismiss labor issues with an "off-hand comment" are among the reasons why "there is little room in the curriculum for study about labor," Meany declared.

He also criticized the failure of most school systems to develop "a meaningful program of vocational education."

"Schools have tended to regard industrial skills as though they were of lesser value than the professional skills of the lawyer or doctor," Meany asserted.

There is general recognition, he said, that the high school dropout will be in a "hopeless position" in the years to come.

"But there is less recognition of the fact that the future is equally hopeless for the high school student who graduates from a vocational course that teaches him woodworking, leathercraft, or how to wire doorbells."

Because of the "revolutionary change" in the nature of the work force, Meany said, "the jobs which exist require much more training than was true in the past."

The AFL-CIO president added:

"Education costs money, much more money than we have so far been willing to spend for it," he said. "And vocational education, with its needs for equipment and materials, is especially expensive. The teaching of skills has had far too little money to do the job which needs to be done."

Mary Anderson Dies; Pioneer Woman Leader

Mary Anderson, immigrant Swedish dishwasher who was the first head of the Labor Dept.'s Women's Bureau, died after a fall in her Washington apartment. She was 91.

"She was a noble and beloved woman," said AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

"The labor movement and all who knew her mourn her death. A woman of great courage and determination, she dedicated her life to the fight for labor's rights and women's rights at a time when such rights were non-existent.

"Throughout her life she attacked injustice with a fervor that enlisted thousands to the struggle and inspired all who met her. We are proud she was one of us."

Miss Anderson could speak only Swedish when she came to this country in 1889 and got a job as a dishwasher in a lumberjacks' boarding house in Michigan at $1.50 a week. She later moved to West Chicago, Ill., where she stitched shoes in a factory for $14 a week, developed an interest in unions and joined the Boot & Shoe Workers, soon becoming president of her local.

She worked as an organizer for the National Women's Trade Union and during World War I headed the section on women in industry of the National Defense Council. Pres. Woodrow Wilson appointed her first director of the Women's Bureau, a post she held until her retirement in 1944 after working under five presidents.

Miss Anderson also was active in the women's suffrage movement, was the first American woman to participate in an Intl. Labor Organization conference, and was active in many other liberal, political and consumer bodies. She received the Labor Dept.'s Award of Merit in 1962.

Net Public & Private Debt

Public Debt as Percent of GNP

Expenditures as Percent of GNP

Relation of Authorizations To Expenditures

CHARTS prepared by the Bureau of the Budget to illustrate aspects of Pres. Johnson's proposed budget for fiscal 1965 show, from top to bottom: (1) The federal government's debt has risen only slightly since 1947, whereas debts of state and local governments, consumers and business have gone up sharply. (2) The public debt, in the years since World War II, has shown a steady decline when measured as a percentage of gross national product—the total of all goods and services produced. (3) Administrative budget expenditures in postwar years have remained relatively stable, fluctuating only a few percentage points from year to year, when measured as a percentage of GNP. (4) The relationship between the $103.8 billion in new obligational authority the President has asked Congress to provide in fiscal 1965 and the $97.9 billion he estimates will actually be spent.

Congress Starts to Move

THE CURRENT PACE of congressional activity, with the House debating and voting on civil rights legislation and the Senate devoting full time to the tax cut measure, holds out hope that the second session of the 88th Congress can shake off the afflictions of the first session.

The conservative coalition, aided by cumbersome, outdated rules, procedures and traditions, conspired to block action on key legislation during the 12-month first session.

But the pace has perceptibly quickened in 1964, and a new mood is evident on Capitol Hill. There is new hope, therefore, that the unfinished legislative business left over from the 1963 session will be handled with speed and dispatch.

Elsewhere on this page is a list of major legislative issues for 1964 compiled for a new AFL-CIO pamphlet "Labor Looks at Congress 1963." These are the major issues; there are many more than can be added to this list of 18 that deserve recognition and action, but these are basic.

It is noteworthy that except for one or two issues relating directly to trade union problems and pay scales, labor's legislative program, to which it is devoting an important share of time and effort, is a program in the national interest.

The program to reduce unemployment to aid jobless youngsters and distressed areas is a program benefiting all Americans whether or not they are trade union members.

Health care for the aged, civil rights, mass transit, education, consumer protection, natural resources, foreign aid, congressional reform—these are issues involving national goals and national directions. They do not especially serve or aid dues-paying trade unionists; they serve the nation.

The 1964 legislative program emphasizes once again that organized labor serves primarily in Washington as the "people's lobby."

The Unreached Goals

PRES. JOHNSON'S HOUSING message has pinpointed a major area of need that in the past few years has unfortunately been given relatively fleeting attention.

The goal of a "decent home in a decent neighborhood for every American family" is still distant. And in the past few years decent housing at a price the average American worker can afford has slipped even farther away as most new housing is designed for an ever-higher income range.

The President has recognized the need for adequate housing for low-income families by proposing to double the present rate of construction of low-cost public dwelling units as one aspect of his overall "war on poverty."

His proposal for federal aid in the development of suburban communities also recognizes the increasingly difficult problem of unplanned sprawl development. But while suburban development deserves major attention, the equally complex and difficult problems involved in urban renewal must be kept firmly in sight.

Until every American has good housing at a price he can afford, until the slums are leveled and their inhabitants decently housed, national attention must not be distracted.

New Beginning

Second Session of 88th Congress:

AFL-CIO Legislative Program Pinpoints 'Unfinished Business'

The AFL-CIO legislative program is summarized in the following excerpt from "Labor Looks at Congress 1963," a report on the first session of the 88th Congress and the unfinished business facing the second session.

Civil Rights—The AFL-CIO calls for prompt enactment of long-delayed guarantees of human dignity, equality and full civil rights, including equal access to public accommodations and fair employment practices.

Tax Cuts—The AFL-CIO calls for job-creating reduction of taxes, particularly for low and middle income families whose added consumer purchasing power will stimulate the economy and thus open up more job opportunities for American workers.

"Medicare"—The AFL-CIO urges enactment of a program of health benefits for the aged to provide protection against major, unpredictable costs of hospital and hospital-related care, as provided in the King-Anderson "medicare" legislation.

Accelerated Public Works—The AFL-CIO calls for continuation of the job-creating accelerated public works program with an additional appropriation of $2 billion to help speed federal, state, and local action on socially valuable public works.

Area Redevelopment—The AFL-CIO urges prompt action to increase funds available to help depressed communities plagued by chronically high unemployment under the ARA loan-grant program for industrial development and public facilities construction.

Youth Employment—The AFL-CIO supports youth employment legislation to help provide job opportunities for young people in constructive outdoors conservation work in national and state forests and in state and local community service activities.

Unemployment Compensation—The AFL-CIO calls for federal standards establishing minimum amounts and duration of benefits available under a crazy-quilt of state unemployment insurance programs, many of which are inadequate, unfair, and discriminatory.

Davis-Bacon—The AFL-CIO supports legislation to include fringe benefits in Davis-Bacon prevailing wage determinations by the Secretary of Labor.

Fair Labor Standards—The AFL-CIO is calling for a $2 minimum hourly wage and extension of full wage-hour protection to all workers in interstate commerce, especially those working in hotels, motels, restaurants, laundries, cleaning establishments, hospitals and small logging operations. The AFL-CIO also supports minimum wage and maximum hours protection for farm workers and agricultural processing workers and an end to the seasonal overtime exemption for the food processing industry. Furthermore, the AFL-CIO is calling for action by Congress to cut the standard work week to 35 hours without a reduction in take-home pay and to help create more job opportunities by requiring double-time pay for overtime work.

Health Facilities—The AFL-CIO urges federal loans and loan guarantees for group practice medical care facilities, and particularly those sponsored by comprehensive health plans, which help lower the cost of medical care.

Mass Transit—The AFL-CIO urges aid for urban mass transportation facilities to help move people faster in traffic-choked cities and metropolitan areas. The AFL-CIO insists that any mass transit aid program must include protection of union rights, continuation of employe rights, and protection for workers who may be adversely affected by such programs.

Education—The AFL-CIO urges enactment of new education programs, including general aid for elementary and secondary school education, adult education, university extension programs, library services extension, and a "Cold War G.I. Education Bill" to help post-Korean War veterans.

Domestic Peace Corps—The AFL-CIO supports establishment of a National Service Corps with highly trained "domestic peace corps" volunteers to perform welfare activities which encourage state and local community action and stimulate volunteer service.

Federal Pay Raise—The AFL-CIO urges action by Congress in 1964 to raise salaries of postal and classified federal workers.

Consumer Protection—The AFL-CIO continues to oppose strongly the big-business price-raising, price-fixing legislation known as "quality stabilization," and urges Congress to reject such consumer-injuring legislation. The AFL-CIO urges enactment of consumer protection legislation, including "truth-in-packaging," "truth-in-lending," and legislation designed to cut the high price of drugs.

Natural Resources—Wilderness protection legislation has the support of the AFL-CIO and many conservation groups. The AFL-CIO also supports legislation to promote development and conservation of water resources and legislation to help state and federal agencies acquire future outdoor recreation areas.

Foreign Aid—The AFL-CIO supports foreign aid as a keystone of U.S. foreign policy and as a vital job-creating part of the U.S. economy.

Reform of Congress—Although the major drive for reforms in the rules and procedures of Congress will come in 1965 when the newly elected 89th Congress convenes, the AFL-CIO urges the 88th Congress to start action in 1964 to lay the groundwork for congressional reform by setting up a bipartisan Commission on Congressional Reorganization to study organization, rules and procedures, and other problems.

Morgan Says:

'Doctors of Human Relations' Train to Treat Old Prejudices

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

SIX YEARS AGO, on the 10th anniversary of the adoption of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights, Eleanor Roosevelt, one of the principal architects of that document, posed an important question. "Where, after all," she asked, "do universal human rights begin?" Then she provided her own answer:

Morgan

"In small places, close to home—so close and so small that they cannot be seen on any map of the world. Yet they are the world of the individual person: The neighborhood he lives in, the school or college he attends; the factory, farm or office where he works. Such are the places where every man, woman and child seeks equal justice, equal opportunity, equal dignity without discrimination. Unless these rights have meaning there, they have little meaning anywhere. Without concerted citizen action to uphold them close to home, we shall look in vain for progress in the larger world."

"Concerted citizen action to uphold them close to home." This is what we have been lacking, even more than legislation, in the battle to drain the hypocrisy from and add positive meaning to civil rights.

So how fitting it is that the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation has hatched a program aimed at meeting the scarcity of trained personnel, amateur volunteers and professional workers, to translate, as one foundation has put it, the victories in the "civil rights revolution of the Sixties into meaningful gains."

In New York City, 25 interns—half of them veterans of the Peace Corps, recently returned from abroad—were formally selected for a one-year training course on how to handle civil rights problems at the grass roots level. They divide about 50-50 between men and women and their average age is 24. Those who aren't Peace Corps "graduates" had similar interests at home. Each will be paid $5,000 for this year of training, the total cost of which will be some $275,000. Half of this will be borne by the Eleanor Roosevelt Foundation, the other half to come from matching funds provided by other participating organizations.

The interns' first assignment will be a two-week seminar in Washington at the Potomac Institute, a race relations research organization. There they will meet with authorities in law, education, sociology and psychology. Then they will be assigned to what might be called "observer jobs" in private and governmental agencies dealing directly with civil rights.

Some, for instance, will join the Southern Regional Council, one of the South's most effective interracial groups. Its headquarters are in Atlanta. Others will find themselves working with New York State's Education Practices Administration, which deals with educational problems and which is up to its institutional neck at the moment in the complicated issue of how to strike an equitable balance in the black, white and brown populations of New York public schools which are technically but not actually desegregated.

In these and other agencies the interns will find themselves grappling with such tasks as interviewing Negro and/or Caucasian parents on the classroom problem; trying to persuade a taxicab company to hire more Negroes; tracing the sources of intimidation of a southern clergyman who is trying to convert the preaching of the Christian ethic into practice. And so on.

AFTER THEIR YEAR of training, the interns will take permanent jobs in the agencies with which they trained or with other outfits doing similar work. While 25 is an awfully modest number for the first class in the face of the work to be done, the operation had to start somewhere and there are encouraging reasons to believe it can expand every year. There have already been 121 applicants from the Peace Corps alone, half of whom are not even back from their present assignments in some 27 different countries.

The people in both government and non-government agencies already laboring in the tangled vineyard of civil rights are not novices—or if some of them are—experiences will quickly season them. But this internship program marks the first systematic attempt to produce a fresh cadre of young workers trained in this field at the very start of their careers.

"The basic idea," explains Hyman H. Bookbinder, director of the Eleanor Roosevelt Foundation, "is that while direct action on behalf of civil rights is useful and necessary, the difficult job of translating civil rights victories into concrete terms requires a tremendous number of skilled practitioners and a wide range of talents."

It has been repeatedly said, in effect, that you can't legislate a change of heart. Maybe so. But these workers are not law-enforcement officers. They will be, in a sense, heart specialists; doctors of human relations trying to cure old fears and prejudices by easing frictions in the private worlds of people.

Washington Reports:

Procedural Reform in Congress Called for by Humphrey, Javits

CONGRESS HAS BECOME a year-round job, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), majority whip, and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) agreed as they were interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

Both senators called for reform of congressional procedures and institutions. Humphrey was of the opinion that such improvements depend largely upon whether the people are "aroused and concerned," and demand the modernization upon which he said, the preservation of representative government depends.

Javits said he preferred Congress (operating as a year-round job) to recess in September, "but I certainly would prefer the summer holiday to what happened last year when we were here 12 months and none of us saw our families or our children until they went back to school."

Humphrey proposed that a committee majority be able to take action at any time on any measure.

"There ought not to be . . . autocratic rule on the part of any chairman," he said.

Changes in the seniority system, Javits pointed out, depend on the members of Congress themselves.

"Seniority is not a matter of rules," he declared. "It's custom, and either party could break that at any time, but they just don't wish to do so."

THE BASIC POWER in the Senate among Republicans, said Javits, depends on the Committee on Committees, of which he is a member. They bring their recommendations to the party caucus.

"The Democrats have another scheme, but it's the same [kind of] thing," he said.

Humphrey suggested that joint committees of both houses hear testimony on such issues at national security, "so that the concerned cabinet officers . . . can go to one committee to discuss an issue, to advise and counsel," instead of having to go before a committee of each house.

Humphrey proposed a congressional institute "of competent, trained, expert people with knowledge and intellectual capacity" to serve Congress in the way that the Executive branch is served. Such an institute, said the majority leader, could be prepared with information on the effects of population shifts, closing of defense bases and shifts in defense contracts.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

A BACKLASH of the civil rights struggle led to the defeat of a food-stamp program in the House Agriculture Committee—a defeat that inflicts injury only on low-income families and reflects no credit on the House members who allowed themselves to be motivated on the food-stamp issue by their irritation about the rights bill.

A food-stamp program has been operating on a pilot basis in 42 areas since 1961, all of them areas where unemployment is chronic and high. It allows families on public assistance to get stamps, rather than surplus commodities, and use the stamps for the purchase of food through normal commercial channels.

The advantage to the families is that they can obtain a better balanced diet than is available through handouts of surplus farm commodities. The advantage to retail stores is that they sell more food; the stamps are redeemable for cash.

During the depression such a program worked successfully. Congress authorized a revival of the program on a pilot basis when Gen. Eisenhower was President. Mr. Eisenhower refused to implement it; one of Pres. Kennedy's first acts was to put it into operation under basic agricultural law.

Last year Mr. Kennedy asked Congress to establish the program permanently. Mr. Johnson renewed this request and asked extension of the plan on a national basis. It is this latter request that the House Agriculture Committee turned down.

The 14 Republican members who voted to table the proposal, and thus kill it, presumably had their own reasons. Among the stated reasons were dislike of the $100 million above surplus commodity distribution costs the program would involve and a general vague dislike of letting the federal government get "control" of local relief operations.

The five Democrats who voted with the GOP, however, were not voting on the merits or demerits, imaginary or real, but on the basis of vengefulness about civil rights.

The Agriculture Committee's vote will not halt the civil rights bill. It will not change anything substantive in the rest of Pres. Johnson's program. All it does is inflict irrelevant penalties on families already suffering misfortunes enough. It is precisely the kind of action—or inaction—that has persuaded a good many citizens to feel in recent years that Congress through its committee structure is playing a role in which responsibility is a largely neglected commodity.

ON THE CIVIL RIGHTS bill itself the early House votes showed a commendable degree of progress. The damaging amendments were defeated; the public accommodations section was preserved without serious change although the vital section on fair employment practices remained still to be settled.

It should be noted, however, that a considerable part of the southern opposition strategy was devoted to building up a fictitious claim that the Judiciary Committee bill was railroaded through without adequate hearings. A good deal more will be heard about this on the Senate side.

The Judiciary Committee in fact held lengthy hearings on the subject matter of all sections of the bill that it produced itself, and a Labor subcommittee held hearings on the fair employment practice section. In previous sessions of Congress there have been hearings ad infinitum on every conceivable proposal for federal operations in the guarantee of human rights.

It is not a new subject. It is not something suddenly sprung on a startled Congress. And the final Judiciary Committee bill was not deviously designed to deny opponents a day in court.

The committee staff and some members, with the assistance of properly authorized Justice Dept. spokesmen, drafted the bill on the basis of hearings and on the basis of a bipartisan consensus of opinion in the committee.

This is a normal procedure. There is no hanky-panky involved. What is needed is for Congress to act.

CONGRESS SHOULD BE brought up-to-date and made more efficient, Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.), left, and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) asserted on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

How to Buy:

Appliance Repair Labor Costs Yield Only Fraction to Worker

By Sidney Margolius

RECENTLY A FAMILY was shocked by a bill for $20 for repairing the bake unit in a 10-year old electric range that probably would not bring much more in the second-hand market. The charge was $5.65 for two small parts and $14.25 for labor, including $4.95 for the first call to see what was wrong, and $9.30 for the return call with the parts.

Why this charge for a simple parts replacement? The actual work did not take long. In comparison, you get noticeably more work done for $20 on a car. Even doctors charge no more for a house call.

We checked with the manufacturer of the range whose service branch had done the repair work. It turned out that the serviceman, a highly-skilled worker, was paid $120 a week for a 40-hour week, a little more than the national average of $110 for appliance servicemen. Certainly his $3 an hour did not account for the labor charge of $9.30 an hour, plus the $4.95 for the initial call.

But, the manufacturers argue, the serviceman's pay is only a fraction of the total cost of servicing an appliance. The manufacturer also must charge for the cost of operating his truck (in this case, radio-equipped), for tools, and the overhead of the service depot.

Thus, if a serviceman is paid $2.50 an hour, which is more typical on a nationwide basis, the manufacturer or dealer providing the service adds 100 percent for overhead. Now the cost had become $5 an hour. But they don't stop there. Only half of the serviceman's time actually is spent in the home. This raises the per-hour cost to $10. A major appliance service manager told a school for servicemen that the average call takes 45 minutes.

However, you're lucky if you get off even with a $7.50 charge. The serviceman often needs to make a second call with the parts, especially if your appliance is not a late model. Too, he may require some extra time if the source of the trouble is not easily accessible.

What about the high price for parts? Just one of a hundred components of a range for which you originally paid, say, only $2.00, may cost you $5 or more.

The manufacturers claim that the high cost of repair parts arises from the need to stock many parts for different models. But service representatives also have admitted that the sale of parts is a profitable business, with no competition and no need to give discounts.

Manufacturers and dealers tend to blame high costs of appliance repairs on consumers. The Fairchild News Service reported that while appliances themselves now are better quality, many consumers fail to read instruction booklets and so make unnecessary calls for service.

This is partly true, but only partly. Another part of the problem is that modern appliances are more complicated, with more parts to break down.

What can you do about it? You can, of course, compare service charges in your area. This may produce somewhat lower charges. But it won't solve the fact that it is costly to run a truck up to your house with a highly-skilled appliance repairman at the wheel.

THE ONLY BASIC WAYS to hold down service costs on the dozen or so appliances and electronic equipment in your house are these:

- When you buy an appliance, buy the simplest model you need. Avoid those with extra gadgets that you really may not use.
- Read your instruction booklet to know how to operate your appliance carefully.
- Check the plug and the fuse box, and also read your instruction booklet again, before you call a repairman. The seeming difficulty may be covered in the instructions.
- If you must call the repair service, be prepared to explain the difficulty as exactly as you can, and state the model number and serial number of the appliance. This information usually is shown on the nameplate.
- Don't delay or talk to the serviceman unnecessarily.
- In buying small appliances such as irons, hair dryers, toasters, and fans, find out if the manufacturer or retailer provides over-the-counter replacement service. This provides immediate replacement, without waiting for the appliance to be repaired, if a malfunction develops within the terms of the guarantee.

MAGNIFICENT PIONEERING venture "aimed at the preservation of the dignity and security of retired people in all walks of life" was Postmaster Gen. John A. Gronouski's description of Nalcrest, the Letter Carriers' retirement center at East Lake Wales, Fla., in his speech at the dedication ceremony.

New Study Shows:

Impact of Machines Hits Entire Economy

THE AUTOMATION REVOLUTION is not affecting just a few industries and a few workers but has a deep, many-sided impact on our entire economy and its people, a new study, "Jobs, Men & Machines," shows.

The book is a product of the American Foundation on Automation & Employment, Inc. The foundation's co-chairmen are Machinist's Pres. Al J. Hayes, and John I. Snyder, Jr., chairman and president of U.S. Industries, Inc.

Edited by Charles Markham, the book analyzes the problems of automation, technological change and unemployment problems and offers solutions.

"Jobs, Men & Machines" resulted from a conference sponsored by the foundation held in New York in May 1963. It contains 17 essays by businessmen, labor leaders, labor arbitrators and government officials.

While each author analyzes a different aspect of the critical problem in fine detail, these excerpted quotes touch upon their conclusions:

"Though society cannot smash the machines we must take whatever steps are needed to ensure that machines will not smash society."—Hayes.

"Responsible men everywhere are beginning to look for new ways to provide new work for human beings whose very lives are threatened by machines."—Snyder.

"We have yet to perceive the magnitude and the true nature of the momentous change automation is effecting in our lives, our business and our society. Both the potential and the problem are far greater and quite different than has yet been realized."—John Diebold, recognized authority on automation.

"There is a good deal of evidence to tell us the nature of the employment problems that grow out of automation. That evidence shows rather clearly that the truth of the matter in this area of automation and employment is a great deal more complex than the half-truths that many of us have been taking for granted."—Prof. Charles Killingsworth.

"It is the member of a racial or ethnic minority group . . . who will suffer the most severe hardships in an economy which has less and less use for the worker with limited skills or no skills at all."—Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., New York City AFL-CIO.

"Automation, especially in the developing areas, may accentuate to a dangerous degree the already observed problems of the reduction of manpower and social protection. The 'international runaway shops' added potential political and economic dynamite to the already existing and envisaged problems of automation and employment."—Irving Brown, ICFTU representative to the United Nations.

"When man first dreamed of what is now thought of as automation, it was a dream bright with hope and promise. In later years this dream became a nightmare."—Mayor Robert F. Wagner of New York.

"If it were in my power right now, I would strike the word 'automation' out of the language; I would get rid of cybernetics, I would get rid of cybernation. I would try some way to reduce the scare element that has entered into this proposition."—Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Keep the Home Fevers Burning And Get Your Tan by Postcard

THIS WAS THE YEAR when everybody (everybody I know, anyway) took off on a trip while I stayed home, tending croup kettles and keeping the home fevers burning.

Perhaps the memory of this winter will someday fade mercifully from my mind like the pains of childbirth. Already it is beginning to blur a little. I can no longer remember whether, the last time around, it was Katie who caught the virus from Molly or Molly from Katie.

Every 10 days or so we ordered $8 or $10 worth of antibiotics, and nearly every week we broke another fever thermometer (two weeks ago the druggist sailed for Hawaii).

While I measured out cough syrup and dispensed aspirin, others departed in hordes in search of sunshine. Then the rush of postcards began.

There was something downright spooky about the timing of those cards. They always seemed to arrive at a time of bleak domestic crisis.

Molly was in bed with the vaporizer going. There were four inches of new snow on the ground. The washing machine—taxed beyond its strength by mountains of bed linen—had gasped and given up. The repairman couldn't get his truck up our hill.

Into this happy household scene came word from Palm Springs in the shape of a brightly colored postcard. It pictured beautiful, suntanned people, reclining around a swimming pool, and it said: "You should see our tans! We simply live around the pool! This is the life! Love to all."

I WAS VACUUMING the front hall and waiting for the man who was coming to fix a clogged downspout. A house down the hill from us had slid off its foundation. Rain poured off the roof. Katie arrived home from school, looking peaked and coughing. She handed the mail to me. Four bills and two postcards.

One was from Mexico: "Sunshine, sunshine, and more sunshine! Fresh strawberries for breakfast! We've tossed our cares away!"

The other, from Hawaii, pictured an expanse of white beach, lined with palm trees. "This is paradise. We live all day in swimsuits. Water so warm you can stay in for hours. Aloha!"

I felt like crying. And it isn't over yet. Now I am being summoned to look at their snapshots and admire their suntans.

But there's one bright side: I have noticed with considerable glee that they all seemed to have gained weight.

'Enthusiastic Support':

IUD Backs Johnson In 'War on Poverty'

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has pledged "enthusiastic support" to Pres. Johnson in his efforts to launch a "war on poverty" and called on Congress for prompt enactment of the omnibus civil rights bill and old-age social security hospital insurance for the aged as key elements of the campaign.

"It will be no easy crusade, no easy war," the IUD executive committee observed, declaring that a "flexible, vigorous" program is vitally necessary to aid the 33 to 35 million Americans living "at or below the boundaries of poverty."

Point one in this program should be speedy passage of the civil rights bill, the committee said, citing a report of the President's Council of Economic Advisers that 22 percent of the country's poor are non-white and nearly half of all non-whites in the nation live in poverty.

In a separate statement the committee said "it is a melancholy fact that in the United States, color is a stigma and keeps millions from an adequate education, from gainful employment, from exercising their right to vote, from the enjoyment of a night's rest or a meal or a few hours' entertainment."

The committee particularly urged members of Congress to reject any attempt to water down or drop provisions in the civil rights bill that would combat job discrimination through an equal employment opportunity commission. The war on poverty cannot be won, the statement said, without eliminating discrimination in employment, which is "basic to the enjoyment of all other rights in this bill."

Another statement declared the King-Anderson bill to provide hospital insurance for the aged under social security is "essential if poverty is to be ended and dignity provided as an alternative to charity."

Noting that "endless facts and figures" and "volumes of testimony" have been accumulated since the proposal was first advanced in the Forand bill six years ago, the committee called on the House Ways & Means Committee to clear the bill now and send it on for House action.

NLRB Sets Aside Vote At Big Contracting Firm

The Plumbers also charged that pay raises were given at some locations to influence the election, that company officials threatened union sympathizers, that foremen illegally voted and electioneered at jobsites, that errors and confusion in mail balloting prejudiced the union and disfranchised "substantial numbers" of eligible voters.

NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and Members John H. Fanning, Gerald A. Brown and Boyd Leedom found management had infringed the rights of its workers and voted to set the election aside. In a concurring opinion, Leedom said it was "unnecessary" for the board to decide if speeches by two company officials also were unlawful.

The company contended it was not responsible for the actions and statements of its foremen, claiming that most of them were union members and that their duties fluctuated from those of foreman to those of journeyman. The board majority sustained a trial examiner who found that interrogation of employes was unlawful but overruled his refusal to find that the foremen themselves broke the law when they carried out management orders.

The examiner held that a secret poll of employes was not illegal but the board again overruled him, citing management's instructions to foremen to ascertain employes' union sympathies; the "hostile atmosphere" in which the polls—three or four, instead of one—were conducted, and the timing of the polls just before election.

Safety Rules Issued On Industry Radiation

Radiation safety and health standards designed to protect workers from the harmful effects of exposure, applicable to federal contracts under the Walsh-Healey Act, have been issued by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

They will become effective Feb. 28 except as to contractors operating Atomic Energy Commission plants and facilities and to employers' operations in six states which have regulatory agreements with the AEC—Arkansas, California, Kentucky, Mississippi, New York and Texas.

To consider application of the new regulations in the six states, Wirtz called a public hearing for April 13 in Washington. Plants operating under AEC licenses which are in conformance with the applicable AEC regulations will be considered in compliance with the new regulations.

The rules laid down by Wirtz cover health hazards from sources of radiation such as isotope radiation gauges, industrial X-ray machines, particle accelerators, high voltage electronic vacuum tubes, and natural isotopes.

Uniform standards are set up in the regulations for caution signs, labels and signals, instruction of personnel, posting of regulations and procedures, storage of radioactive materials, waste disposal and notification of incidents.

Those intending to appear at the April 13 hearing, which will open at 10 a.m. in the Commerce Dept. Auditorium, should notify the Administrator, Wage-Hour & Public Contracts Divisions, U.S. Dept. of Labor, Washington, D.C.

Cafeteria Local Gives 25-Year Pins to 850

New York—Some 850 members of Cafeteria Employes Local 302 received 25-year membership buttons and honor plaques at the union's 38th anniversary celebration.

The largest union of cafeteria employes in the country with 5,000 members, Local 302 was chartered by the Hotel & Restaurant Employes in February 1926. The veterans who were honored held good standing membership for from 25 to 38 years. Many of them are now retired and receive union pensions.

Board Upholds Union Right To Discipline

Two locals of the Auto Workers were upheld in their right to fine dissident members for returning to work through authorized picket lines during a strike in a ruling by a National Labor Relations Board aide.

Trial Examiner Harold X. Summers recommended that the NLRB dismiss unfair labor practice complaints by the Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co. against UAW Locals 248 and 401 at the firm's works in West Allis and La Crosse, Wis.

Applying board doctrine recently clarified in the Wisconsin Motor case, where the right of a union to put a ceiling on piecework production was upheld, the examiner said a union has a right to enforce its rules where the workers involved are not deprived of their jobs.

During a Local 248 strike at the West Allis works early in 1959, approximately 175 employes out of 7,400 crossed picket lines to work. The union notified the strikebreakers that they were in violation of union rules, urged them to desist, and fined 172 of them from $20 to $100 each when they did not comply. The union won a test suit which still is pending on appeal by a fined worker in Milwaukee County Circuit Court.

Two Fined at La Crosse

At the La Crosse works, Local 401 fined two members $100 for strikebreaking in 1959. Later two suits were filed when the members refused to pay—one of which is still pending.

History repeated itself, the examiner reported, during 1962 strikes at the same two plants. Local 248 again levied fines against 29 members, six of whom had been fined in 1959. Twenty paid their fines. At La Crosse, four members out of 625 crossed the picket lines; four were fined $100 and declined to pay.

Labor Consultant Ordered to File

Charlotte, N.C.—Robert E. Lee, Charlotte labor consultant and industrial engineer, has been directed by U.S. District Court to file with Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz the reports required under the Labor-Management Reporting & Disclosure Act.

Also ordered to file reports were Lee Associates, Inc., and Investigations, Inc., through which Lee offered personnel and consultant services such as security surveys, personnel screening and personnel investigations.

The defendants were accused of failing to report accurately and completely their activities in persuading the employes of a North Carolina employer in the exercise of their rights to organize a union and to bargain. They also were charged with incompletely reporting an agreement to supply the employer with information on employee activities in connection with a labor dispute.

NLRB Caseload Rises; Courts Sustain Rulings

The National Labor Relations Board continued to have a "high rate of success in litigation" along with setting a new record in number of new cases received—25,371—the board said in its 28th annual report.

Board findings were upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court in three cases and reversed in one, in which the high court ruled that "runaway" ships operating in U.S. trade under foreign flags were not subject to U.S. labor laws. The board was upheld in a ruling forbidding superseniority to nonstrikers; on an "agency shop" case involving General Motors; and in the Reliance Fuel Co. case involving interstate commerce. [The high court has also ruled that a state may prohibit an agency shop under its "right-to-work" law and enforce the prohibition in its own courts.]

In federal appeals courts, the board reported, 78 percent of its cases were won in whole or in part. These courts enforced board orders in full in 113 cases; returned 7 for further hearings; partially enforced and partially remanded 7 cases; set aside 37 NLRB orders.

In U.S. district courts, 77 board petitions for injunctions were granted and 8 were denied for a record of 91 percent compared with 85 percent the preceding year.

Other highlights of the report, covering fiscal 1963:

- Of the 25,371 new cases filed, 14,166 were unfair labor practice charges—a new one-year record.
- A total of 378 new cases awaited decision at the close of the year, compared with 488 the year before.
- Charges against unions rose to 2,309 from 2,012 the year before, and charges of employer refusal to bargain rose to 2,584 as against 2,294 in fiscal 1962.
- More than $2.7 million in back pay was collected for 6,965 workers, a rise of nearly $1 million in the year.

C. J. Meyers Dies; Retired Organizer

Pittsburgh—Charles J. Meyers, retired former CIO organizer and Democratic chairman in suburban Bethel Park from 1930 to 1938, died recently in Mercy Hospital here. He was 80.

He was a member of Scrap, Salvage & Waste Materials Workers LIU No. 1279 and as a young man had belonged to the Carpenters. In the early days of the former CIO he worked with the United Construction Workers Organizing Committee, and retired in 1954.

'Don't Buy' Drive Helps Win Strike

Grand Rapids, Mich.—A nationwide consumer "don't buy" campaign was credited by the Furniture Workers with helping win an eight-week strike here at the plant of the Grand Rapids Chair Co.

Members of UFW Local 415 settled the walkout with a first contract providing a 7-cent hourly wage hike, vacations of one to three weeks, six paid holidays and other benefits.

Union members struck Nov. 11 after 10 weeks of futile negotiations and sent demonstration pickets to company sales rooms in New York, Chicago and Los Angeles.

Meanwhile the UFW has asked continued support by labor of "don't buy" drives against three other firms where workers are striking for first contracts—Slumberland Products Co., out since Oct. 7 at Woburn, Mass.; Southern Furniture Mfg. Co., Cookeville, Tenn., Sept. 9; and the Jamestown Sterling Corp., Jamestown, N. Y., where a walkout started Oct. 3, 1961.

Part of the group here for a committee meeting, they are, from the left, Manuel Guzman, Union of Mexican Telephone Workers; Edward P. PTTI Latin Leaders Meet on Automation

Labor-management discussions of automation's effect on telephone workers in Latin America highlighted the first U.S. meeting of the Inter-American Advisory Committee of the Postal, Telegraph & Telephone Intl.

The committee said history was made when for the first time in memory, a group of Latin unionists met with the representative of a major North American employer to discuss means of improving labor relations for an entire industry.

The representative was Mike Gambello, Latin American negotiator for Intl. Telephone & Telegraph Co., who discussed technological unemployment of Latin workers because of increasing use of automated telephone equipment. No agreement was reached but the PTTI members viewed the exchange of views as helpful.

At its meeting in Washington, the committee agreed to hold the fifth Inter-American Congress Apr. 26-30 in Quito, Equador. Members also praised the Communications Workers for "Operation South America"—assistance to counterpart unions, and the Letter Carriers for a new "union to union" program in Bolivia. The committee reaffirmed its support of the Alliance for Progress program after a report from Irving Tragen of the Agency for Intl. Development (AID).

Speakers included Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Under Sec. John F. Henning, and Executive Dir. Serafino Romualdi and Social Projects Dir. William C. Doherty, Jr., of the American Institute for Free Labor Development. Hosts were Presidents Joseph A. Beirne of the CWA, Jerome J. Keating of the Letter Carriers and E. C. Hallbeck of the Postal Clerks.

In a ceremony at Arlington National Cemetery, Pres. Vicente Rubeira of the Cuban Telephone Workers in Exile placed a sheaf of roses on the grave of the late Pres. Kennedy and other committee members placed a single rose in the name of PTTI's 720,000 members.

Advisory committee members are Oscar Bermejo of Argentina, Alonso Contreras of Venezuela, Manuel Guzman of Mexico, Ray Hackney of the U.S., Andrew Jackson of British Guiana, Jose Lorco of Ecuador and Jorge Monteiro of Brazil. Wallace J. Legge is PTTI's inter-American representative in Washington.

TESTIMONIAL DINNER by members of Office Employes Local 153, New York, in honor of Sec.-Treas. Ben J. Cohan (left) raised $5,000 for the Lt. Joseph P. Kennedy Institute for Retarded Children. Accepting a check for that amount on behalf of the institute is Rep. Hugh Carey (D-N. Y.), who represented Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

14 Additions Listed by Film Library

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Education has issued a supplement to its film catalogue describing 14 additions to the federation's film library during the past year, which are available for rental.

The latest addition, "John F. Kennedy's Last Words to Labor," preserves on a 29-minute film the late President's address to the AFL-CIO convention in New York just a week before his assassination. Prints may be rented for $3 or purchased from the department for $35.

Guides for developing post-screening discussions have been prepared for the Kennedy speech film, "In Common Brotherhood," describing labor's efforts to help build free unions in less developed countries; "To Find a Home," which depicts the problems met by a Negro couple seeking an apartment in a northern city; and "For All the Rest of Your Life," which states the case for the King-Anderson bill to provide old-age hospital insurance under the social security system.

The department called attention to two hour-long television documentaries dealing with the plight of the nation's poor which are available for use in programs discussing the Johnson Administration's attack on poverty. They are "The Battle of Newburgh" and "Superfluous People."

Reservations for film rentals should be made at least three weeks in advance with alternate dates.

AGVA to End Old Trusteeship

Philadelphia—The Variety Artists have agreed to remove a trusteeship at their Philadelphia branch and to hold an election of officers within 90 days.

AGVA National Counsel Harold Berg said the trusteeship has been in effect since 1959 over a branch committee which did not, in the opinion of national officers, function satisfactorily. There has been no trusteeship over the branch itself, which continues to function normally, Berg reported.

Last June the Dept. of Labor filed a civil action alleging, on the basis of a member's complaint, that trusteeships of more than 18 months' duration are unlawful under the Landrum-Griffin Law unless "clear and convincing proof" of their need is offered.

Hopes Lifted, Cruikshank Says:

Rising Support Seen For Medicare Bill

A "rising tide of support" has lifted labor's hopes for passage of the King-Anderson bill this year, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Nelson Cruikshank declared in a network radio interview.

"Significant cracks" have developed, he said, in the wall of opposition to health care for the aged through the social security system.

At the recent House Ways & Means Committee hearings, Cruikshank noted, several insurance companies broke away from the industry's pattern of opposition and testified for the King-Anderson bill. So did a number of prominent physicians.

"There is more and more evidence that on this issue, as indeed on some others, the American Medical Association does not represent all of the members of the medical profession," he said. "I don't say the wall has tumbled, but there are certain significant cracks in the wall."

Cruikshank noted that social security health care legislation has been before Congress for six years and it's "not easy" to move it out of the House Ways & Means Committee. Nevertheless, he said, "we think there will be action by the committee" this year.

Committee hearings, he said, reflected "mounting support" for the legislation and "we are quite confident" a medicare bill will pass if brought to the floor of the House.

He was interviewed by Marjorie Hunter of the New York Times and Mal Schechter of Modern Medicine & Geriatrics magazines on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public affairs program heard over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

In response to questions, Cruikshank discounted the argument that the King-Anderson bill would result in "over-utilization" of hospital facilities, declaring that "a doctor is not going to commit a patient to a hospital who doesn't need hospital care."

There is an existing backlog of "unmet needs," he noted, "and there would certainly be a group of people coming into the hospital that are now kept out because they have no means of paying the bills." But that, he stressed, "is not really an argument" against the legislation.

Cruikshank acknowledged that there may be a temporary shortage of adequate nursing homes after enactment of the bill. He predicted, however, that "within a very few years a great number of new, good nursing homes would be constructed" because many more people would "have a way of paying the bill."

25,000 New Jobs Seen In Steel Vacation Plan

Cleveland—The Human Relations Committee set up under the contract between the Steelworkers and 11 basic steel producers "has been to date a useful supplement to free collective bargaining," USWA Pres. David J. McDonald told the Northern Ohio Personnel Executive Conference here.

"I want to emphasize that this committee is not a substitute for collective bargaining," he added. "It is a viable supplement."

One of the lessons its functioning has taught both union and management, he said, "is that mutual effort can accomplish far more than mutual hostility."

McDonald maintained that automation, chronic unemployment and civil rights are the country's gravest problems—and "it matters not in what order" they are placed. It is impossible to solve one wholly, he said, without solving the others, and other social and economic advances the country needs, such as a tax cut, better housing, expanded education and job training, medical care for the aged and area redevelopment, "are tied to the primary problems."

The Human Relations Committee, he said, has taken "positive steps to counteract the blight of joblessness, to cushion the impact of automation, to forward the cause of civil rights at the plant level."

"We take pride in the advances made in the area of job and income security negotiated into our contracts in the new spirit of mutual understanding," he asserted.

"These advances include the unprecedented 13-week vacation in steel and many other social benefits. . . . We believe the vacation improvements will provide more job opportunities in the industries where such benefits exist. We estimate that as many as 25,000 job opportunities will result ultimately from this benefit.

"Others may put the figure lower, but the fact remains that any gain is a step forward at a time when the onrush of technological change is creating an acute problem in the area of job opportunity."

McDonald declared that "we had better join in an all-out effort to control automation before it chokes us."

"We must learn to adjust it to our social and economic needs, just as its processes adjust and control the production it is used to improve," he said.

"Our economy cannot remain strong and healthy if millions of our people are forced out of work by machines. The fact is that only human beings have purchasing power. The machines can't buy a nickel's worth of the goods they produce."

Fair Display Slated By Maritime Union

New York—The National Maritime Union will sponsor a non-commercial park area and exhibit at the New York World's Fair, Pres. Joseph Curran has announced.

The exhibit is intended to be a tribute to U.S. seamen and "a reminder to the public of the service these seamen have given our country in peace and war," he said.

It will occupy 61,000 square feet in the Transportation Section of the fair and will consist of two water displays and a landscaped promenade with a central area that can be used for entertainment and ceremonial purposes. One of the water areas will display floating ship models, the other will feature a fountain.

Labor's Economic Review:

Clean Air Act Offers New Hope For Solving Pollution Problems

The polluted air inhaled by the American people eventually may become clean air, with a new law spelling out an action role for the federal government, the AFL-CIO has declared.

"The Polluted Air We Breathe," an article in the February issue of the American Federationist, discussed the human and economic toll of air pollution. It described how the air becomes tainted, the extent of contamination, the growing recognition of air pollution as a national problem and, finally, last December's enactment of the Clean Air Act of 1963.

In spite of the limited powers of the new law, the analysis concluded, "the federal role has now become one of action, no longer the mere gathering of data. The new law recognizes air pollution as a serious national problem affecting the national economy and the national health. A beginning has been made and the foundations for a more adequate program are laid."

The Federationist article, a Labor's Economic Review feature, was prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

Air pollution in its beginnings can be traced to the time when one of our caveman ancestors ran coughing and choking out of his smoke-filled habitat, the article said.

The article quoted writer Rachel Carson as saying that "in biological history, no organism has survived long if its environment became in some way unfit for it. But no organism before man has deliberately polluted its own environment."

The analysis observed how the right combination of circumstances can turn air pollution into a "deadly killer:"

- In Donora, Pa., in October 1948, smog settled down in the valley for three days. Twenty people died and 4,000 became acutely ill.
- In the winter of 1952, polluted and stagnant air caused over 4,000 Londoners to die in a single week.
- In December 1953, New York City sustained a week of smog which caused 200 people to die.
- In December 1962, another smog gripped London, with British medical authorities counting a final toll of 750 deaths.

And the U.S. narrowly escaped a major disaster in December 1962, the article related, when a mass of stagnant air came to rest over the densely populated eastern seaboard. Pollution levels caused alarm from Boston to Richmond for a week. Then, the article said, "by great good fortune winds blew the toxic air mass off to sea and the . . . seaboard was spared."

The report emphasized that "the air we breathe, like the land and the water that are the foundations of our life and work, has been altered" by modern society.

The air is polluted, it was explained, by the burning of fuels in the home, in factories and in motor vehicles; from chemicals used in mines and factories; from the disposal of waste materials; from new processes of scientific research.

At the same time, the fact that most Americans are concentrated in metropolitan areas intensifies the problem. The U.S. Public Health Service, it was noted, has shown a high correlation between air pollution and population concentration.

Pollution Increasing

The Surgeon-General, it was noted, has warned of increased air pollution from the rise in motor vehicles. Some 75 million vehicles were registered in 1961, about 79 million in 1962 and about 113 million are expected by 1967.

The article said motor vehicles alone discharge into the air each day 250,000 tons of carbon monoxide, up to 33,000 tons of hydrocarbons and from 4,000 to 12,000 tons of nitrogen oxides.

Air pollution has been blamed for a range of chronic respiratory diseases. It has been linked to lung cancer, has altered the climate and adversely affected agriculture. The article said the economic cost has been put at $11 billion annually by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

The AFL-CIO said the Clean Air Act of 1963, while lacking adequate enforcement powers and federal standards, moves in the right direction with expanded research, a three-year $90 million grants-in-aid program to inspire abatement activities and a first step towards clean-air standards.

THE AIR WE BREATHE is polluted, says AFL-CIO Federationist article. Two main sources are industrial smokestacks as in the Pittsburgh scene (top) and motor vehicles, whose exhaust fumes combine with stagnant air to create Los Angeles smog (bottom).

Rights Bill Progresses, FEP Termed Essential

Reports that the AFL-CIO is not "seriously concerned" about the fair employment section "are simply not true," Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote in a letter sent each member of the House.

Biemiller told the congressmen that Pres George Meany had "personally informed" House Democratic and Republican leaders that labor "wholeheartedly" backs a fair employment guarantee in the rights bill.

He enclosed excerpts from testimony by Meany and a resolution by the 1963 AFL-CIO convention calling for prompt enactment of the bill with its equal opportunity section intact.

Week-Long Debate

The House, which usually disposes of legislation in a single day, spent more than a week considering the civil rights bill section by section and voting on scores of amendments.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the following tentative actions had been taken:

- The voting rights section was approved with no major changes. This prohibits different standards for registering Negroes and whites in federal elections, prohibits denial of the vote because of immaterial errors in application records, assumes—in the absence of evidence to the contrary—that a person with a sixth grade education is literate, and sets up safeguards on use of literacy tests.

It also allows the Justice Dept. to request a three-judge federal court to hear voting cases and directs the courts to expedite hearings involving alleged denial of the right to vote.

One of the amendments approved —by a 134-98 vote—would give defendants in voting cases the same right to ask for a three-judge court as the bill gives the Justice Dept. The closest vote came on a 124-117 defeat of an attempt to broaden the bill to cover fraudulent and "tombstone" voting unrelated to racial issues.

- A southern attempt to kill the key public accommodations section of the bill was roundly defeated, 144-63.
- Also beaten was an amendment by Rep. George Meader (R-Mich.) to restrict the ban on discrimination in public accommodations to facilities along main highways. The vote was 153-68, disappointing to southern civil rights opponents who had hoped to win heavier GOP support. A similar attempt to limit coverage to establishments catering "predominantly" to interstate travelers was defeated, 165-93.
- Rep. Howard W. Smith (D-Va.) introduced what he termed an "anti-slavery" amendment declaring that nothing in the civil rights bill would require an individual to render labor or service without his consent. House Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.) quickly pointed out this would enable southerners to refuse to serve Negroes, and the amendment was beaten, 149-107.

NMU Hikes Dues By $20 a Year

New York—Members of the National Maritime Union have by referendum vote ratified 13 proposed amendments to the union's constitution, including a $20 a year increase in annual dues.

The dues proposal, bringing the annual figure to $120 a year, was supported by a vote of 6,883 to 4,191. The membership also approved a change in election procedures to empower the union's national officers to appoint some 100 port patrolmen rather than have the posts filled in regular elections. This proposal was carried by a vote of 7,604 to 3,368.

Rails Get Warning On Federal Control

Memphis—Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway Clerks warned the nation's railroads that they are headed for government control unless they face up to their responsibilities and "stop trying to get out of the transportation business."

A further "large step" toward government control would be the inevitable consequence of management reliance on litigation, congressional action and compulsory arbitration, Dennis declared at the annual installation of BRC officers in the Memphis area.

On the other hand, he said, if the railroads accept their responsibilities at the bargaining table, the result could be increased prosperity for themselves, better working conditions for their employes and higher production through new technological and organizational methods properly introduced.

"We in the labor movement do not seek to curtail productivity," he said. "We recognize that efficient methods and procedures are essential if our economy is to compete with the rest of the world. However, we also recognize that all working people must be given the opportunity to earn a decent standard of living and that any economy or system which fails to give that opportunity faces failure."

Price Cuts, Pay Raises Held Possible in Autos

Detroit—The auto industry had such "staggering profits" in 1963 that it can simultaneously cut car prices, raise the wages of its workers and still give "generous" dividends to stockholders, the Auto Workers have told Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson.

UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, in a letter assuring Johnson that the union, in forthcoming contract negotiations, will not "press for gains that would create the necessity for price increases," said that "prevention of inflation has been a central concern of the UAW" for many years.

"We earnestly hope the industry will reduce its prices, not only because the consumer is entitled to price reductions but also because lower prices would increase car sales and provide more and steadier jobs" for workers, he said.

Acknowledging Johnson's recent economic report warning against inflationary wage or price policies, Reuther cited General Motors' record $3.3 billion profits before taxes last year, its extra $2 dividends to stockholders, and $112 million set aside out of profits to pay bonuses to executives.

Reuther estimated that GM's profits after taxes on its U.S. operations represented 25.2 percent of its U.S. net worth compared with 10.5 percent for all U.S. manufacturing firms. Had GM earned only a 10.5 percent rate of return, it could have reduced car prices by $200 and given an extra $1.05 an hour to every GM hourly worker in the U.S. while continuing to treat its executives and stockholders generously, he said.

A price reduction of even $100 per car at the wholesale level would assure savings of more than $1 billion to consumers on the 7.6 million cars produced by the industry last year, Reuther wrote.

Johnson Presses Consumer Protection

'Truth' Legislation High in Program

Pres. Johnson has urged on Congress a legislative program to improve the safety and welfare of consumers with emphasis on "truth in packaging," "truth in lending," and stronger powers for the Food & Drug Administration.

The proposals "would cost us as taxpayers only a small fraction of what they would save us as consumers," the President said in his message.

"And there is no measure of what they would prevent in human suffering."

At the same time," Johnson announced he had ordered a number of administrative actions to be undertaken by his new special assistant for consumer affairs, Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson, and the President's Committee on Consumer Interests.

These, he said, are aimed at strengthening present programs of consumer protection. They would involve a series of regional consumer conferences, a special educational and communications effort to bring consumer information and advice to the low-income families who most need it, and possible adaptation of the Agriculture Dept.'s rural extension service for use in an urban setting.

The President also said he had asked his advisory committee to make recommendations for improving safeguards in the area of charges for services, which he said are just as subject "to abuses of poor quality, high prices and exaggerated claims" as are foods and drugs.

Johnson called for enactment of legislation to require "truth in packaging," such as the bill sponsored by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), to enable the housewife to tell at a glance "what is in the package, how much of it is there and how much it costs." The consumer he said, ought to have access to the information necessary to make "a rational choice" between competing products.

Hits 'Quality Stabilization'

The President also declared firm opposition to so-called "quality stabilization" legislation, which the AFL-CIO has labelled a "price-fixing device" that will lead to higher prices and do nothing to affect quality.

Declaring that cost of credit "must be made as clear and unambiguous as possible, eliminating all possibility of abuse," Johnson urged passage of legislation requiring all lenders and extenders of credit to state in advance the actual amount borrowers are committing themselves to pay and the annual rate of interest they will be required to pay. Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.) is sponsor of a pending "truth in lending" bill.

A key element in his consumer-oriented legislative package, the President said, is the housing program he sent to Congress a week earlier.

"The purchase of a home is the largest investment most American families make," he observed, adding that "good housing should be within the reach of low and moderate income families now and in the future."

Other legislation proposed in the message would:

- Beef up the testing and inspection powers of the FDA, giving it authority to inspect fully the factories in which food is processed and require safety testing of cosmetics and examination of medical devices for safety and effectiveness before they are marketed.
- Extend and clarify existing laws to make sure that labels on drugs, cosmetics and pressurized containers warn against hazards.
- Give the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare the authority to subpoena evidence in carrying out its responsibilities under the Federal Food, Drug & Cosmetic Act.
- Keep pesticides off the market until they are certified as safe by the Dept. of Agriculture.
- Require inspection for safety and wholesomeness of all meat and poultry—including that sold within a state as well as across state lines—either by the Dept. of Agriculture or in cooperation with state authorities.
- Give the Federal Trade Commission authority to issue a temporary cease-and-desist order when it starts a proceeding against unfair practices or false advertising, if it has reason to believe that the damage will be done by the time a decision is rendered.
- Extend to "over-the-counter" securities the same requirements on disclosure of information to customers that now apply to securities listed on the exchanges. A bill to accomplish this has already been passed by the Senate and is pending in the House.

CONGRATULATIONS are extended by Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, to Mrs. Ann O'Leary Sutter on her appointment as a member of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions' Committee for Women Workers' Problems. Mrs. Sutter is a member of the Retail Clerks and will attend a May meeting of the committee, which works with international trade secretariats cooperating with the ICFTU.

Senate Nearing Vote On Tax Cut Measure

bill would further reduce the already low tax wealthy investors pay on the profit they make when they sell stocks, bonds or property at a higher price than they paid. Provided they have held these assets at least six months, the maximum tax on the profits under present law is 25 percent. The House bill would have reduced the top tax rate to 21 percent.

Senate Bars Change

The Senate committee voted to scrap this House provision and leave the capital gains tax untouched. To strengthen the hand of Senate conferences in negotiating with the House on this issue, a separate vote was taken on the committee action. It carried by an impressive 56-25 margin.

College Tuition Tax Credit: A politically enticing proposal by Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (Conn.) would have given parents who pay for their children's college tuition tax credits up to $325 a year, based on a sliding percentage of tuition costs and other fees. The AFL-CIO and the Administration opposed the amendment because it would have benefited primarily families in the middle to upper income brackets who send their children to high-tuition private colleges. Only modest tax savings would have gone to families with children in state universities or other public colleges and low income families would not have been helped.

The revenue loss would have been more than $1 billion a year and Biemiller pointed out, in a letter to senators, that it would be preferable to provide "more abundant scholarships and loans directly for the young people who need them most."

Ribicoff's amendment was narrowly defeated, 48-45.

A vote on an AFL-CIO supported amendment to preserve tax exemption of most sick pay plans was pending at press time.

The House had voted to discontinue the present provision excluding from taxable income up to $100 a week in sick pay, starting with the seventh day of illness or the first day of hospitalization. In both the House bill and the Senate committee version, only benefits received after 30 days of illness would be tax-free.

Biemiller termed this "a grave injustice" to working men and women, most of whom receive only 50 to 65 percent of regular wages under negotiated sick pay benefits. He said the AFL-CIO supported an amendment by Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.) which would have gone along with the House on removing the tax exemption for persons receiving their full wages while sick, but would have continued the exemption for those under benefit plans providing less than 75 percent of normal wages.

The Senate refused to delete provisions prohibiting federal regulatory agencies from requiring public utilities, natural gas pipeline companies and transportation carriers to pass on to consumers their investment credit tax savings.

Vote Pending

Another pending amendment by Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) would prevent a second windfall to companies which already profited from the investment tax credit. The bill allows companies to base their depreciation of equipment on the full purchase price, even though the 7 percent tax credit in effect reduced the cost to the company.

A Republican proposal to eliminate $455 million in federal excise taxes on luggage, furs, jewelry and cosmetics was narrowly beaten, 48-45. Thirty-one Republicans and 14 Democrats voted for the cut; 48 Democrats were opposed.

One change the Senate made in the committee bill was to tighten the taxation on incomes of Americans who reside abroad.

The Senate killed, by tabling, a motion by Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) to scrap the entire tax bill—which he said he will vote against—and substitute a $200 increase in the present $600 exemption allowed each taxpayer and dependent. The vote was 61-33.

The Senate also defeated, 71-23, an amendment by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) to raise from $300 to $400 the minimum standard deduction in the bill for persons who do not itemize their returns—a gain for low-income families—and recoup the revenue loss by a smaller reduction in the corporation tax.

Guild Names Kadis to Head Press Study

The Newspaper Guild has named Philip M. Kadis, a Cleveland newsman, to develop a program aimed at fostering press responsibility without impairing press freedom.

The assignment of Kadis, the Guild said, is the first step in implementing the testament of Lowell Mellett, Scripps-Howard editor and columnist who bequeathed the Guild more than $38,000 in stocks to finance a study of the problem.

Mellett, a member of the Washington local at the time of his death, was the first editor of the Washington Daily News, from 1921 to 1937. He served as an adviser to Pres. Roosevelt from 1940 to 1944 and later returned to the industry as a syndicated columnist.

He died in 1960 and left the ANG 1,884 shares of stock in the Scripps-Howard Investment Co., a non-operating investment enterprise. The stocks came into the Guild's possession last November.

Kadis, who is on leave of absence from the Cleveland bureau of United Press Intl., will staff the new position for an initial period of a year. He will be charged with undertaking immediate specific action in accordance with the bequest and with developing a long-range program and additional sources of income to implement it.

Among the long-range proposals being considered, an ANG spokesman said, is establishment of a national press council, similar to that proposed by the Hutchins Commission on Freedom of the Press 15 years ago. Immediate activities may include studies of journalistic standards, newspaper monopoly, fair trials and the public's "right to know."

House Committee Kills Johnson Stamp Plan

The House Agriculture Committee turned down a part of Pres. Johnson's war on poverty by rejecting an Administration bill to extend the food stamp plan to needy persons in all states.

Five Democrats joined with a solid block of 14 committee Republicans to table the bill, 19-14.

One of the late Pres. Kennedy's first acts after taking office was to set up a pilot food stamp program in 42 depressed areas. Needy persons were given coupons which they could use for a portion of their food purchases.

Last year, Kennedy asked Congress to broaden the program to the rest of the nation and make it permanent. Pres. Johnson repeated this request in his State of the Union and farm messages and included it as a major element of his anti-poverty campaign.

Opponents of the program argued against the cost—$100 million a year more than the present limited distribution—and charged that it would inject federal controls over local welfare programs.

UAW Retirees Elect Miller of Local 22

Detroit—Dave Miller, pioneer member of the Auto Workers and a retiree of Local 22, has been elected president of the Detroit UAW Retired Workers Council.

The council is composed of delegates elected by retired members of locals in UAW Regions 1 and 1A, represents some 50,000 retirees and is affiliated with the Detroit Metropolitan Council and the National Council of Senior Citizens.

Prepaid Drug Plan Set Up In New York

New York—The New York City Dist. Council of Carpenters has instituted a comprehensive, prepaid prescription drug plan for the 30,000 union members it represents and their families.

Under an agreement reached with more than 2,000 retail pharmacists, Carpenters and their dependents may obtain prescription drugs from any of the pharmacies by paying a 50-cent fee for each prescription.

The druggists will then bill the Carpenters Welfare Fund for the balance of the cost. The fund, which is financed by employer contributions of 5 percent of wages and now totals $20 million, has appropriated $1 million to underwrite the program.

Similar prepaid prescription drug programs already have been put into effect by a number of other unions in the building and construction trades here. The Carpenters' plan was developed from studies by the council's consulting actuaries, Harold Faggen Associates, Inc.

Civil Rights Bill Goes to Senate Test

House Vote Hailed by Johnson

By David L. Perlman

A strong labor-supported civil rights bill faces its critical test in the Senate after winning a smashing 290-130 victory in the House.

Pres. Johnson hailed the House action as a "historic step forward for the cause of dignity in America."

He praised the two-party support demonstrated in the House vote and expressed the hope that "the same spirit of nonpartisanship will prevail" in the Senate, where the civil rights bill faces a certain southern filibuster. Administration leaders have said frankly that they will need the votes of a substantial portion of the 33 GOP senators to pass an effective bill.

See page 5 for key provisions of civil rights bill, page 4 for roll-call vote in House.

The Senate leadership has a choice of two methods to prevent the civil rights bill from being talked to death—seeking the two-thirds majority necessary under Senate rules to close off debate or accepting a filibuster of undetermined length hoping that national resentment against immobilization of the Senate will wear down resistance and bring the bill to a vote.

House passage of a civil rights bill was never in doubt once the legislation had been brought to the floor. The hard-fought battle was over attempts to weaken it through amendments. Southerners hoped for sufficient GOP support to kill the ban on job discrimination, sharply restrict the public accommodations section, limit the federal government's powers to move in the courts to safeguard equal rights, and prevent cutoff of federal funds to programs which discriminate against Negroes. They failed to get it.

On final passage, 138 Republicans joined 152 Democrats in voting for the civil rights bill. Opposed were 96 Democrats, almost all of them southerners, and 34 Republicans, including all 11 GOP southerners.

Southern Shift

Seven southern Democrats—four from Texas, two from Tennessee and one from Florida—broke the Dixie ranks and supported the bill. The only Democrats outside the southern and border states who voted against passage were Rep. John Lesinski of Michigan and Rep. Walter S. Baring of Nevada.

Job Picture Darkens in Nine Centers

By Robert B. Cooney

Nine of the nation's 150 major job centers suffered a worsening of their employment situations in January, the Labor Dept. has announced.

Newark, N.J., was added to the list of areas of "substantial unemployment," pushing the total to 39 from December's 38, it was reported. This group—with a jobless rate of 6 percent or more—totaled 44 in January 1963; it was down to 31 in January 1960.

Newark was reclassified into the 6 to 8.9 percent category, the report explained, because of job losses in aircraft production and in recent and over-the-year cuts in

Wirtz Presses Extension Of Wage-Hour Coverage

BIPARTISAN LEADERSHIP in the House passage of the sweeping civil rights bill was provided by Democratic Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (N.Y.), left, and Republican Rep. William M. McCulloch (O.), the committee's ranking GOP member.

Economic Needs, 'Conscience' Cited

By John M. Barry

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz urged Congress to give prompt approval to extended coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act to meet the demands of "conscience" and the "dictate of national economic interest."

"Continuing failure to cover many larger enterprises can no longer be explained away in terms of any economic justifications," Wirtz declared. "It reflects special interest pressures. It contributes to the perpetuation of a poverty we are now committed as a people to eliminate."

The secretary presented the Administration's case as a House Labor subcommittee under Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) opened hearings on Pres. Johnson's proposal to extend basic minimum wage and maximum hours protection to 735,000 more workers and remove the overtime exemption for 1,881,000 employes covered by other FLSA provisions.

Hearings on a companion bill to increase job opportunities by requiring doubletime for overtime in certain industries are scheduled to get under way Feb. 17 before a joint session of the Roosevelt subcommittee and a special labor subcommittee headed by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.).

The AFL-CIO is scheduled to testify on the doubletime measure Mar. 3 before the joint group and on the proposed FLSA extension Mar. 5 before the Roosevelt subcommittee.

At its convention in New York last November, the federation took a strong stand favoring doubletime for overtime work and reaffirming its goal of a 35-hour workweek as a means of increasing job opportunities.

In another resolution, it called for a $2 an hour federal mini-

Draft Test 'Salvage' Project Set

The Labor Dept. and the Selective Service System, responding to a directive from Pres. Johnson, have launched a "human salvage" operation to provide counseling and educational rehabilitation needed to equip thousands of the nation's young people for jobs.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, in announcing the program, said it will focus on youths who fail to qualify for military service because they are educationally or mentally deficient.

A recent task force report to the President indicated that one-third to one-half of the youths being called up for the draft are being found unfit for service, and about half of these are rejected because they fail to pass the educational attainment test.

The task force also found that most of those who failed the educational test were products of poor families.

"This isn't just another proposal for further study," Wirtz said. "This is an action program to give these young men—many

In Health Message:

Hospital Care Plan Pressed by Johnson

A strong appeal for a social security program of hospital insurance for the aged formed the cornerstone of Pres. Johnson's health message urging Congress to get on with the "remaining agenda" to assure every citizen "the full benefits of modern medical knowledge."

The President declared that neither private health insurance nor medical welfare aid under the Kerr-Mills Act offers an adequate solution to the problem of high medical costs that confront the nation's old people.

"Old age," he said, "can be a dark corridor of fear" for those forced to seek welfare aid or use their savings and succumb to poverty because of a serious illness.

"For more than a decade we have failed to meet the problem," he declared.

A "sound and workable solution . . . clearly the best method of meeting the need," Johnson said, lies in the proposal to permit workers to finance their old-age hospital insurance during their working years under the social security system.

The proposal outlined by the President followed closely the main points of the King-Anderson bill, whose chief sponsors are Rep. Cecil R. King (D-Calif.) and Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N.M.). Hearings on the measure were completed by the House Ways & Means Committee last month, and Chairman Wilbur D. Mills has indicated the committee will begin closed-door consideration of the bill early in March.

Increase in Contributions

By adding one-fourth of 1 percent to social security contributions for both workers and employers and lifting the ceiling on base income from the present $4,800 to $5,200 a year, the bill would protect the elderly against most hospitalization costs, and provide for skilled nursing home care, home health services and outpatient hospital diagnostic services.

Coverage for persons over 65 not under the social security system would be met out of administrative budget funds.

In apparent rebuttal to the American Medical Association's charge that the King-Anderson proposal would mean "socialized medicine," the President declared the arrangement "would in no

NASA Yields to Struck Rail Line, Dispute Erupts at Cape Kennedy

Cape Kennedy, Fla.—The 13-month strike against the Florida East Coast Railway reached into this government space center again as the National Aeronautics & Space Agency disregarded recommendations of a presidential board of injuiry and permitted the railroad to run trains operated by stikebreakers over a government-built spur into the base.

In quick order, there were these developments:

- The Railroad Telegraphers, one of the striking unions, put out pickets and more than 3,000 construction workers refused to cross the picket line.
- Contractors on the base filed charges that the picket line was an illegal secondary boycott under the Taft-Hartley Act and the National Labor Relations Board general counsel obtained a temporary restraining order blocking picketing.

NLRB attorneys agreed to let the court order lapse after the Telegraphers said they would withdraw pickets until 5 p. m. on Feb. 18 pending renewed government efforts to settle the dispute. The labor board left itself free to seek a new restraining order before the moratorium on picketing expires.

- The Missile Sites Labor Commission was summoned into an emergency session.

Last September, a similar attempt to run Florida East Coast trains into the space center resulted in a two-day shutdown as workers refused to cross picket lines. A high-level board of inquiry was named by then-Pres. Kennedy to consider the strike's impact.

The board, which included a representative of the National Aero-

Steel Local's Contract Cracks Area Hostility

Statesville, N. C.—A new local of the Steelworkers, organized in a town where union organizers were expected to get licenses and could not rent a hall for meetings, has ratified its first contract providing major benefits for 771 workers at the Southern Screw Div. of the National Lead Co. here.

The contract, first fruit of a southern organizing drive of the USWA and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., was reached with the assistance of USWA Pres. David J. McDonald, Elliot Bredhoff of the union's legal counsel, and USWA Dist. Dir. Lorne Nelles.

Workers at the plant, said to make more than half of all the wood screws produced in the U.S., will get wage boosts of 6 cents an hour now, 6 cents next July 15 and 5 cents more a year later; shift premiums of 7 cents an hour for the second shift, 12 cents the third shift; plus a $50 cash bonus for workers on the payroll as of last Nov. 1 in lieu of a retroactive wage hike.

Other benefits include the basic steel pension plan, vacations up to four weeks after 20 years, job posting, safety equipment furnished by management, sick benefits up to $35 a week, jury pay and reporting-in pay.

The IUD and the USWA started the drive to organize the plant last May after letting it be known that the town's license law for "solicitors" would be challenged in court. There were no arrests made, and the union won a National Labor Relations Board election early in July, 471 to 235.

Negotiations were held over a seven-month period, with McDonald and Bredhoff, of Feller, Bredhoff & Anker, Washington, D. C., helping on final terms. Also involved, besides the IUD, were Nelles and USWA southern staff members.

The organizers reported space for meetings could not be rented, not even in the Post Office building. The only exception was a skating rink owned by a widow who agreed to let union members meet. Three hours after the first meeting, the rink burned to the ground from undetermined causes. Other meetings were held in Harmony, N. C., 21 miles away.

The union is the first in Iredell County, center of a region noted for being unreceptive to organized labor. Members report a growing potential for new organization in plants now opening in the area.

Miss Dickason Retires from ACWA Post

New York—Gladys Dickason has retired as a vice president of the Clothing Workers and director of the Southern Organization Dept. after 30 years of service with the union.

She has suffered from ill health which in recent years has forced her to curtail her activities.

"You have shared with us the trials and tribulations for so many years," said Executive Vice Pres. Hyman Blumberg, "that it is hard to imagine the organization without you . . . The contribution you have made is impossible to measure."

Blumberg also wrote on behalf of Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky and Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum to express the officers' regret at her retirement.

Former Economics Teacher

Miss Dickason was born on a cotton farm in Galena, Okla., attended the University of Oklahoma and Columbia University, and taught economics at Sweet Briar and Hunter Colleges before joining the union as an organizer in 1933.

From 1935 to 1954 she was research director. In addition she was assistant director of the former CIO Southern Organizing Committee and director of the ACWA's southern region. She became an ACWA vice president in 1945.

She served on many state and federal advisory groups over the years and had an active interest in the role of women in the labor movement. In 1951 the National Council of Negro Women cited her for her work in this area.

CLC Names Irvine To Research Post

Ottawa, Ont.—Russell B. Irvine, research director of the New Democratic Party since November 1961, has been appointed assistant research director of the Canadian Labor Congress.

Irvine, a native of New Liskeard, Ont., formerly was a specialist on Canadian affairs in the research department of the Chemical Workers. He joined the Woodworkers while working in the northern Ontario bush on a summer job at the age of 16, was graduated from the University of Toronto and is now working on his thesis for at doctorate from Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Joblessness Worsens In Nine Major Centers

electrical and non-electrical machinery and in toy manufacturing.

Eight other areas were shifted to higher jobless groups.

Four moved into the 9-to-12 percent category. Brockton and Lowell, Mass., reported increased unemployment due to downtrends in electrical machinery and leather products; Huntington, W. Va.-Ashland, Ky., had seasonal cutbacks in construction and stone-clay-glass industries, and the Duluth, Minn.-Superior, Wis., area suffered from a winter shutdown of Great Lakes shipping.

Four areas were moved from the 1.5 to 2.9 percent jobless grouping into the 3 to 5.9 percent category. They were Davenport-Rock Island-Moline, Ill.; Lancaster, Pa.; Kenosha and Madison, Wis. The main common factor was a seasonal job cutback.

The Labor Dept.'s list of smaller areas of substantial unemployment totaled 153 in January, revealing no change from December and remaining 17 below the total of a year ago. This group was down to 107 in January 1960.

Five "very small" areas were added to the substantial unemployment list: Cartersville, Conyers and Douglasville, Ga., and Bennington and St. Albans, Vt.

All told, the Labor Dept. now lists 574 areas—17 major, 97 smaller and 460 very small—as "areas of substantial and persistent unemployment." These sections have been recommended to the Commerce Dept. for designation as "redevelopment areas," the report noted.

In a separate list of areas eligible for aid under the Public Works Acceleration Act, the Labor Dept. reported four "smaller" areas were removed and five "very small" areas were added in January. This put the total at 318 areas.

Dressmakers Win Pact, Avoid Strike

New York—The Ladies' Garment Workers won a package of wage and welfare gains averaging 8 percent in a new three-year agreement which averted an eight-state walkout of 80,000 dressmakers and allied workers.

Contract terms were accepted by three employer jobber groups on the last day of a 10-day deadline extension granted by the negotiators at the request of Mayor Robert F. Wagner. Two groups of contractors demanded that the jobbers share more of the increased costs, and Harry Uviller, dress industry impartial chairman, was named by Wagner to mediate the dispute between the jobbers and the contractors. The union warned that strikes may be needed in some shops to enforce the agreement.

Stewards Ratify

The new pact, approved by 2,500 union shop stewards and chairmen at a Manhattan Center meeting, provides these improvements for workers in some 2,000 shops:

- Wage increases of $6 a week for cutters and of 5 percent for other weekly paid workers with a minimum of $3. Piece workers will get hikes of 3.23 percent on Mar. 2, 1964, and another 3.23 percent next Feb. 1.
- Raises in minimums of 16 to 40 cents an hour, based on craft.
- Increases in employer contributions to the welfare fund to bring total contribution to 12.5 percent of payroll by Feb. 1, 1966. Included is 2 percent to provide an extra week's vacation.

The agreement calls for installation of time clocks in all shops that do not now have them to insure payment of the minimums prescribed under the new contract.

During negotiations that started Dec. 12, ILGWU Vice Pres. Charles S. Zimmerman headed the union committee, joined in the closing days by union Pres. David Dubinsky. Both Zimmerman and Dubinsky recommended approval.

Shirt Plant Vote Won By Clothing Workers

Cookeville, Tenn.—The Clothing Workers have won a National Labor Relations Board election among employes of the Martin Shirt Co. here by a vote of 142 to 122 and are pressing for negotiations on a first contract.

Appeals Court Orders Pay for Waiting Time

Atlanta, Ga.—The 5th Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled that a Georgia sawmill violated the Fair Labor Standards Act by failing to pay workers for waiting time while repairs were made during machinery breakdowns.

The appeals court reversed a decision by the U.S. District Court for Middle Georgia which denied an injunction sought by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

Machinery breakdowns at the Sullivan Lumber Co. occurred on an average of less than once a week, according to testimony in the case. If repairs could be completed in half an hour or less, the men were paid for their idle time. If a longer period was required, and it could be estimated, the men were released and told to report again at a specified time.

Usually, however, the length of time needed for repairs could not be estimated and the workers were told to "stick around" and be ready to resume work when the machinery again was in working order.

The lower court found this to be a "practical solution" to the problem.

Wirtz, however, argued that employes required to wait at or near the mill during the breakdowns were entitled to payment for this waiting. The appeals court agreed, stating:

"If the worker must stick around so as to be ready to resume work when the whistle blows, there is a detriment to the worker. These employes, waiting at or near their place of work to resume work, were on duty and the time spent in waiting was time given by the employes to the employer.

"We conclude that the waiting time of the employes during breakdowns, since the employes are required or requested to remain, is working time for which the employes are entitled to compensation."

Local Union Program Set Up to Fight Cancer

New York—A booklet setting up programs to help local unions save the lives of more than 500,000 present AFL-CIO members has been published as a joint venture of AFL-CIO Community Services Activities and the American Cancer Society.

The 12-page pamphlet, the AFL-CIO Cancer Education Program Guide, "is an important step forward in cooperative action against the nation's second biggest killer," said CSC National Dir. Leo Perlis and ACS Executive Vice Pres. Lane W. Adams in a joint statement.

It lists films, posters, pamphlets, exhibits and other educational materials as stressing the importance of early diagnosis and treatment of the disease which will be made available to AFL-CIO unions free of charge through the cancer society's divisions and units.

"Of the 290,00 Americans who will probably die of cancer this year, more than one-third will die because their conditions were not diagnosed in time," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany emphasized in a statement introducing the booklet.

Dr. Harold S. Diehl, ACS senior vice president for research and medical affairs, said the guide is based "on the medical fact that about half of all cancers are presently curable . . . if treated in time."

He cited statistics showing that with 13 million AFL-CIO members, 3.25 million would be expected to get cancer over the years at present trends.

"At present rates 1,083,000 will be cured," he said. "But this figure could and should be 1,625,000. Thus . . . there would be 542,000 needless deaths from cancer just in the ranks of the AFL-CIO. Our aim is to close the life-saving gap."

Circuit Court Acts:

Decision Reaffirmed In 'Runaway' Case

New York—The 2d U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals here has reaffirmed its 1961 decision in a "runaway" plant case involving five former employes of the Glidden Co. and its Durkee Famous Foods division.

A unanimous court voted 3-0 to deny Glidden's motion to dismiss the complaint, granted the motion of five former workers for judgment and sent the case back to the U.S. District Court for a hearing on the amount of damages due the plaintiffs, who first sued Glidden for failure to offer them jobs when the Durkee plant was moved from Elmhurst, N.Y., to Bethlehem, Pa.

The court also sent back a second suit involving a claim for damages by 160 other ex-employes. The suits were filed at about the same time but the second remained in abeyance while the five-person case was processed as a test.

In its latest decision the court held unanimously that it should follow the "law of the case," a doctrine under which a court will not reopen a previously decided issue unless there is a "clear conviction of error." Chief Judge J. Edward Lumbard, "reluctantly concurring" with the other two judges, agreed that the lower court was correct in refusing to let Glidden present evidence it claimed was "new" but which it could have presented in 1961.

The suits involved the action of Glidden in closing its Elmhurst plant Nov. 30, 1957, at the conclusion of its contract with the unaffiliated Teamsters, and moving some of the machinery and all the production to Bethlehem.

The union gave notice, before the closing, of its intention to arbitrate on the ground that numerous members had seniority rights and the suits filed claimed that these seniority rights survived the expired contract.

The test suit was dismissed by U.S. Judge Edmund L. Palmieri in 1960, but his ruling was reversed the following year in a 2-1 decision, with Appellate Judge Lumbard dissenting.

The majority cited several New York court decisions upholding the argument that "rights embodied in a collective bargaining contract enure to the direct benefit of employes" and may be the subject of a lawsuit.

Disputing the firm's "bold position" that the employes had no rights that survived the contract, the other two judges said Glidden lived up to other provisions of the contract at Elmhurst by continuing to give retirement pay to former employes, by continuing to pay early retirees and disabled employes, and by promising vested pension rights at 65 to workers who had reached 45 when the plant closed.

Pilot Program to Aid Idle Los Angeles Youth

Los Angeles—The government has announced a large-scale attack on joblessness and delinquency among juveniles here that may develop into a pilot operation to shape national policy for combatting "hard core" poverty in large metropolitan areas.

Emphasis in the Los Angeles program—one weapon in the Johnson Administration's "war on poverty"—will be on education and counseling oriented to job needs and family problems.

The basic idea is to get coordinated help to thousands of young people between the ages of 16 and 21 who are jobless and out of school in the "demonstration area" of the city—the South Central and East districts.

The rate of unemployment in these districts ranges up to 29.8 percent of the work force compared with 6.6 percent for the city as a whole. More than two-thirds of those in the study area have not completed high school and most of the population is Negro.

The Los Angeles AFL-CIO, through Sec. W. J. Bassett, has pledged its full support of the project.

The program will cost about $2.5 million the first year and about $6 million more over its full period of five years. It will include a $117,000 research study of unemployment in the area and a unique combination of efforts by federal, state, county and city governments, the county and city school systems and dozens of private welfare and service agencies.

In Washington, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said the federal share of the financing will come largely from funds available under the Manpower Development & Training Act and the Juvenile Delinquency Act.

It will be combined with commitments from state and local agencies to provide coordinated assistance to young people of the area, including job and family counseling, mental and physical examinations and health services, job training and placement services, remedial education, recreational aid and —under the Area Redevelopment Act—economic assistance in creating job opportunities.

Wirtz, speaking on behalf of other members of the President's Committee on Juvenile Delinquency —Atty. Gen. Robert Kennedy and Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Anthony J. Celebrezze—said that 4,100 young persons will participate in the MDTA phase of the project. Of these, he said, 3,100 will take specific training courses to equip them for jobs and the others will be tested and counseled for referral to present work opportunities.

The study phase of the program will be undertaken through the University of California Industrial Relations Institute. It will survey the availability of jobs and land and buildings, literacy and skill levels, capital requirements and proposals for area redevelopment within the city. The study qualifies for government aid under a new yardstick, which may be applied to an area of a large city.

Rep. August F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), one of the plan's sponsors, said the comprehensive, integrated approach it will follow differs from the "segmented, partial action we now use, and may prove to be a pattern for the entire nation."

Robert Goe, head of the Youth Opportunities Board here, which is coordinating much of the program, described the target section as "dying, not only in social terms, but in economic terms. . . . It has more of nearly everything that is bad, from substandard streets to high crime rates, than any other part of the community."

SUPPORT IN STRUGGLE of Chicago Teachers Local 1 for recognition as bargaining agent of public school teachers was pledged at mass meeting by Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers, shown addressing the assemblage, and Pres. William A. Lee of the Chicago AFL-CIO.

Teachers Get Backing In Bargaining Drive

Chicago—Twenty-seven hundred members of the Chicago Teachers Union jammed into Orchestra Hall here in a union mass meeting on bargaining and got pledges of assistance and full-scale support from Pres. William A. Lee of the Chicago AFL-CIO and Pres. Walter Reuther of the Auto Workers.

With about 600 teachers turned away because the hall was filled, the mass meeting heard local Pres. John M. Fewkes announce that a strike vote would be taken Mar. 2 unless the Chicago Board of Education grants bargaining rights.

The board is scheduled to meet Feb. 26 to reconsider its previous refusal of recognition for bargaining purposes. The local represents more than 13,000 of the city's 21,000 teachers and Fewkes said the strike, if approved, would begin Mar. 12.

"You need a strong union to get the benefits you deserve," Reuther told the teachers, "and we'll give you persuasive support to get it."

Lee predicted that the union, Local 1 of the American Federation of Teachers, "will soon achieve its goal of genuine collective bargaining" and said he found Mayor Richard Daley and several school board members "serious in their consideration of your objectives."

Chicago labor, Lee continued, is in complete agreement with the Teachers that "collective bargaining is the democratic method of resolving issues."

"Teachers in the classroom are not exempted from the impact of history," he declared. "Collective bargaining is no longer the wave of the future for teachers and other public employes. One of Pres. Kennedy's lesser-known legacies is the establishment of collective bargaining for federal employes. It's been tested, and it works, in our national government.

Need Seen for Equality

"The need of the teachers for equality at the bargaining table is now in the interest of our children, the teachers and the schools."

AFT Pres. Carl J. Megel told the teachers to take heart because union teachers all over the country are involved in the same battle. Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), a member of the Chicago Teachers Union, was scheduled to address the mass meeting. Action on the tax bill, he said in a telegram, prevented him from leaving Washington.

Reuther told the meeting that a sweeper at General Motors makes more than the average teacher.

"This does not mean a floor sweeper is making too much money," he said. "It means Chicago teachers are not getting enough money.

"The National Education Association speaks for administrators. The NEA is long on platitudes and short on practical performance.

"The only thing unprofessional about you is your pay checks, and you'll never get a professional pay check without a strong union and collective bargaining."

'Bargaining Prevents Strikes'

Theme of the mass meeting was "collective bargaining prevents strikes."

Meanwhile, a majority of Morton High School teachers in Cicero and Berwyn, Ill., authorized the Morton Council of West Suburban Teachers, Local 571, to represent them before the Morton High School and Junior College Board of Education.

The Morton school board averted a one-day strike Jan. 27 by approving a Local 571 petition to hold a representation election. Sixty-seven percent, or 240 of 362 eligible teachers, signed petitions circulated last week. The union will soon begin negotiations for a written agreement defining methods to be used in settling teacher disputes.

Studio Pacts Boost Income Of Musicians

New York—Contracts advancing the use of live over "canned" music, plus an increase in films being musically-scored in this country rather than abroad, put an extra $302,762 into the pockets of members of the Musicians employed by independent West Coast movie studios during the first half of 1963, according to AFM Pres. Herman D. Kenin.

The increase in earnings over the first half of 1962, he said, was divided among union musicians, arrangers and copyists who worked on feature motion pictures and non-theatrical and miscellaneous films in the studios of some 48 producers. They do not include musician employment in the so-called major studios.

The figures were compiled for Kenin by Phil Fischer, his West Coast assistant. They showed that the union musicians received wages of $539,982 in the first two quarters of 1963, compared to $237,219 in the same period of 1962.

Kenin said the AFM "worked long and hard" for the contract clauses that promoted the use of "live" music in movies and the music-scoring of films at home rather than abroad, "and the dividends are thus all the more appreciated."

Demand for Engineers Dips Sharply

Unemployment is spreading to engineers and scientists, Business Week magazine reports, as industry's demands for these professionals dipped sharply during the past seven months.

Jobs have become harder to find and to hold, the magazine reports, and layoffs are spreading as a result of defense cutbacks.

Public manpower experts are concerned by the trend although the number of jobs lost is small compared to total employment in the field.

They point out that in the past 15 years similar cutbacks in technical employment were followed in eight months or less by dips in the economy.

They note also, the magazine said, that layoffs of engineers and scientists are ordinarily followed by layoffs in production departments.

Registration Stressed By Barkan in Chicago

Chicago—Voter registration, education and fund-raising are the three main political jobs confronting organized labor in election year 1964, Alexander Barkan, national director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, told delegates to the Chicago AFL-CIO.

Addressing the central body's monthly meeting, Barkan observed that while nearly all of the city's "bankers, business people and Gold Coasters" are registered to vote, less than half the working families are on the poll lists.

"We must lead our members to the place of registration," he declared.

The delegates voted to increase monthly per capita payments to the central body from 3 cents to 5 cents. Pres. William A. Lee, who is also area COPE chairman, said the additional funds would be used to put COPE on a year-around basis and to finance expansion of federation activities.

Barkan pledged the full support of the national COPE organization and its staff, declaring, "we want Chicago to show the way to other large cities."

He noted that voluntary dollar contributions to COPE will be particularly important this year with liberal senators in the "class of 1958" coming up for reelection. They need help, he said, and labor is one of the few sources of help available to them.

The education task, Barkan suggested, involves bringing to the public labor's position on such election issues as social security hospital insurance and the need for a shorter workweek to help cut into the high rate of joblessness.

Urging establishment of a COPE Women's Activities Div. in the city, he said that women are "our most valuable political asset," especially in registration work, because "they are willing to do the phone calling and doorbell ringing that is necessary."

Rollcall in House on Civil Rights Bill

Here is the rollcall by which the House passed the civil rights bill, which the AFL-CIO termed "the most important moral issue" before Congress this year. The vote was 290-130. Democrats voted 152-96 for the bill; Republicans supported it 138-34.

On labor's scoreboard a vote for the bill was a right vote (R), while a vote against was a wrong vote (W). Other symbols: A—absent; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; NV—not voting. Numerals denote districts; AL—at large.

House Victory Hailed:

Rights Bill Faces New Test in Senate

licans opposing passage was from California, where five of the state's 15 GOP congressmen voted against the bill.

The House defeated, 150-90, an attempt to kill the equal employment opportunities section of the bill, which the AFL-CIO vigorously supported as essential to civil rights progress.

One change approved was addition of a ban on sex discrimination in employment, proposed by Rep. Howard W. Smith (D-Va.), an outspoken foe of civil rights legislation. Despite opposition from the principal supporters of the bill, who argued that it didn't belong in the measure and would detract from the efforts to eliminate race, nationality and religious discrimination, it was accepted 168-133.

Also adopted was an amendment by Rep. John M. Ashbrook, Ohio Republican who later voted against passage of the bill, which would allow an employer to refuse to hire an atheist. Another amendment would allow refusal to hire a Communist.

The fair employment provision would go into effect one year after enactment for employers and unions with 100 or more workers. The original committee bill would have extended coverage to 25 or more workers in two annual steps; the House voted to stretch this out to three steps.

The far-ranging bill was voted on almost line for line during nine days of debate. The votes, except for the final rollcall, were taken when the House was meeting as the Committee of the Whole, by either a teller count or voice vote. Civil rights supporters worked successfully to keep a majority on the floor for all important votes.

To Follow Tax Bill

The Senate, in recess while Republicans make their traditional Lincoln Day speeches around the country, is expected to take up the civil rights bill after the tax bill has been sent to the White House, probably by Feb. 22.

Administration leaders are expected to put the House-passed bill directly on the calendar, bypassing the southern-led Judiciary Committee which has been sitting on civil rights legislation for years. The battle is likely to begin when Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) moves to take up the House bill for debate.

Examiner Rules Against ILA District

A National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has found that the Longshoremen's South Atlantic & Gulf Coast District and an all-white ILA local discriminated against an all-Negro local under an arrangement dividing dockwork on a 75-25 percent basis.

Trial Examiner Thomas Kessel ruled that the district and Local 1367 failed to fulfill their duty under the Taft-Hartley Act "to represent all employes in the bargaining unit fairly and impartially" because the work quota provision denied Negro members of Local 1368 equal opportunity to obtain available dock work.

The two locals have jurisdiction over longshore work in Brownsville, Harlingen and Port Isabel, Tex. They are among 26 locals along the Gulf Coast which the district serves as joint bargaining representative with employer associations.

Kessel recommended that the district and Local 1367 be ordered to refrain from enforcing the work quota provision incorporated in the contract, as well as what he called an unwritten arrangement forbidding the assignment of white and Negro work gangs in the same ship hatches. He also recommended that the district be ordered to take necessary steps to secure the removal of an ILA trusteeship imposed on Local 1368 after it had filed the charges with the NLRB.

The trial examiner's ruling is subject to review by the full board if exceptions are filed.

Equal Opportunity Unit Promotes Williams

Percy Williams has been named a special assistant to Hobart Taylor, Jr., executive vice chairman of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, to develop closer coordination with state and local agencies working to combat job discrimination.

Williams previously had been director of contract compliance for the committee, which has the responsibility of enforcing Presidential executive orders barring racial discrimination in hiring by the government or by contractors on federally-assisted construction projects.

CITATION OF THE YEAR award given by Comeback, Inc., is presented to Clothing Workers' Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky in recognition of the ACWA's pioneering role in rehabilitating disabled workers. The presentation on behalf of Comeback, an organization that promotes rehabilitation services, is made by Dr. Howard Rusk, left, and Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze.

Provisions of Bill Passed by House Aimed at Erasing Discrimination

Following are the principal provisions of the civil rights bill passed by the House of Representatives:

VOTING RIGHTS

In all federal elections, registrars are prohibited from applying different standards to Negro and white applicants. Literacy tests must be in writing unless state law authorizes an oral test, and applicants have the right to demand a transcript of the questions and answers, whether the test is written or oral. Applicants may not be disqualified because of immaterial errors or omissions in registration forms. The law presumes that a person with a sixth grade education is sufficiently literate to vote, subject to rebuttable evidence to the contrary.

Federal courts are directed to expedite voting cases and either the Attorney General or the defendant may have the case heard by a three-judge panel rather than by a single district judge.

The protections apply to any general, special or primary election in which a federal office is to be filled. They would not cover any exclusively state or local election.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS

Discrimination, including refusal of service and segregation, is prohibited in:

- Hotels, motels and other establishments providing lodgings to transients, except for owner-occupied rooming houses with no more than five rooms for rent.
- Public eating places, including restaurants, cafeterias, lunch counters and soda fountains.
- Establishments used for exhibitions or entertainment, including movie theaters, concert halls and sports arenas.

Establishments not included, such as barber shops and retail stores, are covered if they are located in a covered establishment or if they include a covered establishment. Thus a barber shop in a hotel would come under the law. So would a department store which had a lunch counter.

All forms of discrimination are prohibited if based on a state or local law, encouraged by state or local action, or based on local "custom" even if not spelled out by law.

Persons who believe they have been denied service because of race, religion or national origin may bring suit or ask the Attorney General to bring suit for a federal district court injunction barring continued discrimination.

STATE FACILITIES

The bill allows the Attorney General to bring suit to desegregated facilities owned or operated by a state or subdivision. It also authorizes the Attorney General to move in federal courts to aid citizens denied protection of the law on the basis of race, religion or national origin. Without this authority, the government could file a "friend of the court" brief, but the burden of the suit would rest on the complaining party.

A separate section of the bill authorizes appeals from federal court orders which subject civil rights cases to lengthy delays by sending them back to state courts.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

Federal grants are authorized to help school boards provide training for teachers and other school personnel to deal with desegregation problems. The U.S. Commissioner of Education is directed to survey the progress of school desegregation and to provide technical assistance, on request, with desegregation plans. The Attorney General is empowered to initiate suits on behalf of children and their parents.

FEDERAL PROGRAMS

Discrimination in any program receiving federal financial assistance is declared contrary to public policy and federal agencies are authorized, although not required, to cut off federal funds after notice, hearings and efforts to obtain voluntary compliance. An order to cut off funds must be approved by the President and local or state agencies thus penalized may appeal to the federal courts.

JOB DISCRIMINATION

Employers, employment agencies and unions are barred from discriminating on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin or sex, effective one year after enactment.

For the first year after the effective date, employers and unions with 100 or more workers are covered. This drops to 75 the second year and 50 the third year. Thereafter all employers with 25 workers in industries "affecting commerce" will be covered.

"Unlawful employment practices," under the bill, include the following:

- Refusal by an employer to hire a person because of race, color, religion or national origin.
- Discrimination, on those grounds, in pay or other conditions or benefits.
- Segregation or classification of employes in a way which deprives any group of employment opportunities.
- Refusal or failure of an employment agency to refer persons to jobs because of their race, religion or origin.
- Exclusion from membership or any other form of discrimination by a union on the basis of race, creed or origin. Specifically prohibited are segregation tending to deprive an individual of employment opportunities and any attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an individual on racial grounds.
- Discrimination in apprenticeship and other training programs, whether operated by employers, by unions or jointly.
- Retaliatory discrimination against any individual by an employer, employment agency or union because of charges, testimony or participation in any investigation or proceeding dealing with alleged violations of civil rghts.

The bill establishes a bipartisan, five-member Equal Opportunity Commission with staggered terms, to be named by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The commission is given broad powers of investigation of complaints, including the power to inspect records.

If discrimination is found, the commission is directed to use an informal approach to seek voluntary agreement to discontinue discriminatory practices. If this approach fails, the commission is authorized to bring a civil suit in a federal district court against the offending party. The court, if it finds the charge sustained, may enjoin the offender from further violations and may require hiring or reinstatement of workers, with back pay if appropriate.

The commission is authorized but not obligated to make an agreement ceding jurisdiction to state or local fair employment agencies which have effective powers.

CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION

The life of the Civil Rights Commission is extended four years and it is given an added function, not necessarily related to racial discrimination, to investigate alleged patterns of fraud in any federal election.

A separate Community Relations Service is established under the Commerce Dept. to assist in voluntary community efforts to eliminate discrimination.

VOTER CENSUS

The bill directs the Census Bureau to compile registration and voting statistics by race, color and national origin in areas designated by the Civil Rights Commission. Such information could presumably be used as a basis for reducing representation in the House, under the 14th Amendment, for states which deny the equal right to vote.

Now for the Senate

HOUSE passage of the civil rights bill by an overwhelming vote is a clear victory for responsible democratic government. Although the victory and the vote came months later than necessary —and in historical perspective a century after equal rights were written into the Constitution—it must be regarded as a major accomplishment in facing up to the greatest moral issue of our times.

The debate in the House was pertinent and germane. The handful of racist demagogues, or those seeking political advantage, receded into nearly complete ineffectiveness. The tone and tenor of the exchanges reflected the awareness that equal rights could no longer be treated as either a narrowly legalistic or a partisan issue.

Highlighting the House's performance was the impressive coalition of northern and liberal Democrats and moderate and liberal Republicans, holding fast to the concept that a meaningful bill must be voted in face of opposition from the remnants of the more familiar conservative coalition.

The action of the House, the nine debate-filled days, should be required reading for all members of the Senate as the civil rights bill now heads for its encounter with an expected southern filibuster.

The bipartisan coalition that was formed in the House can become the basis for a similar grouping in the Senate that will be able, after adequate time for full discussion of all the complex provisions of the House-passed measure, to terminate a filibuster and bring the measure to a vote.

There is no question that a sizable majority of the Senate would favor the House civil rights measure if the Senate is allowed to vote on the merits of the bill.

And the bill as adopted by the House, by and large, meets the qualifications of meaningful and effectively-drawn legislation. To modify or weaken it would be to retreat to the concept of partial equality, justice in small, inadequate doses—a concept that the nation will no longer tolerate.

The issue is clear. The House has turned in an excellent job and rates a solid "well done." The Senate can do no less if America is to rise above words and phrases and clothe equal rights with meaning rooted in law.

Mary Anderson

THERE IS relatively casual acceptance today of women's rights in an increasingly number of areas—rights that were non-existent at the beginning of the century when Mary Anderson tackled the job of organizing women into trade unions. And the government of those days had a minimal interest in the fate of women workers.

Mary Anderson, an immigrant Swedish dishwasher, led the fight that brought victory to the struggle for women's rights. And, unlike some of the other leaders in that fight, she had neither middle-class assets nor education. Hers was the outrage of a working-class woman seeking social justice.

Her 30 years as head of the Women's Bureau in the Labor Dept. were of lasting significance and importance in the development of the nation. She richly deserves to be enshrined among the greats as a champion not only of women's rights but of labor.

'Out of My Way'

Kerr-Mills Needed, Too:

Text of Pres. Johnson's Message On Hospital Insurance for Aged

Pres. Johnson's health message to Congress contained the following section entitled "Hospital Insurance for the Aged."

NEARLY 30 YEARS AGO, this nation took the first long step to meet the needs of its older citizens by adopting the social security program. Today, most Americans look toward retirement with some confidence that they will be able to meet their basic needs for food and shelter.

But many of our older citizens are still defenseless against the heavy medical costs of severe illness or disability:

- One-third of the aged who are forced to ask for old age assistance do so because of ill health, and one-third of our public assistance funds going to older people is spent for medical care.
- For many others, serious illness wipes out savings and carries their families into poverty.
- For these people, old age can be a dark corridor of fear.

The irony is that this problem stems in part from the surging progress in medical science and medical techniques—the same progress that has brought longer life to Americans as a whole.

Modern medical care is marvelously effective—but increasingly expensive. Daily hospital costs are now four times as high as they were in 1946, averaging about $37 a day. In contrast, the average social security benefit is just $77 a month for retired workers and $67 a month for widows.

Existing "solutions" to these problems are (1) private health insurance plans and (2) welfare medical assistance. No one of them is adequate, nor are they in combination:

Private insurance, when available, usually costs more than the average retired couple can afford.

Welfare medical assistance for the aged is not available in many states—and where it is available, it includes a needs test to which older citizens, with a lifetime of honorable, productive work behind them, should not be subjected.

This situation is not new. For more than a decade we have failed to meet the problem.

THERE IS A SOUND and workable solution. Hospital insurance based on social security payments is clearly the best method of meeting the need. It is a logical extension of the principle—established in 1935 and confirmed time after time by Congress—that provision should be made for later years during the course of a lifetime of employment. Therefore I recommend a hospital insurance program for the aged aimed at two basic goals:

First, it should protect against the heaviest costs of a serious illness—the costs of hospital and skilled nursing home care, home health services, and outpatient hospital diagnostic services.

Second, it should provide a base that related private programs can supplement.

To achieve these goals:

1—These benefits should be available to everyone who reaches 65.

2—Benefit payments should cover the cost of services customarily furnished in semi-private accommodations in a hospital, but not the cost of the services of personal physicians.

3—The financing should be soundly funded through the social security system.

4—One-quarter of 1 percent should be added to the social security contribution paid by employers and by employes.

5—The annual earnings subject to social security taxes should be increased from $4,800 to $5,200.

6—For those not now covered by social security, the cost of similar protection would be provided from the administrative budget.

Under this proposal, the costs of hospital and related services can be met without any interference whatever with the method of treatment. The arrangement would in no way hinder the patient's freedom to choose his doctor, hospital, or nurse.

The only change would be in the manner in which individuals would finance the hospital costs of their later years. The average worker under social security would contribute about a dollar a month during his working life to protect himself in old age in a dignified manner against the devastating costs of prolonged hospitalization.

Hospitalization, however, is not the end of older people's medical needs. Many aged individuals will have medical expenses that will be covered neither by social security, hospital insurance nor by private insurance.

Therefore, I urge all states to adopt adequate programs of medical assistance under the Kerr-Mills legislation. This assistance is needed now. And it will be needed later as a supplement to hospital insurance.

Morgan Says:

Threnody for Last Edition Holds Prospect of an Improved Press

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

NEW YORK—Obituaries are sad assignments, especially when they deal with the death of the young endowed with the legacy of important promise. The New York Times has announced it has decided to discontinue its western edition after less than 16 months of life. Thoughtful citizens in the 13 western states where the edition circulated will mourn this bright fledgling's loss and so will people everywhere who take the time to realize how vital an informed public is—in contrast to an inflamed public—and how alarmingly uninformed or downright misinformed so many of us are so much of the time.

Morgan

Saying it was taking this action with "great regret," the Times management cited economic reasons for its decision. A leaner version of the often voluminous New York paper, the western edition was published in the same format, and Times editorials and dispatches were transmitted to its Los Angeles office in a fantastically swift, complex—and costly—operation of advanced automatic machinery.

The circulation had passed 85,000 but costs of transmission and distribution were unexpectedly high. Advertising revenues fell short of estimates and projections of growth were disappointing. Since the project was launched on the principle that it had to pay for itself, not be kept afloat by the home office, the Times said it had "no other choice" than to suspend it.

The Times and the Wall Street Journal, which prints its editions five days a week in seven cities across the land, are the closest thing we have to "national" newspapers in this country. This is not surprising, considering the huge geographical sprawl and the sharp regional differences of the republic. But what is surprising—and depressing—is that the public has not developed a more discerning taste and insistent demand for real quality in newspapers.

We Americans have developed some deplorable reading habits. The conclusion is almost inescapable that a large part of the fault lies in a failure of our educational system to place more emphasis on the importance of being informed on current events and of hammering this point home to fresh young minds. Perhaps this emphasis should be framed in school courses on the appraisal and evaluation of daily information and where to look for it. I don't know how psychologically sound the idea is, but those brave and hardy souls trying currently to break the cigaret habit or at least cut down on smoking might find it a fruitful diversion to fill the tense void by trying to improve their reading habits.

Maybe I am an oversensitive nut on the subject but I was appalled on a trip to San Francisco last fall to discover that the vice president of a bank I happened to be talking to had never even seen a copy of the western edition of the New York Times.

He took the Wall Street Journal, whose news columns contain some of the best reporting in the country, but he gave the impression he knew his horizon of knowledge on national and foreign affairs was rather narrow and he was not particularly disturbed even though a broader panorama of information might have enhanced his financial judgments.

My banker friend may not be typical but there are too many like him in other callings. It's a pity that the New Yorker Magazine's gifted writer, A. J. Liebling, never had time before he died to apply his trenchant talent to an article on the Wayward Reader, to match his incisive criticism of American newspapers which the New Yorker published over the years under the heading "The Wayward Press."

THE READER in some cases is a helpless victim. Too many American newspapers, I submit, are dull stereotypes of each other. Like radio and TV stations they have become preoccupied with merchandising goods. They are inclined to capsulize the news, hang an eye-catching headline on it, neglect the meaning, discourage the stimulating exercise of honest, responsible dissent—in contradistinction to dissension which narrow editorial views often encourage—throw in some features, comics and items from the "women's world" and call it a newspaper.

There are some excellent newspapers in the country but there aren't enough of them. I don't mean, either, to idolize the New York Times as the paragon of the press but the reputation it has earned for dimensional, though sometimes overbulky reporting and, of late, dispassionate but biting editorials, creates a sharp impact in Washington and foreign capitals.

By no means all of that experiment was a loss. Several western newspapers, notably the Los Angeles Times, visibly improved and enlarged their news content in anticipation of and during the publication of the western edition and one is tempted to conclude that they didn't do it just because times were improving or the population growing but because they realized their quality was being challenged.

May they continue that approach on their own and may publishers elsewhere be encouraged to join them.

Washington Reports:

New Accelerated Public Works Urged for 'Desperate' Jobless

CONGRESS SHOULD authorize funds to re- the accelerated public works program without further delay, Sen. John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.) and Sen. Ernest Gruening (D-Alaska) declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 stations.

"Any unemployment is a disgrace to our wealthy nation, our so-called affluent society, and I consider that no issue, foreign or domestic, is more important than ending it," Gruening asserted. "I am an advocate of any and every measure that will put people back to work. That's one of the reasons I'm for the accelerated public works program."

Cooper said he agreed with Gruening "that we have to do everything possible to find employment for our fellow citizens."

"The more-than-5-percent jobless rate for six years, said Gruening, is not just a statistic."

"These are men and women, fathers and mothers of children who are leading desperate and forlorn lives because they want work but can't find it," he said.

Gruening recalled that a year ago he introduced a bill to authorize and appropriate the same sum for accelerated public works as for foreign aid.

"THREE BILLION, maybe a little more," said the Alaska senator. "I didn't name the amount. I put it that way to emphasize that we have a prior, or at least an equal duty, to take care of our own."

Cooper said he agreed that public works built under the accelerated program are not a cost but an investment.

"I think it is important to realize," he asserted, "that the community itself must pay at least 35 to 50 percent of the cost in matching funds. . . ."

Cooper said he would like to see this program continued "until we catch up with the backlog of these essential improvements."

Funds have been exhausted for the previous program, "which was a huge success," said Gruening, although millions in projects are "approved and ready to go."

The AFL-CIO has urged Pres. Johnson to back a renewal of the program now expiring.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE TREMENDOUS BIPARTISAN VOTE for the House civil rights bill underscores the fact that despite the appearance of partisan bickering, Congress usually gives, we make progress the other way—by the reaching of understandings that cross party lines.

John C. Calhoun of South Carolina, who was a statesman in his earlier career and became a fierce sectionalist only later, once formulated this principle in what he called the Doctrine of Concurrent Majority. It means, simply, that no really controversial bill plowing new ground can be passed without substantial agreement between the leadership of major parties and interests—and it remains true today.

The fact that bipartisan majorities are required to give a controversial bill a genuine chance of passage does not mean it makes no difference which party is in power. There is the simple matter of presidential initiative, for example.

Pres. Eisenhower never felt moved to propose broad civil rights legislation; the late Pres. Kennedy did, and Pres. Johnson kept putting the full prestige of his office toward early action on the rights bill.

The urgency for action became more clear after Mr. Kennedy entered the White House, but it was by no means a secret during the Eisenhower years. The general simply did not feel the urgency; he refused to lend his moral support to the school desegregation decision of 1954 until two years after he had left office.

The scheduling of bills rests with the party in control of Congress; in this sense, as well, the party in power makes a difference. But the significance of a heavy bipartisan vote for actual passage of a bill is reflected in a simple question: How can Republican senators finally refuse to support a bill approved by House Republicans by a 138-34 margin?

One other footnote to the House rollcall: It revealed, once again, that southern Republicans in Congress vote segregationist just as much as Democrats. All 11 GOP members from states of the old Confederacy voted against the bill; counting the border states, the negative vote was higher. And all Democratic votes against it, except two, came from the Dixie and border states.

The only break from this pattern came in the case of seven Democrats from the former Confederate states, who cast their votes for passage on the rollcall.

THE SENATE MAJORITY LEADER, Sen. Mansfield, shows no inclination to schedule early continuous sessions to break the inevitable southern filibuster, and there is no assurance that a cloture effort—to shut off debate by a two-thirds vote—will be attempted any time soon.

One reason is Senate tradition. Senators are extremely reluctant to use coercion against each other, to halt debate when opponents insist they have not yet had a chance to "educate the public" by making their case against a bill they dislike. Others never will vote for cloture; some Mountain States Democrats historically have maintained an alliance with the South by opposing cloture on civil rights bills.

On the issue of breaking a filibuster by constant sessions, 24 hours a day, day after day, on the theory that the Southerners will be "worn down," experience has proved it works the other way.

The Southerners are organized into teams of about four, each occupying the floor for six hours; the others get their meals at meal times, their normal rest. The teams can keep the remainder of the Senate in a constant uproar by demanding a quorum at any hour of the day or night. In the absence of a quorum they can force adjournment.

Still, no one should be discouraged about prospects in the Senate. The smashing House vote is a sign that a new atmosphere has been created. It must be assumed that the Senate will not be immune.

UNEMPLOYMENT is a national responsibility and as one means to reducing it, a renewal of the now-expanding accelerated public works program should be passed without delay, Sen. John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.), left, and Sen. Ernest Gruening (D-Alaska) declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

How to Buy:

Cost of School-Girl Complexion Keeps Wall Street Fat, Happy

By Sidney Margolius

THE COSMETICS and toiletries industry has become the big boom business today, with stock-market speculators reaping a bonanza while women have been subjected to successive high-pressure promotions of expensive toiletries, especially those promising to smooth away wrinkles.

In recent years, cosmetics manufacturers have brought out alleged "wrinkle removing" creams incorporating vitamins, hormones, royal jelly, then antibiotics and, in some cases, "shot-gun" creams incorporating all of these ingredients. In earlier days, promoters even sold facial creams containing kerosene.

The latest promotion for a miracle wrinkle cream is Helene Curtis' "Magic Secret," which contains what a company publicity representative says is an "animal protein ingredient" and which outsiders say is oxblood. It carriers a fantastic price of $5 for one-fifth of an ounce. This comes to $25 an ounce or $400 a pound. (Or you can save money by buying the large size, which is $8.50 for two-fifths of an ounce, or $340 a pound.)

The vision of another killing like Revlon's highly-profitable success has made Wall Street speculators frantic to get in on the Helene Curtis ground floor. The scent of money, even if tainted with oxblood, skyrocketed the price of Helene Curtis stock from $18 a share to $42. Then rumors started to move around Wall Street, that the Food & Drug Administration was planning an investigation and we were planning an article deflating the new cream.

The speculators got even more frantic and the stock plummeted. We even got a series of calls from a leading brokerage house to find out if we were writing a story on the new skin cream and whether the brokerage house should advise its clients to sell their Helene Curtis stock.

The FDA is keeping an eye on the promotion of this latest "wrinkle" lotion to see if any claims are made that violate the law, advises Wallace Janssen, FDA director of information.

A Helene Curtis representative told us that "Magic Secret" is a clear liquid that "will smooth away wrinkles and lines about five or 10 minutes after application, and that the effect lasts for eight hours. After eight or 10 days, the company claims, the effect lasts longer.

However, any ordinary facial cream, even cold cream, has a temporary smoothing effect. A new booklet released by FDA, called "Your Money and Your Life," says: "There are no creams, lotions, masks or plasters that will prevent, correct or remove wrinkles." The booklet also warns: "Particularly beware of cosmetics promoted on the basis of some new special ingredient."

WRINKLE CREAMS are not the only bonanza of cosmetics manufacturers, but one of the most important. Lehn & Fink announced a new anti-wrinkle cream with a secret ingredient, but finally did not market it. The company that has managed to cash in most successfully on the modern toiletries craze is Revlon, with a host of high-priced products including anti-wrinkle Eterna 27. Revlon products, though costlier than many other brands, account for one-fourth of all sales of cosmetics by drug and department stores.

One of the most-persistent and continuing promotions is for creams and other products containing royal jelly. FDA Commissioner George P. Larrick called royal jelly "another example of exploitation of outlandish exotic substances as miracle ingredients."

It may do you no harm to smear oxblood or other animal protein on your face, except the loss of valuable dollars. But the use of hormones and antibiotics in face creams does worry the medical profession.

From Soup to Nonsense:

8-Year-Old Luncheon Guests Supreme Test for Any Hostess

By Jane Goodsell

I ONCE READ an article on the problems faced by Washington hostesses who entertain foreign dignitaries at dinner. No doubt it is difficult to plan a menu around the dietary taboos of King Ibn Saud of Arabia, and it must be a challenge to figure out what will tickle the palate of Pres. Youlou of the Republic of the Congo.

Still, when it comes to finicky eaters, there's nobody in the same league with an eight-year-old child. Personally, I'd rather compose a three-course dinner menu for 12 adults (including two Moslems, one Israeli, three allergics, two diabetics and four people on reducing diets) than fix a sandwich for one third-grade guest.

When Molly (my own eight-year-old) pleads, "Can Mary stay for lunch?" my heart sinks. Mary's the one who likes tuna fish sandwiches made without mayonnaise or butter on bread sliced paper-thin and cut into triangles. I once made the mistake of cutting her sandwich into four squares, and this bizarre deviation so upset her that she announced she didn't feel well and went home.

She also like pickles with her sandwich, but I can't figure out what kind. I've tried her on dills, sweet pickles, bread and butter pickles, little gherkins and watermelon rind, but none of these is the kind Mary likes. When I urge her to tell me what kind she does like, she says, "The good kind."

Dori likes liverwurst sandwiches with catsup on rye bread with the crusts cut off. I don't mean that's her favorite sandwich. It's the only kind of sandwich she'll eat. She doesn't want it cut in two halves, either. She says it tastes funny that way. And she wants square-cut rye bread, not the oval kind. That tastes funny, too.

Claudia is a different problem altogether. When I ask her what kind of sandwich she'd like, she says, "I don't care."

So I fix her a jelly sandwich, and she pulls it apart and peers inside. She sighs deeply and pushes it away.

"Why don't you like your sandwish, Claudia?" I ask, and she answers, "I don't know."

NANCY, WHO ONCE suffered a traumatic experience at our house (I put lettuce in her peanut butter sandwich), has no faith in me whatsoever, and usually declines lunch invitations. But once in a while Molly persuades her to give me another chance. On these occasions she reduces the risk by having a Nothing Sandwich (two pieces of bread with absolutely nothing, not even butter, between them).

I probably shouldn't complain about other people's children in view of my own eight-year-old's food fixations. She likes peanut butter and jelly on white bread. The peanut butter must be the chunky style. The jelly must be blackberry. The bread must be the kind that doesn't have holes, and must not be buttered.

She has exactly the same sandwich, made exactly the same way, every single day. And she never fails to inspect it minutely on all sides. She smells it. She pulls it apart and peers into it. Surely Col. Nasser couldn't be any more distrustful of a birthday cake sent to him by the Israeli government!

She must be quite a trial as a luncheon guest at other people's houses.

An Editor Comments:

Worker Education Produces Leaders

The following comment on labor education is excerpted from "The Editor's Notebook" of the Hartford (Conn.) Times. Written by Robert W. Lucas, it was entitled "Labor's Learners."

NINETY-TWO LOCAL labor union officials received certificates for having completed an eight-week course in the "Dynamics of Union Leadership" given by the Labor Education Center of the University of Connecticut. I was the "commencement" speaker. And I was impressed by what I saw and heard others say.

Contrary to the impression some may have that this was a refresher course in hell raising, the school was to stimulate and elevate the citizenship of its "students." Courses in labor law, consumer problems and sources of political power were among the offerings. The men and women who attended were trying to understand better the forces and counter-forces at work in society. They pursued their studies for a two-month period, giving up their rest and relaxation after work on stated nights, and applying themselves to serious thought. Their sacrifice of leisure was not inconsiderable.

Here is one of the reasons labor unions frequently produce effective advocates—whether as legislators or lobbyists. By continuing their education beyond the high school diploma, they equip themselves educationally beyond the achievement of others. And having a natural or cultivated taste for causes that involve people, and being very much of the common people themselves, they toil with enthusiasm and tenacity.

Major league union spokesmen are listened to with respect on national problems—from foreign affairs to inflation. Too often, the public is aware of labor's activity only when unions are involved in violence or a capital controversy such as the rail unions' work rules. The fact is that labor's representatives are quietly and intelligently promoting progressive causes.

There is among labor union officials an acute awareness of the unresolved human problems around us. This was driven home to me again when I was introduced by Donald Beecher, the education director for the Greater Hartford Labor Council.

On his own and unexpectedly, Mr. Beecher praised this newspaper's publication Nov. 26 of the special 60,000-word documentary on "The Negro in Hartford." He said, in effect, that union labor should "commend" the Times for that contribution. This was a plug for our paper, to be sure, but one throwing as much light on the humanity of the labor movement as on the purpose and content of the special study.

It occurred to me, then, how many times over the years I have seen labor unions act on great issues of public moment while others ignored those issues or simply talked about them. Names of congressmen are needed on the House discharge petition on civil rights? So Ruth Greenberg, the state council's director of education, urges the labor officials to write their congressmen to sign! Just like that!

WOULD THIS KIND of quick and earnest involvement at crisis points in our national life be forthcoming from non-union groups? Usually not. Is it because other people simply do not care as deeply? Not necessarily. Union people are accustomed to acting collectively rather than individually, and that may explain their greater political consciousness. But I really believe labor unions are often in the vanguard of liberal movements because, to them, people take precedence over property.

It is heartening to me that the people who are the elected leaders of labor are drawn to the search for new and broader knowledge. Many of them did not have access to higher education. But paradoxically, had they gone on to college, they might never have had either the inspiration or the opportunity to serve people in the ranks as a product of the ranks. And it has been from this echelon of our social structure that some of our most admirable national figures have risen.

As I said, it was a deep pleasure to be in the presence of the center's "graduates." They earned no formal academic credit to apply toward a degree. But they are a credit to unionism just the same, and to a degree for which the general public can be thankful.

Corporations 'Loaded with Cash':

Record Profits Give Wages Priority in 1964 Bargaining

Wages increases have a "high priority" in contract negotiations this year with corporations at record profit levels and "loaded with cash," an AFL-CIO analysis says.

"Substantial wage increases are essential" to carry forward the "rise in sales, production and employment" conducive to a healthy economy, the federation's Dept. of Research reports.

Money is available in "record corporation profits, soaring productivity and a steady climb in cash flow to corporations," the analysis says in the February issue of the American Federationist, official monthly magazine, as a collective bargaining report feature.

The report concludes that wages should rise enough to offset living cost increases and also to provide improvements in buying power.

The study cites a recent Labor Dept. report that 119 major collective bargaining agreements covering almost 2 million workers are due to expire this year—a third of all workers in bargaining units of more than 5,000 each—besides many contracts covering workers in smaller units.

The study gave this view of the bargaining outlook for 1964:

At the bargaining table there are important issues besides wages—shorter hours in particular but also health and welfare plans, vacations and overtime.

Profits Outstrip Pay Hikes

In many industries, productivity has risen at a faster rate than wage increases in recent years. This has resulted in reduced unit labor costs and increasing profit margins, the analysis showed.

The continuing rapid increase of profits and productivity makes substantial wage gains possible without upward pressure on the general price level.

The study noted that corporate profits after taxes rose 13 percent in 1962 and about 10 percent in 1963, and are expected to increase by 11 percent or more in 1964 if the administration's tax cut program now at the point of final passage is adopted.

With profits increasing, dividend payments have been "steadily and sharply rising" for the past five years, even in recession-hit 1961. During the past three years, according to the analysis, the retained corporation cash flow, after payment of taxes and dividends, has been "greater than corporate investment in new plant and equipment." The result: "corporations are loaded with cash."

Output Zooming

With the spread of automation, output per manhour is rising rapidly. The average annual increase in private businesses was above 3.5 percent in 1961-1963, and is likely to continue at that pace in 1964.

In some industries, the rate of productivity advance has been about 5 or 6 percent or more a year. In most cases, "the fruits of these large increases in productivity have not been shared adequately with either workers or consumers."

Many union bargainers also will give attention to earlier retirement, increased vacations, shorter work time and limitations on overtime, the study noted, along with job security and health and welfare plans. It added:

"Higher premiums for overtime work are likely to spread. Seniority clauses will be reviewed. Relocation allowances are of growing interest. Severance pay plans may spread into new industries and older plans will be improved."

Labor Backs New Plan To Boost Textile Jobs

The "two-price cotton" system is helping to destroy American jobs, the AFL-CIO told the Senate Agriculture Committee.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged the committee in a statement to approve legislation which would enable U.S. manufacturers to buy American cotton at the same price at which it is sold to foreign manufacturers on the world market. Under present law, he pointed out, U.S. mills pay 8.5 cents more per pound—a price handicap which has contributed to the loss of jobs in the textile industry.

"The loss of market opportunities in the United States for domestically produced cotton textile products results in a loss of market opportunities for raw cotton produced in the United States," Biemiller said.

This results, he added, in "a vicious circle in which the cotton farmer suffers, the textile mill suffers, the textile worker suffers, and the nation's economy suffers."

The AFL-CIO, he told the committee, supports a bill cosponsored by Senators Herman E. Talmadge (D-Ga.) and Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) which would allow the domestic price of cotton to drop to the world price level and provide direct payments to cotton farmers to sustain farm income.

This, Biemiller said, would "help advance the welfare of growers, processors, distributors, workers and consumers."

Also before the committee is a House-passed bill which seeks to eliminate the price differential by providing a subsidy to manufacturers and lowering the price support on cotton.

Jobs, Profits Trend 'Dangerous,' Labor Says

An economic growth rate of 8 to 9 percent is essential to sustain and broaden national prosperity, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Labor's position was set forth in an analysis of the President's Economic Report, presented to the Congressional Joint Committee on the Economic Report by Walter P. Reuther, chairman of the AFL-CIO Economic Policy Committee.

The statement reviewed the "dangerous trend" of recent years toward higher productivity, mounting profits and growing unemployment. It took sharp issue with the President's Council of Economic Advisers on automation, charging the council with "failure to appreciate [the] revolutionary aspects of current technological change."

The basic need, the statement stressed, is a substantial and continuing increase in consumer income.

Business Care 'Loving'

"Business income has already been nurtured with loving care and has responded with a growth that has amazed observers," it went on. "In each of the last two years corporate profits after taxes have risen almost twice as fast as the gross national product and they are likely to continue to rise at almost the same rate this year.

"While corporate funds have been soaring, personal income, and particularly the income of those with a high propensity to spend, has moved up much more slowly. Corporate cash flow after dividends and taxes . . . rose 81.7 percent from 1953 to 1963. On the other hand, after-tax personal income rose only 59.4 percent.

"Moreover, within the personal-income category, dividends have far outstripped compensation to all employes (including wages, salaries and supplements.)"

The report showed that over the decade, dividends rose 93.5 percent, while employe compensation went up 63 percent. This lack of balance, it charged, is the reason for unemployment and idle plant capacity today. It continued:

"The labor movement will continue to insist that the government has a responsibility under such circumstances to use its fiscal and monetary powers to restore full employment. Through substantial tax cuts for lower income groups, through increased expenditures on public works, through special programs to help the poor break out of the vicious circle in which they have been trapped, and through many other kinds of action, the government could do much to eliminate the deficit in demand and provide the jobs which the economy needs for full employment."

The CEA report, Reuther said, demonstrated that since 1953, wages have lagged behind productivity, with the rate accelerating in the last few years. Unit wage costs in 1963, it showed, were only 93.4 percent of what they were a decade earlier. Even unit salary costs, after rising through most of the period, have dropped sharply since 1961.

The statement called for government action to "focus public attention" on the "misuse of corporate pricing power." It urged, in addition to measures mentioned earlier, a cut in the statutory workweek to 35 hours, with double time for overtime; government agencies to study automation and plan programs to adjust to it; an expansionary monetary policy, and a national planning agency to evaluate the nation's resources and needs and to devise ways to meet the needs.

Contract Schedule by Industry

Open for Bargaining

Agricultural Implements: Agreements in the major agricultural implements and construction machinery firms run until late 1964.

Airlines: Various major agreements, particularly for ground service personnel, are being renegotiated this year.

Automobiles: Agreements with the Big Three automakers expire in August. Cost-of-living reviews due in March and June.

Can: Agreements with the major can producers are scheduled to expire this September.

Communications: Most agreements in the telephone industry run until 1966, but are open for wage renegotiation in the latter half of 1964. Telegraphers' contracts expire this year.

Meatpacking: Agreements with major companies expire in August. Meanwhile, cost-of-living adjustments due in January and July.

Railroads: Agreements are being renegotiated.

Bargaining on Some Agreements

Apparel: The principal dress industry agreement and some other important ladies' and infants' clothing contracts are due for renegotiation this year. Major agreements in the men's clothing industry are due to continue without renegotiation.

Construction: Many agreements are on a long-term basis, running through the year with no renegotiation. But a large proportion of agreements in every trade and geographical area are subject to negotiation sometime during 1964, with a heavy concentration in the spring.

Maritime: Longshore contracts for the East and Gulf Coasts expire in September. Some sea contracts expire this year; others continue to 1969.

Aluminum: Contracts extended to 1965, with sabbatical vacations plus other improvements becoming effective this year.

Electrical Manufacturing: Major agreements with General Electric and Westinghouse are not open for renegotiation until 1966.

Rubber: Agreements with the Big Four rubber companies are scheduled to continue without renegotiations until 1965. During 1964, they provide for wage increases of 7 cents at tire plants, 6½ cents at other rubber product plants.

Steel: Agreements with the major basic steel companies continue to 1965. Sabbatical vacations and other benefits take effect this year.

COMMUNITY SERVICES AWARD program of the Greater Louisville (Ky.) AFL-CIO was initiated with presentation of the first plaque to Norman L. Anderson (right), executive director of the Louisville-Jefferson County Health & Welfare Council, by Charles T. Clark (left), co-chairman of the central body's Community Services Committee. In center is Assistant National Dir. Robert Rosekrans of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, the principal speaker. Anderson called the award the "greatest honor" to befall him in 31 years of social work.

Unit on Aged Asks Ban On Job Discrimination

Austin, Tex.—Pres. Johnson's Council on the Aging has urged special federal and state efforts to prohibit employers from discriminating against elderly persons in their hiring practices.

The Cabinet-level council recommended that Johnson issue an executive order barring government contractors and subcontractors from refusing to hire workers between 45 and 65 because of their age.

The report also noted that only 17 states now outlaw such age discrimination and called for enactment of similar legislation in the remaining states.

In receiving the report, the President commented that "age alone is a too-frequent excuse to remove men and women needlessly and arbitrarily from active participation in life."

He took the occasion to stress the urgency of old-age hospital insurance under the social security system "to help older people meet the high costs of illness without jeopardizing their economic independence."

Johnson also took note of other measures he has already urged on Congress that will directly benefit the aged in such fields as housing, employment and health.

He commended the council for its report and directed it to move ahead immediately on proposals for which it already has the necessary authority and resources.

Chairman of the council is HEW Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze. Other members are Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, Sec. of Agriculture Orville L. Freeman, Sec. of Commerce Luther H. Hodges, Sec. of the Treasury Douglas Dillon, Administrator Robert C. Weaver of the Housing & Home Finance Agency, Veterans Administrator J. S. Gleason, Jr., and Chairman John W. Macy, Jr., of the Civil Service Commission.

Among their other major recommendations were:

- Private programs to permit workers approaching retirement to "taper off" in their jobs through shorter work days or weeks, longer vacations, reduced responsibilities or other measures.
- An analysis of how low-income older people actually spend their money and what level of living a given income provides.
- Development of a program to enable homeowners to convert real estate equities into income which they could use during their lives while still living in their homes.

Pamphlet on Civil Rights Cites AFL-CIO Support

"The AFL-CIO is for civil rights—without reservation and without delay."

These are the opening words in a new AFL-CIO pamphlet on civil rights entitled "Equal Rights for All—The AFL-CIO Position."

Federation Pres. George Meany's introduction to the 22-page pamphlet flows from the sentence quoted above and continues:

"Mere acknowledgement, mere lip-service to equal rights is not enough. The labor movement is committed to a positive program for translating principle into reality on every front. This means on the job, in the schools, at the polls, in housing and in all places of public accommodation—restaurants, hotels, everywhere."

The pamphlet, AFL-CIO Publication No. 133, covers the federation's position in all these areas in short question and answer form, including the AFL-CIO's legislative program and its internal machinery for handling civil rights problems.

Copies of the pamphlet are available without cost in reasonable quantities from the Pamphlet Div., AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington 6, D. C.

History Repeats in Oregon:

Labor Using Ballot Initiative To Better Job Injury Benefits

Portland, Ore.—Fifty-two years ago Oregon unions successfully used the ballot initiative to obtain financial protection for injured workmen and for survivors of those killed on the job.

Now history is repeating itself as the Oregon AFL-CIO prepares again to use the initiative petition as a vehicle for obtaining a sorely-needed overhaul of the law. The basic act has been amended from time to time but there has been no increase in benefits for nine years.

"We got tired of having a man killed and then telling his widow that her husband was dead and that we'd take up a collection," recalls Bert W. Sleeman, an 83-year-old retired carpenter who is one of two surviving leaders of the initiative campaign of 1912.

That 1912 movement pushed through an employers' liability act. This in turn prodded the 1913 legislature into passing, "like a shot from a cannon" as one old-timer wrote, a workmen's compensation law.

Labor is now taking its case directly to the voters again because its efforts to increase benefits and obtain other improvements have been frustrated in the last three sessions of the legislature. Workmen's compensation generated more controversy than any other issue in those sessions, with the result that other facets of labor's legislative program also suffered. The industrial accident legislation each time became involved in a lobbying and vote-trading tug of war caused by the desire of private insurance companies to get a bigger slice of the $35 million a year premium pie.

Private Firms Resisted

Labor has resisted private insurance inroads, reasoning that profit from workmen's compensation underwriting can only come out of the pockets of the injured worker. Under Oregon's semi-exclusive state fund system, nearly 90 cents of each premium dollar goes for benefits, compared to 60 cents in some states where private insurance has taken over.

After an acrimonious 1961 session, Gov. Mark Hatfield (R.) formed a committee to work out a proposal acceptable to all elements. It called for a benefit increase of 18.5 percent, universal coverage and limited participation by private insurance.

The State AFL-CIO supported the plan, figuring half a loaf was better than none, but the measure ran aground in 1963 because of doubts by some labor elements and opposition from some attorneys specializing in injury cases.

In the wake of this legislative defeat, the state council officers—Executive Sec. James T. Marr, Pres. J. D. McDonald and George Brown, political and legislative director—with all unions participating, worked out a new proposal.

Tired of getting short shrift from the legislature and fearing possible action in the 1965 session, labor decided to emulate the 1912 action and go directly to the voters.

The initiative will ask for exclusive state insurance; universal coverage with a few exceptions; an 18.5 percent increase in benefits; an increase in retroactive relief funds; extension of time for filing aggravation claims; employer rights to administrative and judicial appeals, and group insurance rates for like businesses.

Can Be Sued by Worker

The present law, which requires only hazardous employment to be covered, provides protection only to about 60 percent of the state's 730,000 workers. Many of the others are covered by railroading, maritime and governmental plans, and many "non-hazardous" employers have elected to be covered.

Under Oregon law, a "hazardous" employer may either accept state coverage or reject it in favor of private insurance. He then comes under the Employers' Liability Act and can be sued by an injured worker.

Oregon's benefit schedule once ranked among the top six in the nation but in the past eight years it has skidded to about midway in the rankings of the 50 states. Also underlining the need for overhauling the law is the increasing number of employers who have rejected state coverage. At least 17,000 workers were stripped of that protection last year. Six years ago the state fund included about 90 percent of those employed in hazardous industries, but the figure has slipped to below 70 percent.

The State AFL-CIO estimates the cost of the initiative at $100,000 and has solicited affiliated unions for the money. Indications are that the amount raised will be close to $85,000.

The state attorney general's office is preparing a ballot title for the initiative. After legal preliminaries, labor will embark upon a two-phase campaign to register all union members as voters and get the 37,000 signatures necessary to put the measure on next November's ballot. This twin drive will be carried on in March and April.

'Salvage' Project Offers Help to Draft Rejectees

of whom view themselves as losers even before they have begun—a chance to become effective and constructive citizens. It is a human salvage program, responsive to Pres. Johnson's declaration of an all-out war on poverty."

The first phase of the program, to begin Feb. 17 and run through June, will provide assistance for about 35,000 youths, Wirtz estimated. He said 63,000 young men are expected to fail their draft examinations for educational reasons during the period. Those who are jobless will be referred to local offices of the public employment service for counseling and testing or for referral to available jobs, training programs, adult education or public assistance facilities. About half the educational rejectees are expected to respond to the program.

Early Tests Planned

Starting next July, the Selective Service System will give its preinduction examination to youths as soon as they register for the draft at age 18, rather than at age 22 to 24 as at present.

This, Wirtz said, will help identify youths with special training or educational problems early in their working careers "when they can benefit most from the employment and training and basic education services available under this new program."

The secretary called the program "a practical way of locating the individuals whose failure to qualify for military service shows they need help to qualify for civilian responsibility."

The President, in his budget message, made it clear that a major objective in his "war on poverty" would be to encourage young people to break out of "the vicious circle . . . in which one generation's poverty, ignorance and disease breed the same problem for the next."

The January unemployment figures showed that the jobless rate among teenagers was 14.9 percent, about three times as high as the rate for adult workers.

Special Services

Wirtz said that the new program would require special counseling, testing and referral services to supplement the 3,400 counselors now available in the 1,900 offices of the federal-state public employment service. An allocation of $1.2 million for this purpose is being sought for this fiscal year in supplemental appropriations for manpower development and training activities.

The task force report which kicked off the program was based on an extensive survey of 2,500 draft rejectees, about 28 percent of whom were found to be jobless and 5 percent neither working nor looking for jobs.

Most of the educational rejectees were eager to acquire more basic education and job training, the survey found.

Appeals Court Backs Informational Pickets

San Francisco—The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has upheld a 1962 ruling by the National Labor Relations Board that union publicity picketing is lawful when it is truthful and does not disrupt deliveries.

The ruling was made when the board, reconstituted after appointments by the late Pres. Kennedy, reversed an earlier finding concerning picketing of the Crown Cafeteria in Long Beach, Calif., by Hotel & Restaurant Employes Local 681.

When the cafeteria opened May 5, 1959, union pickets marched with "Do Not Patronize" signs saying "This Establishment Is Non-Union." From September 1959 the pickets appeared only at the public entrance and only at times of service to the eating public. Deliveries were not interrupted.

In 1961 the labor board, with Members Joseph A. Jenkins and John H. Fanning dissenting, ruled that the picketing was to win union recognition and thus was not protected by the "publicity" proviso of the Landrum-Griffin Act. The following year the board adopted the views previously urged by the minority and laid down the rule it has since applied in other cases.

The court here, upholding the NLRB order, said the effect of the L-G publicity proviso is to "allow recognitional or organizational picketing to continue if it meets the two important restrictions: (1) it must be addressed to the public and be truthful and (2) it must not induce other unions to stop deliveries or services. The picketing here met these criteria."

Wirtz Pushes Broader Pay Protection

Hotels, Restaurants, Laundries Top List

mum wage and extension of coverage "to all workers in industries engaged in or affected by interstate commerce," with first priority to workers in hotels, motels, restaurants, laundries, hospitals and small logging operations.

The draft bills do not include provisions for a minimum wage higher than the present $1.25 an hour or a standard workweek under 40 hours.

Coverage Proposed

Wirtz estimated that the President's proposals would give FLSA protection to 190,000 employes of large hotels, motels and chains; 180,000 restaurant workers; 74,000 in retail food service; 80,000 in laundries that do at least $1 million in annual business; 90,000 in agricultural processing; 34,000 in cotton ginning and 87,000 in small logging operations.

The bill proposes the same schedule followed in putting the 1961 FLSA amendments into effect. On the effective date the newly-covered workers would be guaranteed a minimum wage of $1 an hour but no overtime protection. In stages over a four-year period they would reach the $1.25 hourly wage floor and the 40-hour weekly work ceiling.

Wirtz said extended coverage would immediately require pay increases totalling $80 million a year for 147,000 workers now paid less than $1 an hour.

At Subminimum Level

"These workers are now living at a subminimum level," he declared. "Each dollar added to their low wages would be spent immediately for food, clothing and other essentials of living. This will benefit not only these low wage workers and their families, but also business in general. More money will probably be spent for more goods. More jobs will probably be created to supply the increased demand for goods and the economy of the country will be promoted.

"It takes nothing away from the purpose to help people as human beings if we recognize that by doing so we will strengthen the economy."

The secretary said the proposed extensions of coverage were "modest" and can be "readily absorbed by industry."

He noted, for example, that limiting the effectiveness of the amendments to laundries with $1 million of business annually will mean that only 80,000 of the industry's 513,000 workers will be affected. Of these, he said, nearly 12,000 now are paid less than $1 an hour, about 21,000 receive less than $1.15 an hour, and about 32,000 get less than $1.25 an hour.

Similarly, the million-dollar yearly business requirement for hotels, motels, restaurants and retail stores in food service will mean extension of coverage to about 444,000 of the more than 2 million workers in these industries, Wirtz reported. He noted that coverage would immediately affect 63,000 hotel and motel workers and 53,000 restaurant workers who now earn less than the $1 an hour first step.

Credit for Tips

Asked about the effect of tips in setting wage floors for these industries, he said it would be possible to work out a credit for tips if the employer requires an accounting and returns them to the workers. He noted that New York State, which itself has a $1.25 minimum wage for groups of workers not covered by the federal law, gives a credit of 35 cents an hour where tipping is the practice.

Wirtz rejected a suggestion that a higher minimum wage in the occupations under consideration would lead to more unemployment among unskilled workers because it would promote greater use of automation.

This question, he observed in his testimony, has been raised every time Congress has increased the wage floor or extended coverage, but in each case "the evidence has shown that the economy has made a smooth adjustment and in many cases there were increases in employment." The number of jobs rose in covered retail trade in the first year after the 1961 amendments brought wage and hour protection to retail workers, he said.

The proposed extension of overtime protection to a number of workers already covered by other provisions of the act would apply mostly to oil pipeline workers and non-operating personnel of air and motor carriers, many of whom already are covered by hours ceilings under union contracts.

However, Wirtz noted that the provisions also would substitute a single 14-weeks-a-year exemption in seasonal agricultural processing industries for the "hodge-podge" of exemptions now available that deprive many employes of overtime protection for as long as seven months out of the year. This, he said, would improve protection for about 584,000 workers.

Hours Growing Longer

About 86,000 gasoline station employes, first covered by the minimum wage in 1961, also would be given overtime protection under the proposals. Wirtz said these employes work longer hours than any other group of retail workers and their workweeks have been getting longer in recent years.

Because they are relatively unskilled, he said, "we can expect that the elimination of long workweeks among these employes will create jobs for a number of the unemployed."

Pay Lags In Gold Mines By 49 Cents

Timmins, Ont.—The gap between wages in gold mines and in other nonferrous metal mines widened from 13 to 49 cents an hour between 1951 and 1962, representatives of the Steelworkers told a conciliation board set up in a dispute with the wealthy McIntyre Porcupine Mines.

McIntyre's rates—49 cents below rates for other nonferrous metals mines—range now from $1.33 an hour for laborers to $1.72 for tradesmen, the union pointed out in support of its demands for a major across-the-board wage increase and a cut from 44 to 40 hours in the workweek. It also is seeking additional paid holidays, the checkoff and a pension plan. The checkoff has been granted by most other Timmins area employers and five Quebec gold mines in the last few months.

The union brief, which noted that McIntyre already has a pension plan for salaried employes, also recalled that the firm received more than $10 million in federal subsidies between 1948 and 1962.

In 1962, the brief said, a federal subsidy of $1,064,706 tripled the company's operating profits while its investments were piling up an additional $4.6 million in revenues.

IMMEDIATE PASSAGE of legislation pending in the New York State Legislature requiring bidders on public contracts to meet average statewide wages was urged by Union Label Dir. Sol Silverman (center) of the Furniture Workers on the Labor Press Conference program of Radio Station WNYC, New York City. He was questioned by Dick Pyatt (left), program moderator, and Ed Meskin, UFWA research and publicity director.

Hayes, Snyder See Need For Slash in Workweek

A shorter workweek would help provide jobs for workers displaced by automation, an industrialist and a union president agreed in a joint radio interview.

John I. Snyder, Jr., who has put part of the profits from his firm's sale of automation equipment into a foundation set up to seek a solution to the problems automation has created, took sharp issue with what he termed the "negative" attitude of most businessmen.

"I think the shorter workweek is a good idea," Snyder declared on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public service program carried by the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Machinists Pres. Albert J. Hayes, who serves with Snyder as co-chairman of the American Foundation on Automation & Employment, said a cut in working hours is the "one immediate solution" to unemployment, "and there can be no question about it."

He traced the steady reduction in hours as the nation's industrial system became more efficient and pointed out that "it is quite obvious that if our work force was working an average of 48 hours a week, instead of 40, our unemployment problem would be much more serious than it is at the present time."

It is "a matter of arithmetic," Hayes said, that a five-hour cut in the workweek would create approximately 2.5 million new job opportunities in manufacturing alone.

Snyder, who is president and board chairman of U.S. Industries, Inc., said automation "is throwing people out of work," that the problem "is growing," that "we have a hard core of unemployed now; it is not diminishing."

'What Do You Do About Them'

"How many more are going to be out of work because of automation and what do you do about them now?" he asked.

Hayes said that he and Snyder agree with Pres. Johnson's proposals to discourage overtime work but "we disagree with the President that a shorter workweek would be undesirable at this time."

"If a reduction of overtime will create job opportunities, certainly a reduction in overall hours will create more job opportunities," he said.

Questioned as to the attitude of other businessmen towards cooperation by labor, industry and the government in dealing with problems caused by automation, Snyder commented:

"I think the business community at large is a rather slow-moving segment of our society in such matters. . . . Anything that has the slightest appearance of adversely affecting the profit structure is a matter to be resisted in the first instance by most businessmen."

He added, however, that many businessmen are showing a more active concern with the problem.

"I wouldn't have said this a year ago, but now, yes," he said.

If the job problem can be solved, Snyder indicated, the effect of automation will be "to the good."

Edward F. Woods, Washington correspondent for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and Neil Gilbride, Associated Press reporter, questioned the two guests.

Bottle Union Wins After 14-Year Effort

Anderson, S. C.—An organizing campaign conducted by the Glass Bottle Blowers over a 14-year span has paid off in a successful election at the big Owens-Corning Fiberglas plant here.

Workers in the 1,000-member bargaining unit chose the GBBA, 492 to 375, with 83 ballots challenged, in the fourth of a series of National Labor Relations Board elections.

GBBA Pres. Lee W. Minton said his union's experience here demonstrates that labor "can succeed, even in the Deep South, through persistence and determination."

The first organizing attempt by the union was made in 1950, and for nine years organizers made periodic visits here, talking with workers, telling the union's story and checking worker sentiment.

In the first NLRB election in 1959, the union got 39 percent of the vote. A year later it got another election and 45 percent of the vote. Last year the GBBA lost again but the NLRB upset the results and ordered a new vote, with successful results.

The union has been certified and will seek a first contract for Fiberglas workers here.

Steelworkers Rout 'Independent' Union

Toronto, Ont.—The Steelworkers have driven the employer-oriented National Council of Canadian Labor from one of its Ontario strongholds and is taking aim on a second.

At Foster Wheeler, Ltd., St. Catharines, where the NCCL had held bargaining rights for 10 years through an affiliate, the USWA won a representation election by a 164-93 vote in a unit of 277 employes. At the Babcock-Wilcox Goldie McCullough machinery plant in Galt, the USWA has applied for certification on behalf of the 450 employes.

Red Cross Campaign Endorsed by Meany

Organized labor's annual endorsement of the Red Cross "is one of those occasions which gives us the greatest sense of satisfaction." AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wrote ARC National Chairman E. Roland Harriman in giving the trade union movement's backing to the yearly fund and membership drive.

"Not the least of our reasons for this," Meany continued, "is the clear evidence of the viability of organized labor's active partnership with the Red Cross in serving the total American community. In this we join with the broadest possible cross-section of our fellow citizens in a program of help to all."

The campaign for funds and members will be held Mar. 1-31.

Meany said that the centenary of the worldwide Red Cross, observed in the past year, provided a new opportunity to weigh the important role of the ARC.

"Your mercy actions around the world," he wrote, "have strengthened all of our hopes for a better future for all the world's peoples.

"So it is with knowledge born of personal association that we in the AFL-CIO add our endorsement to the many others you will receive. In 1964, as in the past, we state again—we in organized labor support with our whole hearts the aims and goals of the American Red Cross."

Among other union leaders who issued statements of support for the ARC were Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway Clerks, Pres. Charles Luna of the Railroad Trainmen, Executive Sec. Donald S. Beattie of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, Pres. R. E. Davidson of the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers, and Pres. W. A. Boyle of the unaffiliated Miners.

Midwest Editors Form Conference

Chicago—Editors of labor publications in a 12-state area of the Midwest have formally organized the Midwest Labor Press Conference as a regional affiliate of the Intl. Labor Press Association.

Marie L. Caylor, editor of the American Teacher Publications, was elected president. Other officers are Robert Kite of the Chicago Federation News, treasurer, and Nigel Hampton of the Chemical Worker, chairman of the editorial committee.

Dues were fixed at $5 a year to cover the cost of a newsletter and other office expenses.

The conference has scheduled a seminar for members Apr. 3-4 at the University of Chicago.

Conferees Agree:

Withholding Taxes Set at 14 Percent

House and Senate conferees voted to pump $800 million a month in buying power into the national economy as soon as the tax cut bill becomes law by agreeing to drop the basic withholding tax from 18 to 14 percent.

This will add $3 a week to the take-home pay of a $100-a-week worker with a dependent wife.

The Senate, which passed the tax bill Feb. 7 by a 77-21 vote, made few changes in the House-initiated bill. But four of these, the AFL-CIO said, are "especially equitable" and should be retained.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged the conferees to keep these Senate changes:

- A sick pay amendment, sponsored by Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.), which would allow a tax deduction for sick benefits amounting to less than 75 percent of a worker's normal wages. The House bill would eliminate all sick benefit deductions until after 30 days of illness.

This may be fair treatment for those who receive full wages while sick, Biemiller said, but it would be "grossly unfair . . . for the millions who receive only 50 or 60 percent of wages when sick."

- Retention of the present 25 percent maximum tax on capital gains profits on sale of stocks, bonds or property. The House bill would drop the rate to 21 percent which Biemiller said would "only open wider an already glaring loophole." The Senate voted 56-25 against the House provision.

- A cut in the present exemption from taxation of income earned outside the United States by American citizens. Present law exempts up to $20,000 a year income for the first three years of overseas employment, and up to $35,000 a year thereafter. The Senate cut these exemptions to $4,000 and $6,000, respectively.

"Present law," Biemiller wrote, "encourages the export of American jobs."

- An amendment allowing a deduction for transportation expenses for totally disabled workers. Biemiller said "this would encourage the disabled to seek employment, and would therefore enhance their self-esteem and lessen their dependence on others."

One Senate-passed amendment which the AFL-CIO urged the conferees to reject would allow a $50 maximum deduction for contributions to political candidates or parties. It would not, however, be of any help to most workers who do not file itemized tax returns.

Conferees were expected to resume meetings after a recess during the GOP's Lincoln Day programs and the chances appeared good that the tax cut would become law early in March.

The House and Senate bills provide identical cuts in individual income taxes—averaging 20 percent over a two-year period—and a two-step reduction of the maximum corporation profits tax from the present 52 percent to 48 percent.

Despite some close votes, the Administration won every major test when the bill was before the Senate and on final passage 21 Republicans joined the 56 Democrats in supporting the bill; 11 Democrats and 10 Republicans voted against it.

The McCarthy sick pay amendment, of special interest to labor, was accepted by the floor managers and approved by voice vote.

Pres. Johnson, who personally played a major role in lining up votes, said when the bill passed the Senate that it was "good news for the country."

The tax cut, he declared, "will give our free enterprise economy new life in the form of increased consumer buying, new investments and new jobs."

The final amount of the tax reduction is expected to be close to $12 billion.

NLRB Drops Bell Rule on Unit Makeup

The National Labor Relations Board in a 3-1 decision has excluded eight employes from a unit which since 1919 has been the bargaining agent for 97 office employes at the Cleveland, O., headquarters of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen.

The decision overturned the board's previous Bell Telephone Co. of Pennsylvania precedent "to the extent consistent herewith" by treating an election petition as a motion for clarification. In Bell, a few years ago, the board had held that in a contract unit where the union had never been certified and neither party wanted an election, the board would not decide the makeup of the bargaining unit.

The employer, in contract bargaining that began in 1961, asked for three exclusions, later raised the figure to 34. The union, known as the Grand Lodge Employes Association, objected.

The majority, noting that the employer continues to recognize the union on an interim basis, said that if the employer still wants an election, it may make an "appropriate motion" to the NLRB.

Member John H. Fanning said in a dissent that the request for an election should have been granted, rather than treated as a request for clarification of the unit.

Hospital Care Plan Pressed by Johnson

way hinder the patient's freedom to choose his doctor, hospital or nurse," but would change only the manner in which he "financed" hospital costs in his later years.

He noted that the average worker would pay about $1 a month during his working life to protect himself in old age "in a dignified manner against the devastating costs of prolonged hospitalization."

Johnson also called for implementation of the Kerr-Mills program of medical assistance to the needy aged in the 18 states which so far have failed to do so, because "this assistance is needed now, and it will be needed later as a supplement to hospital insurance."

The President's message warned in addition that the Hill-Burton program of federal aid for hospital construction is due to expire June 30 and urged a five-year extension with amendments to provide grants for community planning of health facilities, modernization of existing facilities, stepped-up construction of nursing homes and chronic disease hospitals, and a system of mortgage insurance on loans of up to 40 years.

Group Practices Pushed

Johnson repeated the late Pres. Kennedy's call for encouragement of group medical and dental practice, especially plans sponsored by nonprofit or cooperative groups, through a program of federal loan insurance for construction and equipment.

Group practice, the President observed, "makes better use of scarce professional personnel" and provides better medical care at economies which can be passed on to the consumer.

In other major points, the President:

- Urged a program of federal grants for nursing school construction plus loans and scholarships to students to make sure that the nation will have the 680,000 professional nurses—up from the current total of 550,000—that the Public Health Service estimates will be needed by 1970.

- Called for expansion of public health traineeships.

- Pressed Congress for the $467 million he has urged to finance 1965 activities in the fields of mental health and mental retardation under legislation passed last year.

- Outlined an environmental health program with emphasis on the Clean Air Act of 1963, added research into the effects of pesticides and protection against their premature marketing, and further consumer safeguards under the food, drug and cosmetics laws.

- Announced he is setting up a Commission on Heart Disease, Cancer & Strokes to recommend steps to reduce the incidence of these diseases, which he said will take the lives of two-thirds of all Americans now living.

- Called for new legislation to finance the construction and staffing of vocational rehabilitation workshops and centers and to ease "the restoration of greater numbers of our mentally retarded and severely disabled to gainful employment."

TWU Wins 38 Cents from N. Y. Bus Lines

New York — The Transport Workers have negotiated a 38-cent wage and benefit package in a new two-year contract covering 1,000 employes of five privately-owned bus lines here.

TWU Pres. Michael J. Quill hailed the speedy conclusion of bargaining with the private companies following an earlier settlement covering 35,000 workers employed on the city's publicly-owned lines. The two contracts were similar but not identical.

Employes of the five private bus lines will receive a 15-cent hourly increase retroactive to Dec. 1. They will be given an additional 10 cents on Dec. 1, 1964, and 5 cents more on June 1, 1965.

Effective June 1, 1964, health insurance will be expanded to provide payments for doctors' visits and office calls—a 4.5 cents-an-hour item in the contract. An additional 3.5 cents will be used to provide other fringe benefits, including a guarantee of 35 hours pay during any week in which an extra man is called in to work.

Factory Hiring Off, Layoff Rate Static

The hiring rate of factory production workers declined from 29 workers per 1,000 in November to 24 in December, the U.S. Labor Dept. has reported.

At 21 per 1,000 workers, layoffs were unchanged, whereas a small rise usually is expected, according to the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics. The quit rate fell from 11 in November to 8 per 1,000 in December, the BLS added.

NASA Dispute Erupts Over Struck Rail Line

nautics & Space Agency (NASA), strongly recommended that the government not use the railroad for deliveries and not permit the railroad to use a spur being built by the Corps of Engineers to serve the space center.

Contract Signed

A NASA spokesman said the agency had signed a contract for use of the spur with the railroad before the strike began and feared a damage suit if it canceled the agreement.

The railroad's repeated defiance of government efforts to settle the dispute was blasted in a speech on the Senate floor by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.).

Morse cited these key episodes in tracing the background of the dispute:

- The Florida East Coast Railway was the only major carrier which refused to go along with a 10.3-cent hourly wage increase granted non-operating employes in 1962. This resulted in a strike by the unions in January 1963.

- An early effort at federal mediation was broken off when the chairman of the National Mediation Board discovered that his traditionally off-the-record mediation suggestions were being secretly tape recorded. He left when company officials refused to turn the recorder off.

- The Secretary of Labor last May asked both sides to agree to arbitration. The union accepted; management refused. A later arbitration proposal was met the same way.

- A Presidential Emergency Board was set up last November. The railroad first refused to reinstate its striking workers while the board was considering the issue. It then refused to accept the Emergency Board's recommendations for a non-retroactive increase and reinstatement of striking workers and members of operating unions which respected the picket lines.

Morse pointed out that the railroad is owned by "one of the larger bank holding companies" and has been granted "a special status of exemption from the Bank Holding Company Act permitting it to engage in banking and non-banking activities, including railroading, on a broad, intensive scale in the state of Florida."

Calling for a congressional investigation, Morse declared: "The management of labor relations on the Florida East Coast Railway is an example of the kind of abuse that we can expect from the enjoyment of this kind of special privilege."

ICFTU Asks Aid in Fight On Apartheid

Brussels—The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions has distributed to all affiliates an appeal by the Anti-Apartheid Movement for signatures to a petition being circulated by the AAM's World Campaign for the Release of South African Political Prisoners.

ICFTU Gen. Sec. Omer Becu advised free world trade union centers that "this is a bona fide campaign organized by responsible personalities" and approved its additional appeal for contributions to the Defense & Aid Fund, to which the ICFTU contributes regularly. The petition reads:

"We support the struggle against racial injustice and demand the abandonment of political trials and the immediate release of all political prisoners in South Africa."

The signatures will be sent to the secretary-general of the United Nations. Petitions may be obtained from the Anti-Apartheid Movement, 15 Endsleigh Street, London, W.C. 1, England. Mrs Barbara Castle, Labor Party member of Parliament, is president of the movement.

Council Shapes Programs For Drive Against Poverty

AFL-CIO EXECUTIVE COUNCIL is shown listening to a report at its midwinter meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., where it outlined programs for a massive attack on the roots of poverty and on other major national issues, giving top priority to the civil rights bill.

Gives High Priority To Civil Rights Bill

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Basic programs for an assault on poverty in America were being fashioned by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its mid-winter meeting here with civil rights, education, hospital care for the aged, unemployment compensation and a higher minimum wage and extension of coverage receiving top attention.

As the council continued its sessions, other weapons in the war on poverty were under consideration and federation leaders were giving close attention to the series of crises around the world and their effect on peace and freedom.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, commenting on the tax bill headed for final approval in Congress, termed it a "very good" measure, although it did not contain "everything we proposed." He said it will help the job situation by increased purchasing power, which will be sharply stimulated in a few weeks when withholding rates go into effect. (Story on tax bill Page 12.)

He noted that while the tax measure will aid the economy, it has no direct bearing on wage policies to be set by AFL-CIO affiliates. Pay increases are also needed, he said, to stimulate the nation's growth rate and, he added, there is "plenty of room" for wage hikes without touching off inflation.

In reply to a query on the level of wage increases over the past few years, he said that they have not been "too high." The prosperity of business and industry indicates that the pay increases are justified, he added.

Wage Ceilings Revised

Unions "will not be stymied" by Administration's economic guidelines, Meany said, in seeking justified boosts in wage levels.

The Administration's guidelines are keyed to maintaining wage increases in line with the general rise in productivity. However, the Council of Economic Advisers in its latest report on the economy indicated that in many industries the level of profits suggested that prices could be reduced, an indication that the rise in productivity was outstripping the rise in wage levels.

In the first four days of meetings the council:

- Gave an overriding priority to labor's drive to help secure Senate passage of the House-approved civil rights bill without compromise or crippling amendments as a key weapon to end discrimination at all levels—discrimination that is deeply involved in the incidence of poverty. (Story this page.)
- Called for special federal aid to education in low-income areas as a key weapon in breaking the cycle of poverty and unemployment, as well as a comprehensive program of aid to elementary and secondary education—including extended aid for students seeking a higher education. (Story Page 3.)
- Urged immediate congressional action to amend the wage-hour law by extending coverage and increasing the minimum to $2 an hour so as to improve the lot of the low-wage American worker as a "fundamental step toward wiping out poverty. (Story Page 3.)
- Declared that recently concluded hearings on health care for the elderly by the House Ways & Means Committee removed all doubt of the "urgent need" for legislation setting up a program operating under the social security system. (Story Page 4.)
- Charged that state legislatures under "heavy pressure from employers" are undermining the unemployment compensation system and that the need for modern federal standards is extremely pressing to protect millions of Americans from falling into poverty levels because of unemployment. (Story Page 2.)

'One Man, One Vote' Rule Ordered for House Districts

By John M. Barry

The Supreme Court's historic decision setting a "one man, one vote" rule for congressional districts will require wholesale revision of the districts in most states, but the total impact on the 1964 elections remained uncertain.

The high court, by a 6-to-3 vote, ruled that congressional districts within the states must be as nearly equal in population "as is practicable."

"We hold," said the majority opinion written by Justice Hugo L. Black, "that construed in its historical context, the command of Article I, Section 2 [of the Constitution] that representatives be chosen 'by the people of the several states' means that as nearly as practicable one man's vote in a congressional election is to be worth as much as another's."

The landmark decision came in a case brought by a group of Georgia voters challenging the disparity between their Atlanta district of 823,680 persons and the rural 9th District which has 272,154 persons.

A U.S. District Court panel of three judges voted 2 to 1 to dismiss the case, holding that the judiciary had no authority to decide "political" questions. The high court's reversal sends the case back for the framing of a decree stating how the proper district boundaries are to be drawn.

The Supreme Court gave no immediate guidelines as to how the congressional districts should be equalized and set no time limit on the process.

The Georgia case is expected to have an immediate effect on similar suits pending in Texas and Maryland. A panel of three federal judges already has ruled the Texas congressional districts to be unconstitutional, but stayed the ruling while the high court considered the Georgia appeal.

In the Maryland case, the federal court has held up its ruling to give the state's General Assembly a final chance to adopt corrective legislation. A May primary date is being rescheduled in June, and a special legislative session is expected in March.

Additional suits are expected in other states where there are wide differences in the number of persons represented in the congressional districts.

Where state legislatures fail to act on their own to end unequal representation, the federal courts may order election of all representatives on an at-large basis.

Postponement Sought

In an effort to avoid this prospect, Texas congressmen are drafting legislation aimed at holding up the effectiveness of the Supreme Court ruling until state legislatures have a chance to act in regular sessions. This would delay redistricting in most states until after the 1964 elections.

Some constitutional authorities, however, suggest that such legislation would pose more difficulties than the court ruling itself.

Reynolds Seeks to Bar FEC From Space Base

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Asst. Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds announced here that he had recommended to Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz that access to Cape Kennedy by the Florida East Coast Railway "be terminated" because there is no procedure to resolve the year-old strike acceptable to the railway's management.

Earlier in the week he had attempted to set up a session between the railway unions and FEC management. It failed because of the railway's insistence on having a court reporter present. Reynolds said that the railroad unions had accepted a procedure for final and binding arbitration of the dispute.

Meanwhile an agreement was reached for the dropping of a temporary restraining order secured by the National Labor Relations Board against picketing, with the understanding that the unions would give the NLRB 72 hours notice of any intention to resume picketing. As of Feb. 19 there were no pickets on the FEC spur running to Cape Kennedy and trains were free to move.

Reynolds told reporters here after his two-and-a-half-hour attempt in Daytona Beach to settle the dispute that the "petulant insistence" of FEC management on a philosophy that

Full Labor Aid Pledged In Senate Rights Battle

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO pledged its total legislative forces will help secure Senate passage of the House-approved civil rights bill, which the federation's Executive Council termed the strongest civil rights measure in the nation's history.

The council, in its winter meeting here, made civil rights legislation one of its first orders of business and adopted a statement calling on members of the Senate "to resist every crippling amendment; to shun compromise; to let nothing come before adoption of the Civil Rights Act of 1964."

The council expressed "great satisfaction" at House passage of the civil rights bill, terming it "one of the major signposts" on the road to full civil rights for all. The House-passed measure, said the council, includes "many of the objectives for which we have been fighting for years." But, it added:

"There's no room for complacency. The fight in the Senate of the United States must still be waged and won."

In Washington, as the civil rights bill crossed the Capitol to the Senate, Majority Leader Mike Mansfield reiterated his intention to bypass the hostile Judiciary Com-

Steel Tariff Hike Scored By Council

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Action of the European Common Market in imposing higher tariffs on imports of American steel is "totally unfair and completely protectionist," the Steelworkers have charged.

USWA Pres. David J. McDonald said the union is "deeply disturbed" by the action and is "seriously" considering "whether we should demand that the United States impose the same trade conditions upon the European Common Market until the member nations are willing to give us the same liberal and equitable treatment we have accorded them."

McDonald said the Common Market action was no surprise to the union and that in a Feb. 13 letter to Christian Herter, special U.S. representative for trade negotiations, it had expressed concern. In that letter, he said, the union made it clear it would oppose any concessions on steel products entering the U.S. if the Common Market "resorted to this most unfair maneuver."

The USWA is "particularly indignant," he said, because for many months "it has become increasingly evident that steel 'dumping' has been practiced upon the U.S. without corrective action under present trade laws."

McDonald added that the Common Market's explanation that the increase in tariffs against American steel was required to thwart underpriced competition, in part from Communist countries, "simply does not jibe with the facts."

West Virginia Redistricting Tops Gains

Charleston, W. Va.—The West Virginia legislature adjourned after a session highlighted by the first redistricting of the Senate and House since 1901.

The new districts, reflecting population shifts, were described by State AFL-CIO Pres. Miles C. Stanley as "more nearly equitable."

The legislature also adopted labor-supported bills which:

- Authorized prepaid group health plans.
- Raised salaries of all public employes, with the heaviest proportional raises going to low-paid workers.
- Established a Manpower Technology & Training Commission under the state's Bureau of Employment Security.
- Set up a State Commission on Aging.
- Provided additional funds for the Board of Public Works.
- Ordered all public buildings made fully accessible to handicapped persons.

Over labor's opposition, the legislature also extended—for the fourth straight year—the "temporary" 3 percent sales tax.

Full Support Pledged In Senate Rights Fight

mittee—for what he termed "well-known" reasons—and bring the bill in the near future before the full Senate.

Speaking pointedly of the threat of a southern filibuster, Mansfield warned the Senate that failure to act on the issue would be "inexcusable" and an abdication of constitutional responsibilities.

The time to act is "now," Mansfield declared. "At this moment in the nation's history, it is the Senate's time and turn."

The issue, he stressed, cannot be decided "on the basis of the Senate rules" but "only by facing the substance of the issue itself, by debating it and by voting on it."

Mansfield named a four-man Democratic steering committee, headed by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.), as floor managers of the bill during the Senate debate. The other members are Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (Wash.), who will handle the public accommodations section of the bill, Sen. Joseph S. Clark (Pa.), on the fair employment section, and Sen. Philip A. Hart (Mich.) on judicial issues.

Dirksen Asked to Help

Mansfield appealed to Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.), "whose patriotism has always taken precedence over his partisanship," to join in resolving "this grave national issue."

Mansfield also made a special appeal to his fellow westerners, many of whom have traditionally aligned themselves with the South in opposition to any move to cut off debate, to consider the issue "on behalf of the Senate itself and on behalf of the nation of which their states are an inseparable part."

He ended with a plea to the leader of the southern bloc, Sen. Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.), "to give us not only of his immense parliamentary capacity but even more of his legal wisdom and heart in order that this Senate will be remembered, not for what it did not do, but because of what it did for the nation."

Dirksen, the first to reply, promised Mansfield "to cooperate as best I can, within the limitations of the convictions that I hold."

Later he told newsmen that he still has reservations about the public accommodations section of the House bill, but found it "much more acceptable" than some earlier drafts.

Russell Signals Fight

Russell, after a southern strategy meeting, said he and his colleagues will "fight this bill with all the vigor at our command" and will begin by opposing consideration of the House measure without sending it first to the Judiciary Committee.

Noting that the Senate in the past has "too often been the graveyard of civil rights legislation," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared this cannot be tolerated again. It added:

"For our part, we intend that all of the legislative forces of the AFL-CIO be committed to this battle. We join with Pres. Johnson in insisting that this piece of legislation, so truly needed not only by minority groups but by this nation, be enacted into law as the most worthy monument to the man who fought so hard for its achievement—Pres. John F. Kennedy."

The council received a brief report on the legislative situation on Capitol Hill from Sen. Humphrey, who visited the council while on a trip to the Miami area. Federation Pres. George Meany told reporters later that Humphrey had made "a very excellent talk."

Minton to Head Rockefeller Unit

New York—Pres. Lee W. Minton of the Glass Bottle Blowers has been announced as chairman of a labor committee supporting the nomination of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller as the Republican candidate for President.

Minton, who described himself as a life-long Republican, said formation of the National Labor for Rockefeller Committee is in keeping with American labor's tradition of "bipartisanship, not non-partisanship."

He described the New York governor as "the only prospective Republican candidate on the horizon who can offer the nation progressive, liberal and imaginative leadership."

Other members of the Labor for Rockefeller Committee will be announced shortly, Minton said.

Meany Hits Scranton:

New Battle Pledged For Jobless Benefits

Bal Harbour, Fla.—State legislatures under "heavy pressure from employers" are undermining unemployment compensation benefits, the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged, warning that if the system is to survive and help in the battle against poverty, modernized federal standards must be enacted.

The council noted an attack on jobless pay in Pennsylvania in proposals advanced by Gov. William W. Scranton (R), charging that under the guise of an attack on unemployment, benefits will be discontinued for over 90,000 unemployed persons.

Pres. George Meany told newsmen that the AFL-CIO will "do everything possible" to help the Pennsylvania labor movement fight Scranton's attempt to weaken the unemployment compensation program.

He termed the Pennsylvania governor's approach a "strange one" and said that to the best of his knowledge Scranton's proposal marked the first time the governor of an important industrial state had proposed to help the unemployed by cutting out their benefits.

The council noted that the Scranton proposal "singles out and penalizes" workers in seasonal and low-paid industries, and added:

"It is exactly this interstate competition for industrial development through sabotage of social welfare standards that has led the AFL-CIO to urge federal minimum standards

'Arsenal Against Poverty'

"Unemployment insurance should be an important part of our national arsenal against poverty. Enforcement of federal minimum benefit standards, as proposed by the Administration, would do a great deal to prevent poverty from spreading further, and this can be done without cost to the federal government."

The council expressed "alarm" at the continuing attack on the present unemployment insurance system, noting that the weakness of the program is that "it does far too little for far too few."

It warned Congress to "heed the storm warnings of the last two years" and enact the Administration's proposals for a modern jobless pay system.

In addition to hitting Scranton's Pennsylvania proposals, the council cited the recent action of the South Dakota legislature in re-enacting an amendment that imposes a "needs test" on applicants—a test that had been declared "out of conformity" with federal law by the Secretary of Labor.

Only half of those now unemployed throughout the nation are entitled to jobless pay benefits under state systems, the council said, and between 30 and 40 percent of those who receive benefits are unable to find jobs before their benefits are exhausted.

Employers for many years have helped cut down funds for unemployment insurance and are now claiming insolvency in the system as justification for disqualifying claimants, the council asserted, adding:

"Lacking the underpinning of federal standards, this vicious cycle aggravated by interstate competition has prevented the system from fulfilling either its social objective of alleviating the distress of unemployment or its economic objective of maintaining purchasing power."

Council Asks South Africa Oil, Arms Ban

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council urged the U.S. government to take the lead in securing "the imposition of complete international to take the lead in securing "the imposition of a complete international embargo on oil and arms shipments to South Africa."

The council acted after hearing Nana Mahomo, a member of the National Executive Council of the Pan-Africanist Congress of South Africa, describe recent developments in his country.

The deteriorating situation in South Africa "threatens to erupt into an armed conflict" with the likelihood of spreading throughout the continent and "embittering racial strife the world over," the council said.

The South African government with its "inhuman racist policies and practices" can only be halted in its drive toward destruction by "concerted, effective action of the free world," the council said.

In addition to urging U.S. government action, the AFL-CIO statement called on all members of organized labor to assist the African resistance movement in its struggle "to overcome the forces of racial tyranny and to avoid being overwhelmed by totalitarian forces that threaten to wrest the initiative from those who are struggling for freedom in South Africa."

Negro Registration Film Available from AFL-CIO

A new documentary film on voter registration in the South has been added to the AFL-CIO Film Library.

Filmed in Mississippi, "We'll Never Turn Back" presents a series of interviews with Negroes who tell of violence, coercion and economic reprisals brought down upon them because of their attempts to register as voters.

Produced by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the film may be rented from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education for $3. Reservations should be made at least three weeks in advance with alternate dates listed.

The Dept. of Education recommends use of the film in programs dealing with the need for civil rights legislation and to encourage voter registration where lethargy is the only obstacle. Running time is 30 minutes.

Council Shapes Drive Against Poverty

Stresses Rights Bill, Special School Aid

In the international area the council adopted statements:

● Recommending that the United Nations Intl. Court of Justice determine the revision of the Cyprus constitution, the issue that has touched off the present crisis, and that meanwhile the Greek and Turkish governments augment their troops on the island to serve along with the British as interim peace keepers. (Story Page 4.)

● Urging the government to take the lead in securing the imposition of a complete international embargo on oil and arms shipments to South Africa and calling on American labor to provide material and financial assistance to the African resistance movement struggling for freedom in South Africa. (Story Page 2.)

In the trade union areas, the council:

● Called on all AFL-CIO affiliates "to extend their full cooperation and support" to Local 333, United Marine Div. of the National Maritime Union, in its strike against members of the New York Marine Towing & Transportation Employers Association. The strike has been in effect since Feb. 1.

● Heard a report from Dir. of Organization John W. Livingston which showed AFL-CIO unions for the 12-month period ending June 1963 winning 54 percent of National Labor Relations Board elections in which they were involved. The 2,565 victories brought in 172,500 new members to AFL-CIO unions. In the Los Angeles campaign, 30,000 new members were added to union rolls, 10,000 via victories in 143 elections, 6,000 through card checks or recognition and 14,000 in government unions.

● Pressed the register and get-out-the-vote drive in the 1964 elections with special emphasis on door-to-door registration campaigns and easing of registration provisions in the states and cities to enlarge the number of eligible voters.

Voluntary Assessment Recommended

● Recommended to the AFL-CIO General Board, scheduled to meet here Feb. 24, a 50-cent-per-member voluntary assessment over a 20-month period to discharge labor's obligation to the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation and to the John F. Kennedy Memorial Library.

● Heard a report on the legislative situation in Washington from Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), who visited the council while on a trip to the Miami area.

● The council also heard a brief address and witnessed the signing of a joint declaration by Andre Bergeron, general secretary of the French Confederation of Labor (Force Ouvriere) and Meany, stressing the need to maintain and strengthen the bonds uniting free world trade unions and urging support of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions. The AFL-CIO and the FO also expressed their faith "in improving the conditions of the people in the developing countries by strengthening the unity of the free world."

Wage Hour Extension, $2 Minimum, Backed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A fundamental step toward wiping out poverty is immediate amendment of the wage-hour law to improve the lot of low-wage American workers, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

These amendments must include extension of coverage to as many workers as possible who are still excluded from the law's protection and an increase in the minimum wage to $2 an hour, the council said.

'Top Priority' Urged

"If poverty is to be eliminated for those Americans who are already employed, an increase of the minimum wage must be given top priority," the council statement declared.

"Even a $2 hourly wage would provide a full time worker with a income that is only slightly above the poverty level. But an increase of the minimum wage to $2 an hour would represent a significant step forward in the war against poverty for millions of workers and their families."

The council specifically called for extension of coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act to include 2 to 3 million additional workers now exempt or excluded from the law's coverage. These workers are employed in restaurants, hotels, laundries, agriculture processing, cotton ginning, small logging operations, hospitals and other health services, theaters, nonprofit organizations and on farms.

The 1961 action of Congress in extending the wage-hour law to 3.5 million retail and other workers showed that extended coverage is "both feasible and beneficial," the council said.

In 1961, the statement added, Congress recognized that a gas station doing $250,000 worth of business is in interstate commerce. Congress should now recognize, said the council, that any retail establishment, restaurant, hotel or laundry doing $250,000 worth of business is also in interstate commerce.

The statement urged removal of specific exemptions now depriving of protection workers in certain small logging operations and others engaged in agriculture processing, including those in cotton ginning.

The statement also called for removal of overtime exemptions for workers now accorded minimum wage protection under the act but exempted from the overtime protection. These include workers in gas stations, and the transportation industries as well as those in agriculture processing already protected by the minimum wage provisions of the law.

Massive Federal Education Aid Urged to Break Poverty Cycle

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Massive federal aid for education programs aimed at both the causes and effects of poverty are essential if the nation is to break the cycle of poverty and unemployment, the AFL-CIO Executive Council asserted.

In a statement on education needs and programs, the council called specifically for special aid to education in low-income areas so that the problem of these areas will no longer be dealt with "halfheartedly and on a piecemeal basis."

This type of program can eliminate adult illiteracy and provide special assistance to overcome disadvantages to stem school dropouts and the resulting distress of young people who are out of school but unqualified to work.

The council called for a comprehensive program of federal assistance to elementary and secondary education, including aid for both classroom construction and for improving teachers' salaries. It noted that the problem of aid to non-public schools "continues to stalemate federal aid legislation," adding:

"We again urge . . . that we seek a solution to this problem through the expansion of National Defense Education Act assistance to non-public schools. Such an expanded program may well include more subjects than those presently covered and grants for classroom construction could be added to the equipping of teaching facilities presently covered by the act."

Great Need Seen

The council noted that there is still a great need for comprehensive student aid to assist low-income and moderate-income young people to obtain higher education. It called for supplementing NDEA student loans by federal insurance for private low-interest student loans, and by the establishment of large scale student work programs similar to the National Youth Administration of the 1930s.

The council said there is also special merit in the "Cold War GI Education bill" introduced by Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.), adding that the AFL-CIO has long supported such legislation, which would provide veterans of the Cold War educational opportunities similar to those given veterans of World War II and the Korean War.

The council reiterated its support of the principle of free public education through the junior college level, noting that the Higher Education Facilities Act of 1963 gives every state an opportunity to move in the direction of making free public education through the 14th year a reality.

'Economy of Opportunity' Urged in U. S.

Chicago—A total national effort to create "an economy of opportunity" for every American was urged by Jack T. Conway, executive director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., in a speech to the annual meeting of the National Council on the Aging.

"The objective of such an economy," Conway declared, "would be to provide the opportunity for all Americans—the young, the old, the members of minority groups, the impoverished, the unemployed, the underemployed, the people living in depressed areas—to contribute constructively to the progress of the nation and to share equitably in the abundance which their contributions can help to create in the age of automation."

Achievement of that goal, the IUD official observed, will require "programming" on a national level, enlisting the cooperation of all economic interest groups to establish priorities, evaluate our resources and apply them to our needs.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz reviewed the recent report of the President's Council on the Aging for the 350 delegates to the three-day meeting, citing particularly the report's recommendations on combating hiring discrimination against aging workers.

Jobs Held at Stake In Wheat Dispute

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The Longshoremen's boycott of wheat destined for the Soviet Union is not a question of foreign policy but a matter of protecting the rights of American seamen, Assistant Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds said.

Reynolds, who has been trying to negotiate an agreement in the dispute, said the ILA has been assured that in the future there will be no waivers of the policy that 50 percent of the shipments must go in American ships unless there are "most extraordinary circumstances."

He said that conferences in Washington were seeking to remedy problems of administering the wheat program to insure maintenance of the 50 percent policy. Of shipments to date, he said, only 38 percent had moved in U.S. vessels.

New Rooms Fail to Meet School Needs

School districts in the United States completed 65,300 new classrooms during the last academic year but a shortage of 124,300 public school classrooms still exists, the U.S. Office of Education has reported.

Almost 60,000 classrooms are scheduled for completion during the current school year but little headway is being made, the Office said after a survey, in reducing overcrowding and replacing old and unsatisfactory rooms.

Local Aid 'Inadequate'

Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze, asserting that a substantial classroom shortage for even one year "shortchanges" the education of millions of children, said it is clear that the states and school districts cannot provide the classrooms needed for an increasing school population.

"The richest nation on earth," he said, "can afford to build the classrooms it needs. It can ill-afford not to."

Of the 124,300 classrooms needed last fall, the states reported 59,400 were needed to relieve overcrowding and 64,900 were out of date. A year earlier, the room shortage was estimated at 121,200. In 1961 it was 127,300, in 1960, 142,500, and in 1959, 135,300, Celebrezze said.

Barry Goldwater of Arizona, photographed just after crossing union picket lines at the strikebreaker-produced Portland Oregonian & Journal. Driver of the car is State Rep. Sea, Dock Unions in Solid Front, Cite Grain Shipping Commitment

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Leaders of AFL-CIO sea and dockside unions joined in a "solid front" here in declaring that U.S. government agencies and commercial grain traders should live up to a presidential "commitment" that 50 percent of grain shipments sent to the Soviet Union would be transported in American-flag vessels.

Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers Intl. Union and Pres. Joseph Curran of the National Maritime Union—both AFL-CIO vice presidents—and Pres. Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen in a joint press conference defended the halting of ship-loading in various Gulf ports until the government "commitment" was honored.

The three maritime trade union officials made it clear that no challenge to U.S. foreign policy in regard to Soviet grain shipments was involved but only an effort to secure implementation of the agreement on the use of U.S. vessels in the trade.

A statement summarizing the maritime trade unions' position was handed by the three union officials to Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, who arrived in the Miami area the day of their press conference.

In an earlier press conference during the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting here, Federation Pres. George Meany said that the maritime unions were within their rights in protesting the government's failure to live up to its agreement and that he was in "complete accord" with these efforts.

He had "absolutely no objection" to selling wheat to the Soviet Union if the government felt this policy was to our national advantage, Meany said. The Soviet Union's purchase of the wheat points up its "economic failures," he continued, and he remarked that it is "a good thing for the world to know" that another widely-heralded five-year Soviet agricultural production plan is "down the drain."

He said that he personally was attempting to help work out an agreement in the grain shipping dispute in response to a request by the President.

Curran, Hall and Gleason in their press conference said there was substantial "dissatisfaction" among maritime trade workers over "failure of the appropriate federal agencies to adhere to the intent" of the 50 percent division between U.S. and foreign-flag vessels "assured by the President" last October.

The agencies, they said, had "ignored our national policy and negated the position taken" in these assurances.

In addition, they charged, there has been manipulation of "procedural rules" by the Continental Grain Co.—one of the trading firms—to avoid the use of U.S. vessels up to the 50 percent quota.

Hall, Curran and Gleason said that government agencies should require Continental to "recharter" U.S. vessels to reach adherence to the formula and that the Gargill Grain Co., another firm involved in the wheat sales, should be "instructed" to go to 50 percent use of American-flag ships.

The three maritime union leaders also made these recommendations:

- That government agencies adopt a policy of granting no "waivers" in regard to chartering of American-flag vessels that would violate the principles of the 50 percent agreement.
- That competent government machinery be set up to receive and handle complaints of violations.
- That the Departments of Commerce, Labor and Agriculture convene an industrywide conference for the adoption of "proper procedures" to implement the policy understanding.

Curran, Hall and Gleason told reporters that they had received complete assurance of "solid labor support" if the position of the maritime unions should be brought before the AFL-CIO Executive Council meetings now in progress.

The press conference and Meany's comments followed a meeting of the executive council of the Federation's Maritime Trades Dept. in which the council unanimously approved a resolution supporting the ILA in refusing "to load grain for shipment to the Soviet Union in violation of the clear-cut policy announced by the White House."

The resolution adopted by the MTD council was one of a number on wheat shipments and trading with Communist nations, one of which protested action by the Dept. of State in removing from a "blacklist" of foreign flag vessels 11 ships that had been engaged in trade with Cuba.

Kennedy Pledge Cited

The maritime trades council resolution on the 50 percent policy noted that the late Pres. Kennedy publicly stated that one of the conditions attached to the agreement to sell wheat to Russia was that the grain would be carried in available American ships. This stipulation, said the resolution, was officially interpreted to mean that "at least 50 percent of the cargoes would be transported in American flag ships."

The resolution challenged the contention of the Commerce Dept. that not enough U.S. flag tonnage is available. There are several ways to increase the amount of available U.S. shipping, it said, including the use of tankers and the release of Liberty and other ships now in "moth balls."

The resolution urged Pres. Johnson "to intervene personally" in this situation and to instruct all government agencies "to carry out in good faith the pledge given by the late Pres. Kennedy."

Gleason announced after adoption of the resolution by the Maritime Trades Dept. that he had telegraphed ILA leaders in Houston and New Orleans that insofar as the government had not followed through on the 50 percent policy, all loading of grain would be stopped "until an agreement is worked out with the proper government agencies."

Council Urges Steps to End Cyprus Strife

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Greece and Turkey should augment their troops on Cyprus and serve as "interim peacekeepers" while the United Nations Intl. Court of Justice determines the revision of the island's constitution—the question that has touched off the present crisis—the AFL-CIO urged.

Pending the court's verdict, all hostilities should cease, the federation's Executive Council said at its midwinter meeting here, and special efforts be made to speed the reconciliation of both ethnic groups.

The council urged also that Greek, Turkish and British forces, representing the three nations guaranteeing Cypriot independence, should be placed under a Venezuelan commander selected by Dr. Carlos Sosa Rodriguez of Venezuela, president of the 18th General Assembly of the UN.

The statement expressed the AFL-CIO's distress over the crisis and voiced its support of the appeal of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions for measures to "restore communal peace."

The UN can play a role in the Cyprus situation by helping achieve a fair and constructive solution of the constitutional question, the council said.

The people of Cyprus should realize, the statement said, that the Soviet Union's only interest in the island is to exploit the crisis to provoke an armed clash between Greece and Turkey "and thus disrupt NATO by prying loose its southern hinge."

The council warned of the Soviets' "sudden declaration of love for the UN," noting that throughout the years the Communists have not contributed "a single kopek towards defraying the cost entailed in maintaining UN peace-keeping forces anywhere."

Tied to Social Security:

Hospital Bill Action Called Urgent Need

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The recent hearings by the House Ways & Means committee on hospital insurance for the aged have removed all doubts that there is an "urgent need" to bolster our programs and the best way to meet the need is through the social security system, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The council called on the committee to move quickly to report out a bill to insure against the burden of health care for the elderly. The statement noted that the hearings were "thorough and fair" and commended the chairman, Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), and members of the committee "for the type of hearings that were conducted."

The statement cited Pres. Johnson's action in giving first priority on the agenda of the nation's unmet health needs to hospital insurance for the aged, adding that the AFL-CIO has long held this program to be "indispensable to a healthy nation."

Enactment of the Administration's proposal, which follows the line of the pending King-Anderson bill, is an essential step, the council said, "toward making needed care available to all."

The House hearings demonstrated that neither private insurance nor public relief alone can meet the need without the basic underwriting of a "broad government program built on the principle of social security," the council said.

It applauded and pledged support to the President's program to extend the Hill-Burton Hospital Act to "encourage more rational planning of health facilities, to authorize a new program of grants to assist in the renovation and replacement of obsolete facilities and to increase authorization for nursing homes and other long-term facilities."

It reiterated the AFL-CIO's policy of eliminating racial discrimination in the provision of health services, declaring that a concerted effort is needed "to reduce the shameful differences existing in health levels of Negroes and whites."

The statement praised also the President's full support of legislation providing mortgage guarantees and loans to encourage the further spread of group medical practice, "particularly in rural areas and when group practice is associated with prepayment programs."

Equal Population Rule Set for House Districts

from the majority opinion, Justice John M. Harlan argued that there is no requirement for "one man, one vote" set forth in the Constitution with respect to congressional elections. He said the decision cast "grave doubt on the constitutionality of the composition of the House of Representatives" now in existence.

Black Differs

Responding from the bench for the majority, Black said:

"We do not look on the future with such dark glasses. We cannot believe it will make the old ship of state slip one knot for this court to say that in choosing their representatives, the people should have one vote for one man as nearly as that is possible."

Black was joined by Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justices William J. Brennan, Jr., Byron R. White and Arthur J. Goldberg.

Justice Potter Stewart agreed with Harlan in most aspects of his dissent. Justice Tom C. Clark said he would have examined the Georgia districts against the requirements of the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment.

Black, in holding for the majority that the population equality in congressional districts is demanded by Art. I, Sec. 2, traced in detail the deliberations of the Constitutional Convention of 1787. He noted that convention had almost broken up in a dispute over whether Congress was to represent the states or the people. The "Great Compromise" which solved the issue gave representation to the states in the Senate and to the people in the House.

"It would defeat the principle embodied in the Great Compromise, equal representation in the House of equal numbers of people, for us to hold that within the states, legislatures may draw the lines of congressional districts in such a way as to give some voters a greater voice in choosing a congressman than others," Black wrote.

The ruling finally set to rest a 1946 decision in which the high court, by a 4 to 3 vote, refused to order redistricting in Illinois. A majority of the court actually agreed that it had jurisdiction, but Justice Wiley Rutledge cast the deciding vote the other way because of "the shortness of time" before the next election.

Six years later, the high court cited the majority's true position in the 1946 case as precedent for a finding that the courts could provide relief from "arbitrary or capricious" apportionment of state legislative districts. That case, which originated in Tennesee, was followed by suits challenging state legislative districts in 42 states.

Harlan's dissent suggested that the impact of the court's decision in the Georgia case would be felt just as widely.

He said a variation of 100,000 persons between the largest and smallest districts of a state probably would not be permitted. That would mean that 37 of the 42 states now having congressional districts would have to revise them. The remaining eight states, including five with one House seat each, elect their representatives at large.

NLRB to Set Up Two New Regions

New regional offices of the National Labor Relations Board will be established in Brooklyn, N. Y., and Milwaukee to relieve a constantly growing work load at the New York and Chicago offices, the board and Gen. Counsel Arnold Ordman announced.

Samuel M. Kaynard, regional attorney in the New York office, was named regional director for the Brooklyn office, to serve Queens, Kings, Suffolk, Nassau and Richmond Counties. George F. Squillacote, associate Chicago regional attorney, will head the new Milwaukee office serving southeastern and central Wisconsin and northern Michigan.

23,000 Workers in Unit:

CWA Routs Hoffa In New York Vote

New York—The Communications Workers beat back a statewide raid by the unaffiliated Teamsters to retain their bargaining rights for 23,000 plant department workers of the New York Telephone Co.

In one of the biggest National Labor Relations Board elections in recent years, 22,733 telephone plant workers voted as follows:

CWA 12,558, Teamsters 8,751, Brotherhood of Telephone Workers, unaffiliated, 574, neither 286, void ballots 333; challenged 231.

All but 564 of the eligible workers cast ballots in the election, marked by a vigorous Teamsters effort to defeat the CWA and a strong counter campaign by CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne and the leadership of 23 New York state locals. During the campaign, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany threw the full support of the federation to the CWA.

Beirne, in a statement issued at the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting, expressed pleasure at the outcome and said, "I am today sending a letter to the company notifying it of our desire to resume bargaining immediately." The union intends to achieve "very substantial improvements" in wages and working conditions, he declared.

Grievance Action Pressed

Noting that votes cast for other organizations indicate that the New York locals have "problems that need to be solved," Beirne added, "We are aware of these problems and during the campaign served notice on the management that the individual grievances caused by the company's mismanagement" must be corrected..

The CWA leader noted that the raid was the sixth such Teamster attempt on telephone workers' locals and said, "It should now be obvious, after six elections in which Communications Workers have overwhelmingly rejected the Teamsters Union as their representative, that telephone workers will have nothing to do with the Hoffa leadership of that organization."

With the latest raid defeated, Beirne concluded, "the CWA can get down to unhindered bargaining with the New York Telephone Co."

Support Pledged

Dir. Michael Mann of the AFL-CIO New York-New Jersey region said the CWA victory "reflects the good judgment and common sense" of telephone workers and pledged that the CWA will "continue to receive the full support of the labor movement" in New York state in "building a better and stronger union."

Mann's office cooperated with the CWA by assigning staff members to assist the union staff in winning the election.

Beirne is an AFL-CIO vice president. His union won bargaining rights in 1961 for New York plant workers, whose latest contract expired last summer. Attempts to bargain on a new contract were frustrated by the appearance of the Teamsters, who were expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957 on findings of domination by corrupt interests.

The defeat for the Teamsters was considered a major setback. In 1962 the CWA beat the Hoffa raiders by a 3-1 margin in an election among 17,000 equipment installers of the Western Electric Co., an affiliate of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., as is the New York Telephone Co.

Three officers of CWA Local 1101, promptly suspended, announced that members at a local meeting had voted to leave the CWA and that the local executive board then chose the Teamsters. The truckers' organization soon presented a charter to the former CWA officers and assigned 18 staff members to an organizing campaign, after which they petitioned for an NLRB election.

The CWA won a key vote of support Jan. 10 at an Albany meeting where heads of the 23 New York State locals condemned Hoffa and his associates for their interference and voted to back the CWA.

The CWA named an administrator and temporary assistants to run the affairs of Local 1101. It also denied the right of the local, under the CWA constitution, to disaffiliate.

Meany Hails CWA On Election Victory

Bal Harbour, Fla.—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany issued the following statement after New York State telephone plant workers voted in a National Labor Relations Board election against representation by the Teamsters and thus turned back a Teamsters' raid on Communication Workers locals:

"I congratulate the Communications Workers on their success in the campaign in New York in driving back the raiders from the Teamsters. The telephone unions in New York refused to listen to phony promises and cast their votes for clean, decent trade unions.

"That is typical of the attitude of AFL-CIO members throughout America. They reject corrupt leadership and insist that their unions be clean and democratic. And that is the way things are in the unions of the AFL-CIO."

Work Rule Wage Talks Deadlocked

Negotiations between rail operating unions and management remained deadlocked as a six-month work rules freeze set by Congress neared its Feb. 25 expiration date, but both sides indicated they would refrain from any action to upset the status quo.

The rail unions have asked for higher overtime pay, expense money during away-from-home layovers and paid holidays for workers not now receiving them.

Management has demanded a free hand to lengthen train runs without crew changes, abolish jurisdiction lines between road and yard work and make other changes which the unions say would force a strike.

Neither face-to-face meetings nor the efforts of federal mediators have significantly narrowed the differences. Nevertheless, neither side is presently planning to precipitate a new rail crisis and presumably bring Congress back into the picture.

Rail union spokesmen told the AFL-CIO News that if there is a national strike, it will be caused by any action by management to invoke unilateral changes in existing rules. They said they have assured Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz that the unions are willing to continue to negotiate their demands.

Management officials are reported to have decided against forcing a crisis at this time.

Rubber Workers Repel Teamster Raid, 2 to 1

Los Angeles—The Rubber Workers turned back an attempt by the ousted Teamsters Union to replace the URW as bargaining agent at Mattel Toy Co. by a margin of more than two to one.

Workers for the nation's largest toy manufacturer voted 1,074 to 457 to support the AFL-CIO affiliate which has been their bargaining agent for the past 10 years. Only nine voted for no union.

William Gilbert, director of the AFL-CIO Organizing Committee in Los Angeles and Orange Counties, said, "Naturally we are pleased with the results," and Floyd Gartrell, URW regional director, said, "The vote underscores the job our local union has done at Mattel."

Gilbert added, "It is a shame that we must fight off raids and engage in battles between unions rather than organizing the unorganized."

Nearly 200 representatives of AFL-CIO affiliated unions staged a mass demonstration at the Mattel plant, just before the National Labor Relations Board voting began, to show unity with the URW.

Brewery Workers Again Beat Raiders

Miami—The Brewery Workers defeated the Teamsters, 72-50, in an election at the plant of the National Brewing Co. here, turning back the second Teamster raid in two years.

Union Pres. Karl Feller said "the Teamsters were unable to fool the workers" and "they know the score about the leaders of the Teamsters Union and won't be fooled or bought."

Building Trades Plan Legislative Conference

Miami Beach—The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. will launch a program of vigorous legislative action at a three-day meeting in Washington Mar. 23-26 at which some 4,000 delegates are expected.

At its fall-winter meeting here, the department's executive council went over the list of pending legislation, some of it as part of general AFL-CIO legislative goals and the rest of particular interest to the building and construction industry.

High on the agenda for the March conference are hospital insurance for the aged, the civil rights bill, and federal aid for housing, education, mass transportation and urban redevelopment.

The council heard a report from Pres. C. J. Haggerty and Legislative Dir. Walter Mason on the recent adoption by the House of an amendment to the Davis-Bacon Act under which fringe benefits would be taken into consideration in the setting of prevailing wages in construction for the government.

Unionists Optimistic

A bipartisan group of 20 senators has sponsored the fringe benefit bill in the Senate and building tradesmen are optimistic about its prospects.

The department also received a report on its organization drive in Baltimore, which has resulted in transference to union conditions of more than $70 million of construction work.

The council also received an optimistic report from industry representatives, who said that surveys indicated there will be an "enormous" amount of constuction to be undertaken by the nation's corporations over the next 10 years.

Building Trades Wages Up 1.9c

Hourly wage scales of building trades workers increased a half of 1 percent, or 1.9 cents, in 1963's last quarter. The increase was slightly larger than that of the corresponding 1962 period, according to the Labor Dept.'s quarterly survey of seven major building trades in 100 U.S. cities.

The scale changes raised the estimated average union hourly wage rate to $4.13 as of Jan. 2, 1964. The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said scales were increased in 24 cities for electricians, 18 cities for bricklayers, 17 for carpenters, and in at least 12 for the other trades—painters, plasters, plumbers, and laborers.

The typical advance was 5 or 10 cents. Average scales ranged for the craft from $3.18 to $4.61.

Airline, Union Renew Talks, Strike Ends

Miami—The Air Line Employes Association returned to the bargaining table with National Airlines here after ending a 42-hour strike of 1,800 skilled clerical and station employes.

The strike started Feb. 15 after the union, in 10 months of bargaining, had exhausted "every reasonable effort to consummate an agreement," according to ALEA Pres. Victor J. Herbert. It was terminated when the union and management agreed to a proposal by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz for renewed negotiations.

Wirtz proposed that the strikers return, that National resume air service and that talks be resumed with the aid of the National Mediation Board on wages and day-night wage differentials. Any issue remaining after five days would be submitted to binding arbitration.

The union is an affiliate of the Air Line Pilots. It represents station agents, reservation personnel, crew schedulers, secretaries, accountants, office equipment workers and porters.

The airline serves 40 cities in 15 states and has 4,500 employes, 2,000 of them in Miami.

Court Rejects Bias Charge Against AFM

New York—The U.S. District Court for southern Ohio has dismissed a complaint by three former members of a Negro local in Columbus, O., that the Musicians sought to prevent a merger of the local with predominantly white Local 103 in that city.

AFM Pres. Herman Kenin, in announcing the decision by U.S. Judge Mel G. Underwood, said he had filed an affidavit with the court branding the accusation as "false and infamous" and said it is AFM's consistent policy to seek such mergers in every area.

During the litigation, Kenin said, Negro Local 589 was offered the option of merging with Local 103 or of encouraging individual members to join at a reduced fee. Officers of Local 589 refused, sold their clubhouse and divided their assets, he said.

Early in January the AFM revoked the local's charter, since it was no longer functioning as a separate local. Fifteen former members have joined Local 103 and others are expected to do so, according to the AFM.

Hospital Strikers Win First Pact

Trenton, Ont.—The Building Service Employes have won a first contract with the Trenton Memorial Hospital after a three-month strike that sparked an inquiry by the provincial government and won the union the strong support of the Canadian Labor Congress.

The hospital's board of trustees, which earlier had rejected a unanimous conciliation board report and tried to block efforts at negotiations by the union and the Ontario Labor Dept., capitulated in bargaining sessions conducted by a three-member provincial committee which has been studying the advisability of compulsory arbitration in hospital labor-management disputes.

The contract restores all 40 strikers to their jobs with wage increases ranging from $15 to $40 a month; time and a half after 80 hours in any bi-weekly period; two 10-minute rest periods daily; eight holidays with time and a half for work on those days; and vacation gains.

'One Man, One Vote'

THE HISTORIC U.S. Supreme Court decision declaring that the Constitution requires congressional districts to be substantially equal in population is a tremendous step toward the implementation of the concept of "one man, one vote."

The democratic process assumes that every citizen has an equal voice in the election of members of the House of Representatives. But the hard fact is that millions of Americans have been deprived of their voting parity through malapportionment of congressional districts as well as state legislative districts.

The first step in correcting this flaw in the democratic process came in 1962 when the Supreme Court held that federal courts could consider districting questions in state legislatures, reversing a 1946 decision that such questions must be settled at the political level.

An almost unprecedented number of court suits were filed, in state after state across the nation, protesting malapportionment of both congressional and state legislative seats. But until the Supreme Court acted this week, the principle on congressional districting had not been firmly fixed.

The court has now handed down the basic guide that, in the words of Justice Hugo L. Black for the majority, "as nearly as is practicable one man's vote in a congressional election is to be worth as much as another's."

The unequal representation of urban areas in Congress and state legislatures stems essentially from the control of state bodies by representatives from rural or underpopulated areas. These legislatures discriminate, by and large, against urban areas in the legislatures, and because these legislatures apportion congressional districts, they have denied representation in the U.S. House based on a true distribution of the population.

The AFL-CIO at its 1963 convention declared:

"As it is constituted today, the U.S. House of Representatives fails to be truly representative of the people, in violation of the clear intent of the constitution."

The Supreme Court has now opened the way to correction of this situation. While it did not spell out what it meant by "as nearly as practicable" in terms of drawing up districts keyed to the "one man, one vote" principle, application of modest standards of variance from district to district might necessitate the drawing of new boundaries for about 300 of the present House districts.

This reveals both the deep-seated discrimination in the present district lines and the staggering job ahead if these inequities are to be corrected.

The answer lies with Congress itself. For a number of years now, legislation requiring congressional districts of reasonably equal population and of compact boundaries has been introduced but has languished in committee. If Congress now were speedily to enact this bill setting out specific guidelines for districting equity, the tasks facing the legislatures—still in too many cases reluctant to move to correct an intolerable situation—would be eased.

As the AFL-CIO said clearly in its 1963 convention resolution:

"Only when the concept of one man, one vote is fully observed will democracy be fully achieved."

'. . . The Crossroads Is Here':

'Time Is Now,' Mansfield Warns As Senate Receives Rights Bill

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) appealed to his colleagues to face up to the imperative need for civil rights legislation. Following are excerpts from his speech:

LET ME SAY at the outset that I should have preferred it, had the civil rights issue been resolved before my time as a Senator or had it not come to the floor until afterward. The senator from Montana has no lust for conflict . . . yet this question is one which invites conflict, for it divides deeply. It is approached not only with reason, but also with passion, by members on both sides of the issue and on both sides of the aisle.

But great public issues are not subject to our personal timetables. . . . They emerge in their own way and in their own time. We do not compel them; they compel us.

We look in vain if we look backward to past achievements which might spare this Senate the necessity of reaching difficult decisions on the civil rights question. We hope in vain if we hope that this issue can be put over safely to another tomorrow, to be dealt with by another generation

The time is now. The crossroads is here in the Senate.

To be sure, the issue will not be fully resolved by what we do today. Its resolution depends also on what is done tomorrow and on many tomorrows. Nor will the issue be fully resolved by the Senate or the Congress. Indeed, it will involve all Americans and all the institutions—public and private—which hold us as a society of diversity in one nation and it will involve all for a long time to come. In truth, it is a universal issue which, for this nation, having begun with the Declaration of Independence and persisted through the decades, will hardly dissolve in the Senate of the 88th Congress.

Nevertheless, at this moment in the nation's history it is the Senate's time and turn.

It is bad enough to evade decision on any major proposal of any President. It is inexcusable in this issue which has drawn a curtain of uncertainty and insecurity over the entire Nation and over which blood has already run in the streets.

In these circumstances, I cannot believe that this Senate will abdicate its constitutional responsibilities. The Constitution . . . charges the Congress and the Senate as a part of it—no less than the President and the courts—with the achievement of its fundamental objectives. . . .

It is our duty no less than the duty of others to share in securing the equity of the rights and in advancing the welfare of all the people of the United States.

If the Senate were to choose . . . the course of evasion and denial—we would leave this body a less significant and less respected factor in the government of the United States than it was when we entered it. . . . When we have considered deeply, I do not believe that this Senate will choose the course of evasion and denial.

THE MAJORITY LEADER will do whatever he can to facilitate the process of decision in order that the Senate may reach a point of final judgment as promptly as possible. . . . The majority leader will propose in procedural matters but it will rest with the Senate to dispose.

If we are to reach a point of decision in this matter . . . it will be because the whole membership is prepared to look at the world and at the nation as it is, not the way we may wish for it to be. It will be because the members of this body are ready to face this decisive moment in the nation's history and the Senate's history. It will be because the members of this Senate, all the members, on both sides of the aisle, are prepared to assume full responsibility . . . for writing an honorable chapter in histories, irrespective of what their views may be on this particular issue.

We will not write that chapter, Mr. President, if we dawdle, if we evade. And we cannot write that chapter on the basis of the Senate rules. We can write it only by facing the substance of the issue itself, by debating it and voting on it.

Senators would be well advised to search, not in the Senate rules book, but in the Golden Rule for the semblance of an adequate answer to this issue.

Or let them search, if they will, in the long and tortuous history of human liberty. Let them search in the Constitution and in the documents of freedom which we have enshrined.

Let them search among the fears and the hopes of a whole people—all the American people. And let them search in the dark chasms of ignorance and arrogance which divide, and among the slender bridges of understanding and humility which unite.

An issue of this magnitude carries the accumulated action and neglect, the accumulated achievements and failures, the accumulated commissions and omissions of generations of Americans. And it will take, for many years, the combined contribution of all the sources of reason and unity within the nation to bring the issue to adequate resolution.

Morgan Says:

Hawaii, 'Paradise of the Pacific,' Being 'Uglified' at Boom Pace

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

LOS ANGELES—As I was saying before I so rudely interrupted myself about 10 days ago, we are uglifying America the Beautiful at a staggering pace. If any further proof of that indictment is needed I have the evidence at hand, gathered on a journey to our 50th state, Hawaii, sometimes known as "the Paradise of the Pacific."

Morgan

Vestiges of paradise do remain in the Hawaiian islands but they are being steadily gobbled up by resort hotel and subdivision syndicates and converted into a kind of Dante's Inferno of shopping centers, pizza palaces and parking lots on the beach. Paradise thus lost won't be easily regained.

Thirty years ago, as the country was struggling to rouse itself out of the Great Depression, I was fortunate enough to land a job as a reporter in Honolulu. In those days there was only one way to reach the lovely Polynesian archipelago—the same way Capt. Cook did—by ship. Landfall was an adventure, beginning at Koko Head and stretching along the island of Oahu's palm-fringed south coast to the pier at Aloha Tower with the high, verdant valleys of Honolulu climbing to the sudden, surprising heave of sharp mountains beyond. If you kept your eyes peeled at the rail you might spot a school of flying fish as the liner nosed gently into the channel toward the dock. Those brave, intrepid pioneers who blazed the trails of trans-Pacific commercial aviation in the years of the 30s—Amelia Earhart, Sir Charles Kingsford Smith, Charles Ulm, Pan American's Capt. Musick—they changed and quickened the modes of commerce and now most travelers reach Hawaii by jetliner, five hours or less from the California coast.

But what is your introduction to this mid-Pacific paradise today? On your ride into town from Honolulu's international airport near Pearl Harbor you are greeted not by rows of royal palms along Nimitz Boulevard but instead by an automobile junkyard, its old fenders festering with rust under the tropical sun, by the ugly backsides of harbor warehouses, a jungle growth of telephone poles and a garish litter of neon signs.

The skyline has been almost completely changed by that dubious status symbol of the mid-20th century metropolis, the American skyscraper. Now I love tall buildings and the glass, steel and granite canyons of Manhattan Island thrill me. But whereas grass shacks may have lost their practicability as abodes and places of business, I maintain that the highest thing on a tropical strand should not be a tower apartment but a palm tree.

I am, however, outnumbered. On the beach at Waikiki that unbeatable combination of free enterprisers, the real estate promoters and the politicians, is busy obscuring Honolulu's most majestic landmark, Diamond Head, with multi-storied buildings. Don't believe any more those classic picture postcard shots you see of Diamond Head. There is a hideous cluster of skyscrapers at the very foot of the old crater, ruining the rhythm of its line as it flows gently into the sea—but this eyesore has been carefully cropped off the photographs for export.

At one of the closing sessions of the Recreation Development Congress in Honolulu, sponsored by the National Association of Counties, I mentioned my shock and outrage at all this needless defacement of one of Hawaii's most precious resources, its natural beauty. Afterwards a man came up to me and introduced himself as a member of the Honolulu city council.

"I plead guilty to your charges," he said candidly, "but when Waikiki lots sell for $65 a square foot you are subjected to a lot of pressure."

AH, THERE'S THE RUB. An official elected presumably to help protect the public weal found himself helpless, he thought, before greedy forces determined to exploit it for quick profit.

This is the tawdry pattern almost everywhere. But all is not yet lost. A Honolulu businessman, William Blackfield, president of the National Association of Home Builders, told the congress the real estate and construction industries are taking a new look at the problem, realizing that better planning is needed to conserve the land and its beauty and still meet the undeniably urgent requirements of a bursting population.

The National Association of Counties itself is committed to a policy of coordinated growth and development in order to prevent chaos. Disturbingly enough, the Honolulu newspapers all but ignored the association's meeting.

Chaos, however, is bearing down upon us all like an avalanche and will engulf us unless we do some serious planning. At our present growth rate, 190 million Americans today will become more than 340 million in little more than 35 years. And, as Hugo Fisher, administrator of California's resources agency, told the county congress, 60 million cars on the roads will become 200 million by then. Sunday drive, anyone?

Washington Reports:

Passage of 'Truth' Bills Urged As Safeguards for Consumers

TRUTH-IN-LENDING and truth-in-packaging bills, now before Congress, should be passed in the interests of the consumer, but an also-pending quality stabilization bill should be defeated, according to Mrs. Esther Peterson, recently appointed special assistant to the President for consumer affairs.

In an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations, Mrs. Peterson said the truth-in-lending bill, sponsored by Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.), would enable consumers to know the annual interest charge on all purchases made "on time."

"Some of the letters I get are so tragic," Mrs. Peterson reported. "They come from people who have obligated themselves beyond their means. Some letters even tell of broken marriages because people have not known what financial troubles they were getting into."

The truth-in-packaging bill, sponsored by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), would require that packages state the contents clearly and accurately, including weight and quantity, Mrs. Peterson explained.

On the other hand, she said, if the so-called quality stabilization legislation were approved, "prices would be set at the same level for the same item (so that) discount houses would be out and there would be no use shopping around for a bargain."

UP TO NOW, said Mrs. Peterson, the consumer has not been represented in Washington "as such." The Consumers League, many women's organizations, trade unions and others have represented the consumer on Capitol Hill, she observed. Members of Congress are representatives of consumers, but also of business, industry, farmers and other groups in their constituency.

Still, Mrs. Peterson said, more than 20,000 persons in the federal government are working directly on consumer affairs. Each of 22 agencies in the federal government has a specialist on consumer matters. But up to now, she asserted, "we haven't had a focus, I would say."

Mrs. Peterson explained that she meets with an inter-agency Committee on Consumer Interests and a companion Consumers Advisory Council, composed of private citizens.

She explained that her job is not only in connection with legislation, and through informing the consumer, but also in coordinating the activities of the various agencies and determining other steps that should be taken in the interest of the consumer.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN said, in his dissent from the Supreme Court's decision outlawing grossly unequal congressional districts, that the majority had "manufactured out of whole cloth" a theory that the people have a basic constitutional right to protection against the shortsighted or politically motivated action of state legislatures in elevating the voting power of rural residents and debasing the voting power of urban and suburban residents. Oddly enough, the reaction in Congress to the court's decision does not indicate that members share any such feeling of discomfort as Justice Harlan felt.

There is a feeling, obviously, that the states may need time to adjust themselves to the imperatives of the decision. But a certain amount of time is exactly what they have in the nature of the case.

The high court did not say exactly how the lower courts should proceed in handling voter suits claiming inequality in congressional districts. It did not say that each state must do thus and so; in the Georgia case actually under consideration the Supreme Court merely laid down a broad principle that the lower court must receive the case and decide it—that it must devise and issue an order in line with the principle.

The state legislatures may develop a sudden urgency to revise their House of Representatives districts on a voluntary basis, as the State of Maryland seems ready to do; further court action then may prove unnecessary. The federal courts in other cases may direct the state legislatures to submit new districting plans or face election of all House members at large.

These redistricting plans and orders from the lower courts are themselves subject to challenge on appeal to the Supreme Court.

THE STATES, IN ANY CASE, cannot claim they were not given fair warning of the principle to which they are required to conform.

There has been loose usage of the phrase, "the courts must not enter this political thicket," but in fact the Supreme Court entered the "thicket" very specifically in 1962 in deciding a Tennessee case by a convincing majority, and the Tennessee case itself was decided on the basis of a 1946 case in which a majority of the court said, unmistakably, that the courts had the power to upset congressional districts that were grossly unequal in population.

This was exactly the point Justice Brennan made in Baker v. Carr, the Tennessee case decided two years ago—that the court in 1946 had upheld the authority of the federal judiciary to upset unequal Illinois congressional districts, but chose not to do so for various reasons, including the fact that the case was reached for decision only a short time before the November election.

The Supreme Court is not now in a profound act of reversing precedents; it reversed the reasoning of the precedents nearly 18 years ago, and has now moved to apply in specific cases the reasoning it adopted in 1946.

SOME OF THE STATES may find themselves electing all their House members at large, rather than by districts, this year. It will not prove fatal to their political viability, however uncomfortable to some of the candidates who have enjoyed the prerogative of sure-thing re-election in small districts.

Alabama had to elect all its House delegation at large two years ago because it lost one seat as a result of the census count of 1960 and nobody could decide how to adjust the district to take account of the loss. The result was unpleasant to a veteran congressman from the most sparsely-populated district, but he had enjoyed a great deal of seniority before time caught up with him.

The reasoning of Justice Black's majority opinion, in any case, is likely to be persuasive to most citizens. Obviously the state legislatures have no power to say that a city dweller's vote shall be counted for only one-third or one-fourth of a rural resident's vote in elections held at large within a state, yet that is exactly the effect when unequal districts for House seats are laid down by state legislatures.

The court has simply said they can't do this to heavily populated areas any more.

THE NEW VOICE of the consumer in Washington, Mrs. Esther Peterson (left), special assistant to the President for consumer affairs, says Congress should pass the pending Douglas truth-in-lending bill and the Hart truth-in-packaging bill. Mrs. Peterson was interviewed for Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program, by Harry W. Flannery.

BLS Budget for Retired Couple Up-Dated, Calls for $276 Month

By Sidney Margolius

First in a series of two articles on retirement costs today.

"WE ARE THINKING of retiring in 1964 but wonder if it is possible to live on $50 a week," Mr. and Mrs. C. E. P. write. "We live in the country and taxes are not high but it costs about $200 a year for heat."

The answer is it usually takes more than $50 today even for a very modest budget for a retired couple. We've brought up to date and adapted to current conditions the budget for a retired couple developed by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics. Here are the current monthly costs:

	Dollars	%
Food and beverage	$ 84	30.5
Housing, including utilities, furnishings	103	37.
Clothing and cleaning	19	7.
Medical care	26	9.5
Transportation	12	4.5
Recreation and reading	10	3.5
Personal care (barber, toiletries, etc.)	6	2.
Miscellaneous, including contributions	16	6.
	$276	100

In comparison, the $50 a week allotment this couple hopes to live on, provides only $217 a month, figuring four and one-third weeks.

The "modest but adequate" budget above shows there are two unusual expense problems in retirement: housing and medical care. These take larger percentages of retired people's budgets than among younger families.

It may be possible, through careful purchasing and preparation, to reduce the food and clothing costs. A smart shopper who has genuine knowledge of nutrition may be able to save as much as $20 a month on the $84 allotment for food for two. The clothing budget already is modest but may lend itself to additional small trimming, depending on the couple's needs.

But it would not pay to trifle with the already-precarious medical-care allotment. The only other possibility for reducing expenses is housing. If this about-to-retire couple already has paid up the mortgage, its monthly housing cost may be only $75. We calculate this on the basis of a $12,000 house in a semi-rural area, figuring taxes and insurance at 2 percent of the value in such an area, or $240 a year; maintenance at 1.5 percent or $180 a year; heat, $200; utilities, $180, and household furnishings and repairs at approximately $100. Thus it would be possible to pare the modest budget to $217 a month but it would be a tight squeeze.

RECENTLY WE HAD an opportunity to interview a large group of retirees at a class given by the Rutgers University Labor Education Center at the Plainfield, N. J., Senior Citizens Center. Here are the main problems of retirement as voiced by this group:

Drugs: The high cost of drugs was a widespread dilemma among the retirees, many of whom have chronic illnesses. They were noticeably bitter about this problem. One frequent question was how to get doctors to prescribe medicines under generic or scientific names at less cost than under brand names. Another problem cited was varying charges. One retired worker reported he paid one pharmacist $8 to fill a prescription, while his regular pharmacist charged him only $4.

Eyeglasses proved to be another major concern. Costs of $18 to $42 were cited. One danger revealed in these interviews is that older people sometimes try to save the cost of eye examinations.

Health insurance was another frequently-cited problem. Most of the older people interviewed were hoping that Congress would pass legislation providing hospital insurance as part of the Social Security system. Many asked which health insurance plans offered relatively good value. Several had continued their Blue Cross coverage in retirement. But a number of others were not even aware their state Blue Cross plan does open its rolls periodically so retired people can enroll.

The retirees pointed out that even when the more-reasonable non-profit plans like Blue Cross and Blue Shield are available, they still take so large a part of the medical budget that little is left for other needs such as dental care.

Housing problems varied. About half the retirees had their own homes with mortgages paid up. Others lived in apartments. Their reports ranged from "no problem at all" to "very serious."

Food: The retirees, most of them economical shoppers, felt in general that they could manage on $1.20 a day per person, or about $72 a month for a couple. Some felt they could serve nutritious meals on $1 a day by using low-cost meat cuts and seasonally-abundant foods. But there was somewhat-impassioned disagreement on this.

Medical Swindlers Exposed:

'Catalogue of Fakes' Available from FDA

A CATALOG OF FAKES and swindles in the health field warning the public to beware of "secret" remedies and their sponsors has been issued by the Food & Drug Administration.

The booklet, "Your Money and Your Life," says that "worse than the financial loss is the danger that reliance on some ineffective product will cause delay in getting proper medical treatment."

It estimates that the public spends $1 billion a year on unnecessary or falsely represented products and treatments.

In addition to exposing a number of worthless devices for diagnosing and treating various diseases, the booklet also debunks baldness "cures," no-diet reducing products, wrinkle removers, sea water minerals, and many others.

It summarizes current knowledge about many devices and remedies, among them air purifiers, alcoholism "treatments," "tired blood" preparations, cold and cough remedies, colitis treatment and laxatives, diabetes treatments, eyeglasses by mail order and hair restorers. It also gives advice on how to tell whether a remedy is a fake:

"First, is it a "secret" remedy? If so, you can almost be certain that it is a fake.

"Second, does the sponsor claim he is battling the medical profession which is trying to suppress his wonderful discovery? This is one of the surest signs of quackery.

"Third, how did you hear about it? If the treatment was advertised or promoted in a sensational magazine or by a faith-healers' group, or by some crusading organization of laymen, be skeptical. Honest researchers do not try to stimulate interest on the part of the public until a drug is thoroughly proven and accepted by other scientists. They do not expect sick people to be guinea pigs.

"And, finally, of course, you may ask your doctor."

The booklet may be obtained from the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D. C., for 10 cents a copy. A discount of 25 percent is available for purchases of 100 copies or more. Single free copies are available from the Food & Drug Administration, Washington 25, D. C.

Unions Support Liberals' Proposal:

Canada in Political Battle Over National Pension Plan

Ottawa—A national program of "portable pensions," which could provide a total monthly income of $225 for a retired couple, has whipped up a major political fight in Canada.

On one side of the fight are the labor movement and the New Democratic Party, backing the principle of the federal Liberal Party-sponsored Canada Pension Plan. Ranged against them are the powerful insurance industry, some provincial governments and the Conservatives.

Insurance is big business in Canada. Canadian companies collect $600 million in premiums for pension plans each year. Canadians have the highest per capita life insurance coverage in the world, and a lot of premium dollars have been thrown into the fight to kill or cripple the portable pension plan.

A wage-related, contributory, portable pension, to supplement the existing basic federal old-age pension of $75 a month at age 70, has long been a major goal of labor. The first federal pensions were won in the late Twenties, when two labor members of Parliament held the balance of political power and pushed the then Liberal party government into initiating the program.

In its legislative submissions over the years the Canadian Labor Congress and its provincial federations have laid great stress on the need for portable pensions.

The issue has been a major policy plank of the labor-backed New Democratic Party since its formation. Liberal Party Leader Lester B. Pearson also promised such a plan during last year's federal election, which placed him at the head of Canada's government.

Canada's constitutional structure requires provincial agreement on welfare programs, and with a majority of the 10 provinces having non-Liberal party governments some foot-dragging has taken place. In the populous province of Ontario, with one-third of the national population, federal Health and Welfare Minister Judy LaMarsh created a roaring controversy last fall when she tried to unseat the Conservative party provincial government on the pension issue. A provincial proposal for portable pensions would be dropped, the Ontario Conservatives promised, if federal proposals were acceptable.

Relations Strained

The Conservative party retained control of the Ontario government with a big majority, and relations between Ontario Premier John Robarts and Miss LaMarsh have been strained ever since. As a result, Liberal Prime Minister Pearson has stepped in to personally handle pension negotiations with provincial premiers. A further complication has been added by the decision of the province of Quebec to go it alone on pensions—using accrued pension funds for economic development to bolster its new nationalistic aspirations.

Judy LaMarsh

CANADIAN Minister of Health & Welfare, who is pushing a nationwide portable pension plan.

Compulsory Plan

The all-Canada pension plan would be compulsory for all employed persons of 18 years and over; voluntary for self-employed. It would be financed by a 1 percent tax on the first $4,500 of annual earnings, matched equally by employer contributions. Benefits, to start in 1966 at a low level, would be increased to 20 percent of annual earnings by 1975. The maximum available at 70 years of age, based on present income restriction levels would be a pension of $150 monthly for a single person, including $75 from the existing old-age pension system, or $225 for a couple.

The maximum potential for a husband and wife, both contributing to the Canada pension plan and both eligible for the older pension, would be $300 monthly. For retirement at 65, benefits are pro-rated down and the maximum would be $126 for a single person. It is planned to raise the proportion of wages on which the pension is computed to keep pace with general wage levels.

Under heavy propaganda fire from the insurance interests and some provincial governments, the federal government backed down from earlier proposals to set the pension levels at 30 percent of earnings. The insurance firms, with the aid of some political supporters, claim that the Canada Pension Plan would do grave injury to the nation's competitive position and economic health. They have also conjured up visions of danger to existing private pension plans, which cover 28 percent of Canada's work force. Many of these plans are union-negotiated.

Ontario Premier Sees Flaws

Ontario's Premier Robarts, without rejecting the plan, has expressed strong criticism. He claims the proposal to invest 50 percent of a $3 billion reserve fund in provincially-guaranteed securities is inadequate, and suggests that 90 percent of the reserves should be made available to the provinces, leaving only 10 percent with the federal government.

The Ontario Federation of Labor has described Robart's criticism as "a transparent attempt to sabotage any universal social security program." The labor movement feels that crocodile tears are being shed by interests fundamentally opposed to the whole pension concept.

The CLC and affiliates have endorsed the pension principle and have doubts about Pearson's amendments to lower benefits and his failure to make immediate provision for survivor benefits. Nevertheless labor's annual "citizenship month" campaign in February has centered around the drive for a portable pension plan. A nationwide petition campaign, backed by postcards to legislators, is mustering support for the program.

Provincial federations of labor and local labor councils are coordinating this campaign with public meetings, leaflet distribution and radio and TV advertising and special programs. Labor's view is that once the plan is on the statute books it can be improved.

The present session of Parliament will refer the legislation to a committee, where it will be subject to sustained attack. Present indications are that the plan will be implemented—although possibly not until 1965 or 1966—and the importance of labor's campaign at this time is to act as a counter-balance to the vested interests and to stiffen the spine of the Liberal party members in Parliament. Spectators in the ringside seats in Ottawa are sure to include U.S. insurance men.

Join War on Poverty, Fund-Raisers Urged

Cincinnati—United community funds and their member agencies have a "positive responsibility" to join in the all-out war against poverty urged by Pres. Johnson, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler declared here.

Addressing the biennial national conference of the United Community Funds and Councils of America, Schnitzler expressed the AFL-CIO's full support of the President's objective and declared the issue is above "partisan politics."

He urged the voluntary agencies to overcome any feelings that government programs are "things apart" and to join in a broad national effort emphasizing "collaboration," not competition, and going beyond the "band-aid" or "patch here, patch there" treatment of social needs.

Schnitzler suggested four ways in which the voluntary agencies could fulfill their role in the war on poverty:

- By dramatizing "the facts of economic want" in their own communities and making the "invisible poor" visible to the prosperous majority.
- By stepping-up efforts to develop community leadership and draw more citizens — especially young people—into active participation in community health and social welfare activities.
- By continuing experiments to develop imaginative new approaches to "ever-changing" welfare problems.
- By becoming the community guardians, "the watch dogs," of the government services to make sure that programs undertaken with tax money are realistically in keeping with the community's needs.

Calls for Wisdom

"The war on poverty demands wisdom as well as vigor," Schnitzler declared. "The voluntary agencies, with their vast, collective store of experience, can do much to meet that demand."

But, he added, "the fundamentals, the very roots of poverty, can be reached only by government—by public policies that create full employment, abolish sweatshop wages, provide full and equal educational opportunities and all the rest."

Schnitzler went on to stress "the continuing responsibility" of all segments of society in the area of civil rights.

"The time is especially appropriate," he said, "for community chests and united funds to renew their determination that all those in need will be served with equal consideration; and to undertake, in the finest traditions of social welfare, to build and strengthen the bridges of understanding among men."

Schnitzler joined in the conference's tribute to four trade unionists who received awards as outstanding volunteer workers and said they symbolize the point that "your work is our work."

The four were Claude Fernandez, Retail Clerks business agent in Santa Clara, Calif., who heads the Community Services Committee in the city and was co-chairman of its 1963 United Fund Campaign; Vice Pres. Thomas R. Marsella of the Kentucky State AFL-CIO, who has been vice chairman of the Floyd County United Fund for three years; Intl. Rep. Maurice Allen of the Steelworkers, past chairman of the Birmingham Community Services Committee and of the Jefferson County United Appeal's labor advisory committee; Financial Sec. Irwin J. Sannit of Postal Clerks Local 89, a member of the Philadelphia United Fund's labor committee and its budget and allocations committee.

Recreation Congress Hears Edward Morgan

Honolulu, H.I.—Edward P. Morgan, ABC radio news commentator whose programs are sponsored by the AFL-CIO, was a principal speaker at the Recreation Div. Congress of the National Association of Counties here.

Morgan, whose broadcasts are heard Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST, spoke on "Have We Sense Enough to Save Our Great Outdoors?" Others who addressed the congress included Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas and Walter O'Malley, president of the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Beirne Named Adviser On Junior College Role

Appointment of Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers to the National Advisory Committee on the Junior College has been announced by Executive Dir. Edmund J. Gleazer, Jr., of the American Association of Junior Colleges.

The committee will advise the association as to how junior colleges, in a rapidly growing field, can meet the nation's new educational needs. Gleazer said formation of the advisory group grew out of a desire to bring about better understanding of the role of the junior college in higher education.

Better Pay, Conditions Bargaining Goal at GM

The Auto Workers will bargain seriously for major contract gains, UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock assured 600 delegates to a Washington, D. C., meeting of the union's General Motors locals.

The delegates, representing 350,000 UAW members who work in 130 GM plants, adopted a resolution calling on GM to "support the penalty overtime rates" proposed by Pres. Johnson in a recent message stressing the need for helping the jobless.

The conference said "we do not oppose emergency overtime when it is unavoidable" but declared that scheduled overtime, when millions of breadwinners are unemployed, is "economically immoral, socially inexcusable and intrinsically selfish." The nation "needs more jobs, not more jobless," it said.

Woodcock recalled that GM, after reporting profits after taxes of $1.6 billion for 1963, and after paying "double dividends" of $1.46 for every hour worked by UAW members, still had idle funds exceeding $2.5 billion.

"This is the year," said Woodcock, "when all the arithmetic is on our side."

Besides money, the union will continue, he said, to stress those working conditions that mean much to the dignity of the individual.

After the conference, delegates and their families took buses to Arlington National Cemetery to lay flowers and say prayers at the graves of the late Pres. Kennedy and Medgar Evers, civil rights leader assassinated in Mississippi.

Heading the delegation were officers elected by the conference—Chairman Clarence Lyons, Indianapolis; Vice Chairman Joseph Malotke, Madison Heights, Mich., and Sec. Jack Turner, Flint, Mich.

Work Injury Toll Highest in 10 Years

Injuries at work disabled more than 2 million U.S. workers—the largest number in 10 years—for more than one day each in 1963.

The injury total was up 1.5 percent over the 1962 level of 1.99 million while fatalities rose by 3.6 percent, from 13,700 to 14,200, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics and the National Safety Council reported.

Of the injuries, approximately 84,800 resulted in some permanent impairment, the report said.

MORE THAN 500 DELEGATES representing 270,000 Pennsylvania members of the Steelworkers attended the 6th annual conference of the union's Legislative Committee of Pennsylvania in Pittsburgh. Workshops discussed civil rights, unemployment compensation, the 88th Congress and the "radical right," and a general session (above) heard several speakers.

Community 'Gang-Up' Voids NLRB Election

By Eugene A. Kelly

Cooperation of a "runaway" employer and the community structure of Orangeburg, S.C., in a massive "pressure" campaign against the town's first union has led the National Labor Relations Board to set aside an election lost by the Machinists.

The board, ordering a second election, found that the employer put pressure on his 460 workers through anti-union speeches and letters, backed by community leaders who "iterated and reiterated the theme that selection of the union would cause Orangeburg to become a distressed area, would cause the employer to move, and would deprive employes of job opportunities" because other employers would not move to the area.

The company, recently moved from union conditions in Utica, N.Y., to a non-union shop in the South, is the Utica-Herbrand Tool Div. of the Kelsey-Hayes Co. It conducted a beat-the-union campaign beginning May 1, 1963, when election notices were mailed to workers, and ending 12 days later in a union defeat, 171 for to 245 against.

The board's report tells how management assailed the union in plant speeches and letters to the families of employes, and community "third parties" also actively campaigned for the union's defeat.

'Atmosphere of Fear'

Statements by the employer and others "created an atmosphere of fear of reprisal and loss of job opportunity" if the employes selected the IAM and "prevented the exercise of free choice in the election," the board ruled.

Noting that the board in previous decisions has held an employer is entitled to express his position, the three-member panel said statements in this latest case "go far beyond permissible limits."

"They convey the message that collective bargaining would lead to loss of job opportunity for the Orangeburg community.

"This message is conveyed not only through the employer's strongly worded statement that strike action would be necessary to obtain any concessions" in bargaining, but also through statements that "economic development would be stifled if collective bargaining made inroads in the community."

Coercion Cited

The board added that the "massive campaign conducted by third parties in the community re-echoed and embellished this message" and called attention to the "coercive elements present in the home visits of local police officers, a doctor and the mayor of the city, and in the distribution of anti-union propaganda" at all banks.

Such pressures, although not emanating from the employer, "exerted a coercive effect upon the employes' free choice and, in conjunction with other conduct" previously cited, "form a basis for setting aside the election," said the board.

The case had one unique factor—the use for the first time of what the NLRB's regional director, who upheld union complaints of unfair practices, called a printed version of the movie "And Women Must Weep." The day before the election, the director reported, "Dear Mom" booklets with the "Weep" message appeared in all Orangeburg banks for free distribution.

The "Weep" movie, circulated by the National Right to Work Committee, is a fictionalized account of an IAM strike in Princeton, Ind. The NLRB has set aside five elections on the ground that showing the movie "polluted the atmosphere" required for a free choice by workers.

In the Orangeburg case, one employe testified that his family doctor called him out to his car and said he was visiting employes to get them to vote against the union. Another testified that two Orangeburg policemen talked to him in their car about the danger the plant might move. Ads paid for by an "interested citizens' committee" appeared in the daily "Times & Democrat" and 88 spot anouncements were heard over three local radio stations, all with an anti-union theme.

Some of the spot announcements stated the union "drove the company out of Utica, N.Y.," the report said.

Rochester Teachers Ask Higher Pay Scale

Rochester, N. Y.—The Rochester Federation of Teachers Local 616 has asked for a sharply increased salary schedule based on a starting salary of $5,400 a year.

The present rate range starts at $5,000 and goes to $9,675 after 20 years. The union's proposal climbs to $13,700 after 20 years.

Aden Frees 23 Detained Union Men

Brussels—The last 23 men—most of them union members—detained without charges following a bomb explosion at Aden Airport in mid-December have been released, according to word received by the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Those freed included Gen. Sec. Abdullah Alasnag of the Aden Trades Union Congress. They had been held at Al Ittihad camp in the South Arabian Federation and were forced to undergo what Aden authorities admitted were "certain hardships."

The release followed strenuous efforts by the world free trade union movement to obtain justice for those detained without charges after they had expressed opposition to the merger of Aden and the South Arabian Federation. The last of those held received their freedom, ironically, on the official observance of the anniversary of the merger.

From the time of the first arrests the ICFTU had appealed for an examination of the circumstances by the government of the South Arabian Federation, the High Commissioner for Aden, the British Colonial Office and the British government.

In addition the ICFTU filed charges with the Intl. Labor Organization which ICFTU Gen. Sec. Omer Becu said will be pressed regardless of the prisoners' release. Also, it asked the League of Red Cross Societies to investigate conditions in the prison camp, sent ICFTU Rep. Ivar Noren to Aden to work for the release of the prisoners. The ICFTU gave financial aid to the families of the victims through the Intl. Solidarity Fund and cooperated with the Socialist International to send Christopher French, prominent British lawyer, to Aden to represent the prisoners in any court proceedings.

Tailors Local Sets Centennial Observance

Invitations are being mailed out now by a committee consisting of Pres. August Haack, Vice Pres. Harry Ludwig, Sec.-Treas. Edna Tschida, Helen Lipska, Hilda Meyer and Dewey Brady.

Total Unchanged in Year:

Mixed Job Picture In Factories, Service

By Robert B. Cooney

The job picture at the start of 1964, after allowing for post-holiday cutbacks and severe storms curtailing outdoor work, "reflected continued strength mainly in the service-producing industries," the Labor Dept. has reported.

Manufacturing employment, however, has remained somewhat stagnant for the past half-year, the detailed job report for January revealed.

In its earlier summary report, the Labor Dept. reported that unemployment rose by 700,000 as expected to a total of 4.6 million. This edged up the seasonally adjusted jobless rate to 5.6 percent in January from December's 5.5 percent.

Both the jobless total and the jobless rate were about the same as in January 1963.

The detailed report, which is based on payroll data, showed that non-farm jobs dropped by 1.7 million over the month to a total of 56.9 million. The December-January decline was "slightly less than seasonal."

There were the usual reductions for this time of year in postal employment (federal jobs down by 156,000 to 2.3 million) and manufacturing (down by 173,000 to 17 million)," the report said.

"The cutback in retail trade (down by 862,000 to 8.7 million) was not as large as the typical post-Christmas decline and drops were also relatively small in services (down by 62,000 to 8.3 million) and state and local government (about unchanged at 7.4 million).

However, there was an especially sharp decline in construction (down by 312,000 to 2.6 million), where activity was hampered by winter storms."

The Labor Dept. said the job cutbacks throughout the durable and soft goods divisions of the manufacturing sector were typical for this time of year, and added:

"Manufacturing employment has advanced only slightly since mid-1963, following substantial gains earlier last year."

In the over-the-year picture, the Labor Dept. observed that payroll employment rose by 1.5 million, "with four-fifths of the gain in the service sector."

The report noted that after discounting the effects of the New York newspaper strike-lockout in January 1963, the over-the-year gain in factory jobs is about the same as that recorded between January 1962 and January 1963. Total factory jobs were up by 278,000 over a year ago, with three-fourths of the gain in hard goods, the report said, adding:

"Substantial over-the-year gains were reported in metals, machinery and transportation equipment, but the major portion of this increase had already occurred by last June. In fact, machinery was the only major durable goods industry to show employment strength in the latter half of 1963."

In the January job scene, some 3.4 million persons worked part-time due to bad weather.

Due to the weather and usual seasonal cutbacks, the factory workweek dropped sharply from 40.9 hours in December to 40.1 hours in January. Average hourly earnings rose by 1 cent to a new high of $2.52, but weekly earnings dipped to $101.05, the report said.

TWUA to Ask Woolen Mills For Pay Hike

Boston—A conference of Textile Workers representing some 20,000 woolen and worsted workers in 75 plants recommended that local unions terminate contracts when they expire this spring so as to negotiate for wage and fringe benefit gains.

Most contracts in the industry carry 60-day termination notification clauses, which means they must be canceled by the end of this month in anticipation of expiration.

In addition to recommending contract policy, the conference adopted a resolution pointing out that the economic prospects of the industry are improving and recalling that nearly two years have elapsed since the last wage increase.

Speakers included TWUA Pres. William Pollock and Sec.-Treas. John Chupka. Pollock noted that the cost of living reached a record high in December, and that workers in other industries have been receiving higher wages.

"It is only fair," he added, "that workers in the woolen and worsted branch of the textile industry share in this general improvement in American living standards."

7-Month Strike Wins Battle on Wage Cuts

Los Angeles—Nearly 1,000 Rubber Workers, on strike for almost seven months at the U.S. Tire & Rubber Co. plant here, have won a settlement of their long struggle against cuts in work standards and wages demanded by the management.

The strike started July 12 and ended when members of URW Local 44 voted to resume tire production Feb. 9 in a plant that had been shut down for the entire period.

The dispute involved a supplement agreement to the national agreement negotiated by the URW and the company. In the final settlement, management withdrew its demand for wage cuts ranging up to 60 cents an hour and agreed to a number of improvements asked by the strikers.

The parties will negotiate terms of what the union called a "true time study program" based on a recent settlement at the company's plant in Eau Claire, Wis. Under it the management will train three union time study men, using two of them full time and the other on a standby basis.

It also agreed to joint development of equitable production standards and to maintenance of employe earnings, including a 10-cent hourly wage increase negotiated last summer in the national agreement.

The agreement to settle came not long after the strikers voted unanimously to reject the last previous company terms.

Plant gate collections during the strike helped maintain a soup kitchen opened at local headquarters to supplement the $25 per week paid each striker out of the URW strike fund.

Employers Fight Double-Time Bill:

Cut in Unneeded Overtime Can Spur Jobs, Wirtz Says

By David L. Perlman

An administration drive to increase employment by eliminating "unnecessary" overtime work collided with solid employer resistance as two House Labor subcommittees opened joint hearings.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told the committee members—and an overflow audience including lobbyists from leading employer associations that the Administration is supporting "as strongly as we can" legislation requiring double pay for overtime work in selected industries.

He said it would create a "significant" number of new jobs and thus carry out the original intent of the 1938 Fair Labor Standards Act.

As the hearings got under way, Rep. Robert Taft, Jr. (R-O.) indicated that employers were seriously concerned about the bill and urged that hearings be extended beyond the scheduled three weeks to permit testimony from employers in all industries which might be affected by the legislation.

Lead-off witness for opponents of the bill was the president of the National Association of Manufacturers, W. P. Gullander, who denounced the overtime proposal, claiming it would raise costs for employers without creating jobs. Another business spokesman, representing the Council of State Chambers of Commerce, charged the Administration bill would "shackle and harass" business with a "ball-and-chain penalty rate for overtime."

The flat rejection by business groups came after Wirtz had appealed to employers, in what he termed "the haunting phrase" of the late Pres. Kennedy, to "ask what you can do for your country."

What employers can do, he said, "to help the country and the economy" is to hire more workers instead of scheduling heavy amounts of overtime work.

The AFL-CIO convention last November called on Congress to "help create jobs" by requiring payment of double time for all overtime hours covered by the wage-hour law, coupled with a reduction of the basic workweek to 35 hours.

Wirtz reiterated that the Administration still opposes a legislated 35-hour week—as contrasted with negotiated cuts in hours—but is convinced by "persuasive" evidence that "a significant increase in employment could be obtained by distributing to other employes work which is presently performed on an overtime basis, and that this could be done without impairment of operating efficiency."

Roosevelt's Words Quoted by Wirtz

Franklin D. Roosevelt's message to Congress in 1937, urging a floor on wages and a ceiling on hours, was quoted by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz in House testimony urging stiffer penalty pay for overtime work.

Here's what FDR said:

"We know that overwork and underpay do not increase the national income when a large portion of our workers remain unemployed. Reasonable and flexible use of the long-established right of government to set and to change working hours can, I hope, decrease unemployment in those groups in which unemployment today principally exists."

The Administration's bill, sponsored by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.), would not establish an across-the-board double-time rate.

It would empower the Secretary of Labor to set a double-time rate, at any point after 40 hours of work, in any industry on the recommendation of a tripartite committee representing labor, management and the public. The basis would be a determination that "substantial and persistent overtime is being worked and that increasing the penalty pay would create more jobs without unduly raising costs. "Emergency" overtime work would be exempt from the double-time requirements.

Wirtz told Congress "it dosn't make sense" to have heavy unemployment in a prosperous economy. He noted that overtime hours have increased 16 percent since 1960 and that more than half of the employes who work overtime regularly work as much as 49 hours or more a week.

The amount of overtime worked each year by persons covered by the federal wage-hour law is the equivalent of 1.25 million jobs, Wirtz said. But he hastened to add that the Administration's bill would not generate anywhere near that number of new jobs. Some overtime work is "unavoidable," he noted, and it would be economically "unfeasible" for many employers to put on additional workers.

Wirtz emphasized, however, that he is "convinced" the Administration bill will provide "a workable tool for reducing unemployment."

He readily agreed that its enactment "won't do the whole job" of licking the unemployment problem. In fact, he said, if its passage "would deaden efforts to do something about the overall problem, that would be a compelling argument against it."

Wirtz sharply disputed statements that the unemployed do not have the skills needed by employers who are scheduling overtime work.

Government surveys show, he said, that 30 percent of machine operators and other semi-skilled workers are on overtime—and more than 1 million persons in this category are unemployed.

One third of all craftsmen are working overtime—and nearly 500,000 skilled workers are jobless.

Fifteen percent of all clerical employes work more than 40 hours a week—and more than 400,000 clerical workers are unemployed.

"These figures," he said, belie the suggestion that those now unemployed would not be qualified to perform the jobs created by reducing excessive overtime."

Public hearings on the Administration bill are being conducted under the joint chairmanship of Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), whose subcommittee held extensive hearings last year on hours of work, and Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), whose subcommittee normally deals with amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The AFL-CIO is scheduled to testify Mar. 3 before the joint group.

Randolph Urges Negroes To Repudiate 'Work' Law

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph has branded as "a monstrous falsehood" claims by Oklahoma "right-to-work" supporters that a referendum proposal to outlaw the union shop would further civil rights.

Randolph, president of the Sleeping Car Porters and a national leader of the civil rights movement, said he has been informed by Oklahoma leaders that this claim is being made in an attempt to win Negro votes for a proposed "right-to-work" amendment to the state constitution.

It is the labor movement, not the "segregationist forces" behind the "right-to-work" campaign, which is "helping our crusade for civil rights," Randolph declared.

He called on Oklahoma Negroes to "help defend the institution of collective bargaining which has made possible higher wages, better working conditions and greater job security." Randolph added:

"The so-called 'right-to-work' law would destroy these gains. It seeks to destroy our hard-won right of collective bargaining and it would destroy with the same blow the labor unions through which we have made these gains."

Randolph warned that the "right-to-work" groups seek to drive "a wedge between Negroes and the labor movement," and declared:

"We must not let it happen. We must vote against this law."

Earlier a group of Negro leaders in Oklahoma, headed by State NAACP Pres. Jake Simmons, Jr., joined in a call for defeat of the "right-to-work" proposal and charged that "the same reactionaries" who have fought civil rights progress are in the forefront of the campaign to ban the union shop.

Oklahomans will vote on the issue in the May 5 primary election.

Economic Aid Seen British Guiana Need

Economic assistance is urgently needed by the people of British Guiana to help overcome massive unemployment and low living standards, the president of that country's Post Office Workers declared.

Andrew Jackson, a member of the Inter-American Advisory Committee of the Postal, Telegraph & Telephone Intl., warned that without such aid from the western democracies, the Guianese may turn to the Communist bloc.

He stressed, too, that any economic and development assistance that may be forthcoming should bypass the government of leftist Prime Minister Cheddi Jagan, to avoid aiding the Communists, and be channeled through sources that could "get it to the people."

"What is material to us now," Jackson declared in a radio interview on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public affairs program broadcast by the Mutual network, "is that there is a need for better housing conditions; there is a need for the establishment of cooperatives which the workers would manage as they do in all other parts of the world."

He suggested that the western democracies have too long overlooked "the dangers to their own doorsteps" posed by the Communist threat to British Guiana.

Jackson noted that so far the free labor movement of the country has succeeded in staving off Communist penetration and last year won an 80-day strike protesting the Jagan government's efforts to impose restrictive legislation on unions.

Since then, he charged, Jagan has attempted through his Peoples Progressive Party to gain a foothold in the labor movement by forming rival organizations to compete against legitimate unions.

British Guiana, on the northeast coast of South America, has internal self-rule but not complete independence from Great Britain. Jagan's PPP received fewer than 50 percent of the votes in the 1961 election, but nevertheless gained control of the government.

Jackson noted that the Guiana labor movement agrees with the demand for independence, but charged that Jagan's attitude, particularly his refusal to agree to an election before independence is granted, has been among the reasons for delay.

Jackson, in the United States for a conference of the PTTI advisory committee, was interviewed by Ben Meyer of the Associated Press and Tad Szulc of the New York Times.

Texas Labor Plans Appeal on Job 'Commuters'

Austin, Tex.—The Texas State AFL-CIO has pledged to carry on a federal court fight against the practice of Mexican nationals "commuting" across the border to jobs for which unemployed Texans are available.

The executive board of the state central body voted to press the case to the U.S. Supreme Court if necessary to win consideration of the issue on its merits.

A suit attacking the practice was brought against the U.S. Attorney General and the immigration commissioner by the State AFL-CIO and 180 residents of Texas border cities, most of them of Mexican descent, who charged they had suffered unemployment and depressed wages because of the "commuters."

U.S. Dist. Judge Burnita S. Matthews of the District of Columbia dismissed the suit and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upheld her ruling that the state central body had no standing to bring the suit and avoiding any conclusion on the merits.

The suit against the government charged that under an "amiable fiction," the commuters who continued to live in Mexico while working in the United States had illegally been granted status as "aliens admitted for permanent residence."

The complaint also charged that the government failed to enforce provisions of the 1952 Immigration & Nationality Act designed to protect U.S. workers from the depressing effects of nonimmigrant alien labor. These provisions permit the entry and employment of such aliens only if "unemployed persons capable of performing such service of labor cannot be found in this country."

The government asked the appeals court to uphold dismissal of the suit because of the "political" question involved and presented an affidavit from Sec. of State Dean Rusk declaring that "a judgment on the merits in this case would be undesirable from the standpoint of the foreign relations of the U.S."

The State AFL-CIO labeled this a "hearsay and conclusionary statement" and declared that "the judiciary should certainly not abdicate its judicial function whenever an executive officer, like the boy crying 'wolf,' cries 'politics' or 'foreign affairs.' "

Rusk's suggestion that U.S. relations with Mexico would be hampered by a ruling on the merits of the case was countered in the central body's reply brief with a quotation from the general secretary of the Mexican Confederation of Labor expressing "sympathy" with Texas unions over the problems posed by the commuters. Fidel Velazquez, who is also a national senator of Mexico, was quoted as telling Laredo AFL-CIO officials that commuter labor "hurts native labor" and is partly responsible for inflated prices on the Mexican side of the border.

On the question of standing to sue, the state central body cited a number of court cases as precedents, particularly a 1961 decision upholding the Meat Cutters in a suit to bar commuter strikebreakers from operating an El Paso packing plant.

The brief also noted that provisions of the Immigration Act designed to safeguard domestic labor were written and amended "at the behest" of organized labor, which "certainly is a proper party to complain of the failure to enforce such provisions."

The interest of the 180 individuals who joined in bringing the suit is "greater than merely ordinary public interest," the brief declared, because of "their peculiar and special damage resulting from the presence of the commuters."

The state central body cited a Labor Dept. report which observed that in Laredo alien commuters were employed at wages "so low as to be symbolic of peonage."

Another report, on El Paso, found that "a substantial number" of domestic workers was available for the jobs taken by the alien commuters. The same report concluded that "the willingness of the commuter alien to work for possibly substandard wages necessarily impairs the domestic worker's power to bargain for better rates."

The brief also cited studies showing that unemployment rates for such border cities as Laredo, Brownsville, Del Rio and Eagle Pass were substantially higher than the rate for Texas as a whole.

Representing the state central body in the case are AFL-CIO Gen. Counsel J. Albert Woll and Attorneys Charles J. Morris and L. N. D. Wells, Jr., of Dallas.

Union Funds Voted To Indian Scholarships

Largest in History:

Tax Cut Bill Cleared For Final Passage

House and Senate conferees cleared the way for an $11.5 billion tax cut bill—largest in the nation's history—to reach Pres. Johnson's desk before the end of the month. Final House approval is expected Feb. 25, with Senate action the same day or the next.

By early March, the take-home pay of virtually every worker will be bigger as the basic withholding tax drops from 18 percent to 14 percent. For most workers, the extra spending money will be in the $2 to $3-a-week range, but for the economy it will add up to an $800-million-a-month boost in consumer purchasing power.

Administration and labor economists expect this to translate into more production and more jobs.

Two important differences between the House and Senate bills —the capital gains tax and exclusion of sick benefits from taxation—were resolved in a manner urged by the AFL-CIO.

Conferees agreed to retain the present 25 percent maximum tax on capital gains profits from the sale of stocks or property. The House bill would have dropped the rate to 21 percent, which the AFL-CIO had charged would "open wider an already glaring loophole."

Sick Benefit Accepted

Senate conferees also won acceptance of a more generous sick benefit provision than that contained in the House bill.

Present law permits exclusion of sick pay from taxation, up to $100 a week, starting with the seventh day of illness or the first day of hospitalization.

The House had voted to stretch the waiting period before the sick pay exclusion takes effect to 30 days.

The conferees agreed to a Senate amendment, which had been strongly urged by the AFL-CIO, to allow continued exclusion of sickness or injury benefits which do not exceed 75 percent of a worker's normal pay, up to a ceiling of $75 a week, with no change in the present waiting period.

This would assist large groups of workers who receive only partial pay when sick.

After 30 days of illness or injury, the tax exclusion would apply to all forms of sick pay or wage continuation, with the ceiling rising to $100 a week as under present law.

The conferees also dropped a labor-opposed Senate amendment which would have allowed a tax deduction for contributions to political candidates or parties of up to $50 for a single person or $100 for a couple. This, the AFL-CIO noted, would have principally benefited upper-income taxpayers and could not have been used by persons who do not itemize their tax returns.

The committee rejected a Senate amendment supported by the AFL-CIO which would have allowed physically-handicapped persons to deduct transportation costs to and from work and seriously watered down another labor-supported amendment to reduce the special tax exemption given Americans employed overseas.

Two-Step Cut

The tax cut takes effect over a two-year period. Treasury experts estimate that the reduction for the 1964 calendar year will amount to about $6.14 billion for individuals and $1.56 billion for corporations. In the second year, when the full cut is in effect, the figures will rise to $9.12 billion for individuals and $2.36 billion for corporations.

Nothing in the new tax law will affect taxes payable on 1963 income, which are due not later than Apr. 15.

The new tax law gives the largest proportionate tax cuts to persons in the lower and upper income groups. However, many upper bracket taxpayers will be hit by a two-step elimination of the dividend tax credit in the present law. Previously stockholders have been able to deduct 4 percent of their income from investments from their tax bill; this is slashed to 2 percent for this year, ended next year.

Small stockholders will benefit from a doubling of the amount of dividend income which is tax free. The new allowance will be $100 for a single person and $200 for a couple.

Backpay Still Pending— 11 Years Late

Eleven years after a backpay order against the Mastro Plastics Corp., New York City, the National Labor Relations Board has issued a second order directing payment of $28,628 to eight employes who were unfairly discharged in 1951.

It was Mar. 13, 1953, when the board issued its first order upholding charges by Carpenters Local 3127 that the firm discriminated against union members and directing it to make them whole for pay losses.

The firm failed to comply, and nine employes could not be located by the time the lawyers had argued their way through the U.S. 2d Circuit Court of Appeals in 1954, the U.S. Supreme Court in 1956, the New York regional director's office in 1960 and back to the board in 1962.

In the latter year, the NLRB ordered the backpay held in escrow until the nine missing workers could be located and questioned. A trial examiner, on Oct. 23, 1963, issued a supplemental decision finding all but one of the claimants entitled to specified amounts of backpay.

The firm, which by that time had become the French-American Reeds Mfg. Co., questioned the decision and the case went back to the board, which now has awarded backpay ranging from $523 for Salvatore Tripolone to $12,480 for Michael Valentine, with lesser amounts for six others and no pay for one worker who refused to testify.

Muskie Pure Water Bill Given Support of Labor

A Senate-passed bill to expand the federal water pollution program was given strong labor endorsement in testimony before the House Public Works Committee.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. John T. Curran said added government funds to keep streams, rivers and lakes clean represent "an investment in the health and welfare of ourselves, our children, and future generations."

He urged the House to pass intact the Senate bill providing:

- A step-up in federal grants for sewage treatment plants and other pollution control measures from $100 million to $120 million a year.
- Transfer of the program from the Public Health Service to a new Federal Water Pollution Control Administration which would be established in the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.
- Authority for the HEW Secretary to set national water quality standards and to bar the marketing of products which contribute to water pollution, such as "hard" detergents.

The bill, sponorsed by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.), passed the Senate 69-11 last October.

Curran said an expanded water pollution program would be "a double-barreled bonus" for the nation since it would also create more jobs.

"It is a national tragedy," Curran said, "that we have near-crisis levels of unemployment at the same time that we have urgently needed and still unfilled public needs like the need for water pollution control sewage treatment plants in hundreds of communities."

He noted that federal dollars spent in the pollution control program have a "multiplier" effect. Each increase in federal spending, he pointed out, has been met with an even bigger increase in state and local expenditures in the field. Local governments, he said, are spending $5 for every dollar the federal government puts up.

He hailed the proposed establishment of a separate water pollution control agency.

"We believe this administrative change will promote a more comprehensive approach to water pollution in terms of water supply, recreation, fish and wildlife," he said, "in addition to public health protection."

Urging "quick passage" of the bill, Curran warned that the demand for water over the next three decades will exceed the "foreseeable supply."

Cape Kennedy Ban Urged Against FEC

has "no place in this century" was blocking a settlement.

He also said that the Florida Public Utilities Commission and the state's Gov. Farris Bryant had been "strangely silent" on the dispute, and especially on the question of whether the railroad had been living up to its obligations in terms of serving the public. Reynolds said this was particularly puzzling in view of the fact that management has refused to take any reasonable step to resolve the disagreement.

Reynolds' statements followed a press conference at which Chairman George Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives' Association said there were no indications that the FEC and Board Chairman Edward Ball had any intention of settling the dispute, and that Ball was acting like a "feudal baron."

Union Denies Violence

Leighty told reporters that incidents of violence that had occurred during the year-long strike did not involve the union, and that many accidents occurred because of the railroad's failure to maintain its track and equipment. He stressed the unions' strong opposition to dynamitings in recent weeks and called for a wide investigation of the offenses to fix responsibility.

The RLEA meeting in Miami Beach adopted a resolution noting that Ball as chairman of FEC "has defied the settlement pleas of three separate presidential boards which the employes have accepted" and that he has rejected arbitration as urged by the Florida delegation in Congress, the Secretary of Labor and the President of the United States."

The resolution called on Pres. Johnson "to reverse the provocative action of the U.S. National Aeronautics & Space Administration (NASA) in letting Ball's strikebreakers operate trains over a government-owned rail spur into the Cape Kennedy area.

Leighty noted that the FEC had refused to go along with a general settlement between the unions and the railroads recommended by a Presidential emergency board for a wage rise of 10.28 cents per hour and five days notice on abolishing jobs. He said the railroad has refused to grant FEC workers "the same pay and working conditions as other railroaders, which is all they ask."

'Time-Zone Syndrome' Catches Up With Jet Pilots Who Race The Sun

Chicago—Airline pilots flying high speed jets in a virtual race with the sun are encountering a new problem element they didn't have with slower planes.

The new element in fast jets is called the "time-zone syndrome." It's an upsetting of the physiological life cycle caused by traveling rapidly around the globe. It affects air travelers, pilots and other flight crew members, but is more of a problem to the latter because of their constant exposure and the nature of their jobs.

The results of high speed flying across the world's time zones was reported in an article, "Racing the Sun," in the Air Line Pilot, monthly magazine of the Air Line Pilots.

"Time-zone flying," said the authors, Pan American Airways Capt. Marius Lodeesen and Dr. James E. Crane, Federal Aviation Agency medical examiner "interferes with sleep and insufficient sleep induces fatigue."

The earth, the article explained, "is divided into 24 zones of 15 degrees each.

"Traveling against the sun you put the clock ahead one hour when passing a time zone and in the opposite direction, one hour back," they continued. "As a jet flies nearly at the same speed as the sun, which in latitudes where most of the trans-Atlantic flights take place is about 600 miles per hour, flying eastward the days are shortened and westward, lengthened.

"Though it seems that time could be saved or lost in this fashion, this is not so. Chasing the sun, you don't gain time but you might lose sleep."

As a result, the normal day-night cycle of wakefulness and sleep, eating patterns, and the normal physiological rhythm of the entire body is disrupted and changed, the article asserts.

Economic Weapons Pushed For Assault on Joblessness

Council Stresses Drive to Cut Hours

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Organized labor will press its attack on unemployment with every possible weapon including the shorter workweek, higher overtime rates and public works programs to provide the economic muscle for a meaningful, all-out war on poverty.

This emerged as the theme of the midwinter meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council here, the thread tieing together the many statements adopted by the council on problems confronting the nation and the trade union movement.

The "tremendous challenge" of providing more than 80,000 jobs a week in the 1960s to achieve and sustain full employment, coupled with the overriding need to wipe out the blight of poverty, resulted in the council's strong reiteration of the need for an across-the-board reduction in the workweek to 35 hours and doubletime pay for overtime in face of Administration opposition to the former and an industry-by-industry approach to the overtime question.

American labor's leadership in the worldwide struggle for peace and freedom also received heavy emphasis as the federation recommended action in crisis spots around the globe and warned of differing policies and approaches in the western alliance and the Soviet "peace offensive." (Story this page.)

The council dealt also with a number of problems affecting the internal operation of the labor movement, including a plan to allow AFL-CIO unions and welfare-pension plans to pool their funds in a mortgage investment trust; the continuing success of mediation in settling internal disputes; and the approval of a voluntary assessment program to raise funds for labor's contribution to the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation and the John F. Kennedy Library.

The mortgage investment trust and the voluntary assessment were approved by the AFL-CIO General Board, which met here to act on these two matters referred by the council.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, who met with the council, said at a press conference that he had told the council the Administration had not changed its mind and still opposed a statutory reduction of the workweek to 35 hours, but that unions were free to bargain for a cut in working hours.

Discussions 'Frank and Friendly'

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany termed the discussions with Wirtz "very frank and friendly." He said the federation will maintain the pressure for a shorter workweek and that he did not agree with Wirtz and the Administration that the cut in hours would reduce the number of jobs available.

He noted also that in the drive to wipe out poverty the prime objective must be jobs, because the lack of income that leads to poverty comes primarily from lack of employment.

Meany told reporters at daily press conferences during the meeting of various developments in the Soviet grain boycott, indicating labor's support for the maritime unions' position that 50 percent of grain shipments to the Soviet Union should move in American ships. He said the maritime unions are facing serious problems that have been building up over the years, involving deterioration of the merchant marine and the disappearance of jobs for American seamen as foreign ships and foreign-flag vessels get more and more of the shipping. (Story this page.)

Nearly all the policy statements adopted by the council touched

Council Backs 'First Step':

'Bold Measures' Seen Need in Poverty War

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"Bold measures and substantial funds" will be needed "to achieve meaningful progress" in the war on poverty, the AFL-CIO warned, noting that the Administration's 1964-65 campaign is a "first small step."

The federation's Executive Council praised Pres. Johnson's "forthrightedness and courage" in pledging an unconditional war on poverty, emphasizing the importance of his challenge to the nation "to end this ugly blight."

The council adopted a detailed statement noting that the President "must reverse nearly 10 years of stagnation" in the campaign against poverty and declaring that the "primary underpinning" of the anti-poverty program must be action to achieve a full employment economy with jobs at decent wages for all Americans able and willing to work.

The council's analysis mapped four major areas dealing with the basic causes of poverty in which the "federal government must lead" and gain the cooperation of state and local governments and private groups.

- Measures to create jobs and aid the unemployed.
- Programs to lift wages of low-paid workers.
- Aid against hazards of old age, desertion, illness and death.
- Education, housing and personal adjustment.

"The AFL-CIO has long sought to focus public attention on the paradox of poverty in the midst of America's plenty," the council said. "We have spelled out steps which must be taken to end it and we have sought to implement this program through both public and private action."

Labor's concern is not only "the

Big Tax Cut Is Signed By President

By David L. Perlman

An elated Pres. Johnson signed into law an $11.5 billion tax cut which was speeded to his desk within hours after its final passage by Congress. The President hailed the measure as "the single most important step we have taken to strengthen our economy since World War II."

He said in a speech to the nation that each dollar of tax savings "will circulate through the economy, raising the demand for goods several times the amount of the tax cut" and resulting in "the creation of new jobs."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pointed out that labor "supported the bill" and that it "contains proposals which will spur consumer spending, so necessary to economic growth," but that there should be "no illusion" about it.

The bill alone "cannot and will not solve the problem of unemployment," he said in a statement.

The tax reduction "amounts for the average American worker to a 7.5-cent-an-hour raise," the federation president said.

"That will have a substantial effect on the economy," he declared. But the bill "did not contain everything we wanted and gave a far greater tax cut to corporations and upper-income families than we thought necessary," he added.

"Many additional steps must be taken to eliminate unemployment," he said, including "accelerated public works, a shorter workweek, extension of the minimum wage law, stepped-up housing and urban redevelopment."

Congress should "show as much speed and perception about these matters" as about the tax cut bill, he urged.

Agreement Reached in Wheat Shipping Dispute

Pres. Johnson's announcement of an agreement halting the maritime boycott of U.S. wheat shipments to the Soviet Union resolved the long battle of AFL-CIO ship and dockside unions to assure that half the shipments would be carried on U.S. flag vessels.

The settlement was made known as the White House released an exchange of telegrams between the President and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, whom Johnson had asked to help bring the nine-day boycott to a close.

The President assured Meany that questions raised by the Longshoremen and the maritime unions in the course of the dispute "have my personal attention."

"I understand that a satisfactory basis has been established for resolving these issues," his telegram said. "To the extent that certain aspects of this problem continue to present difficulties, I suggest and urge that further meetings be held for the purpose of resolving these problems and that these be arranged under circumstances that permit free reason to prevail. NATO Unity Still Vital To Peace, Council Says

Ball Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO warned that any economic or political policies which help make any Communist dictatorship "fat and strong" are not realistic but "suicidal" and will embolden the forces of subversion and agression everywhere.

Atlantic unity and strength offer the best answer to the Soviet union's "peace offensive," the federation's Executive Council declared in statements on Soviet maneuvers and the relaxation of international tension.

Every effort should be made, the council stressed, to resolve differences in the Atlantic Alliance, including admission of Great Britain into the European Common Market. It added:

"Economic aid, in the form of trade and credit concessions, should not be given to the Communist regimes without getting any return concessions from them. Any other policy would help the Soviet peace offensive and hurt Western unity, which has been the greatest force for world peace."

The council asserted that diplomatic recognition of the Chinese Communist regime by Gen. de-Gaulle "served Communist imperialism in the Far East by weakening the resistance of the Southeast Asian peoples to Soviet and Chinese expansion."

The statement voiced support for

35-Hour Week Drive Keyed to Jobs Decline

The decline of full-time private employment over the last 10 years despite general expansion of business is the stark fact behind organized labor's campaign for a shorter standard workweek, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in a television interview.

"The best answer to our argument for the 35-hour week is an economy which provides work for everybody who is able and willing to work," Meany declared on the CBS program "Face the Nation." (Excerpts from transcript on Page 6.)

He noted that in the past more jobs had resulted as corporations expanded production by reinvesting profits.

"Unfortunately," he said, "this is not true today."

Present-day expansion, he observed, consists of replacing "obsolete" equipment with the new automated machines that increase production but reduce the number of jobs.

"In 10 years we have not gained a single employe in this country on a full-time basis in private profit industries . . . despite a tremendous increase in the labor force," Meany declared.

He said net employment growth over the past decade all has occurred in part-time and government jobs.

"We have a real problem," the AFL-CIO president continued, when the private sector of the economy can expand over a 10-year period and at the same time employ fewer workers.

Problems No Barrier

The fact that a shorter workweek may raise other problems, relating to costs, leisure, dual job-holding, etc., should pose no barrier, Meany said, declaring:

"We certainly should not shy away from meeting the number one problem of the country because it is going to create some smaller problems."

He recalled that the same argument of high costs was raised in the past against reduction of the workweek to 50 or 48 hours and later to 40.

But because of rising productivity, he maintained, these costs can be absorbed and 5 or 6 million jobs created if the workweek is reduced on a step-by-step basis over a period of time with no loss in takehome pay.

Meany made these other main points in response to questions from Stanley Levey and Paul Niven of CBS News and John A. Grimes of the Wall Street Journal:

- Organized labor would prefer an "across-the-board" approach to doubletime pay for overtime work rather than the "limited" approach proposed by the Administration through industry-by-industry studies.

The idea, Meany said, is "to prevent overtime," to put such a "premium" on it as to discourage employers from using it instead of rehiring laid-off workers.

- He supports Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther in his position that the auto industry in this year's bargaining can grant substantial improvements to its workers without increasing prices.

"It may mean a little less profit . . . a little less reserve," Meany said, but Reuther's evidence on current profits and reserves "sounds pretty convincing, and I hope he is able to convince the automobile manufacturers as well as he has me."

- He has no present plans to retire as president of the AFL-CIO because he feels "quite well" and looks forward "to going on for a few years, anyway."

If ill health forced him to consider retirement, Meany said, he would "of necessity" consider possible successors and "there are a number of trade union leaders in this country that I feel would be qualified to take over."

- He feels "very comfortable" in his relations with Pres. Johnson and as an American feels "a great deal of pride" in the way the President effected a smooth transition in succeeding the slain Pres. Kennedy "at a time of national tragedy, when we could very well have had chaos."

"That doesn't mean I am always going to agree with him," Meany said, "any more than I always agreed with Pres. Kennedy."

Merger Discussed By Shoe Unions

Bal Harbour, Fla. — Talks leading to the possible merger of two unions in the shoe manufacturing industry have been initiated here under the guidance of AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky.

The merger conversations have been under way during the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting here between representatives of the Boot & Shoe Workers Union and the United Shoe Workers of America, with the aid of Lane Kirkland and James Gildea, assistants to federation Pres. George Meany.

Future meetings have been scheduled for the latter part of March.

Labor Program 'Essential':

Council Sees 3.5 Million Jobs In Overtime, Workweek Plan

Bal Harbour, Fla.—An across-the-board reduction in the workweek to 35 hours and double-time pay for overtime can provide an estimated 3.5 million jobs, a major step toward solving the nation's number one problem of sustained unemployment, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

Economic developments over the past year "reinforce our conviction," the council said, that these two measures are essential to solve the "tremendous challenge" of providing more than 80,000 jobs a week for the rest of the 1960's to achieve and sustain full employment.

"The only socially responsible answer to organized labor's drive for a reduction of working hours is the practical achievement of job opportunities, at decent pay, for all Americans who are able and willing to work," the council stressed.

It also declared:

"The AFL-CIO—the organized voice of the nation's working people—has no other alternative than to seek a cut in working hours and increase in overtime pay" as long as the nation fails to reach full employment through different measures.

The shorter workweek and higher overtime pay drive must be viewed in terms of economic developments, the council said, presenting this analysis:

- Unemployment continued its decade-long upward trend in 1963 despite a $30 billion increase in total national production.
- The tax cut will prevent a sharp rise in unemployment this year but next year, as the economic stimulus of the reduction wears off, there is a possibility "of a renewed upward movement of unemployment."
- Approximately 3 to 4 million new jobs are needed now to achieve full employment based on unemployment and under-employment last year.
- An additional 1.4 million new jobs are required each year to provide for the growing labor force.
- About 2.5 million new jobs are needed annually to offset the displacement effect of increasing productivity.
- All of this adds up to "the staggering requirement of over 4 million new job opportunities each year through the remainder of this decade—more than 80,000 jobs a week. . ."

500,000 New Jobs Per Hour

In terms of reducing the workweek, the council statement said, every one-hour cut for fulltime wage and salary workers would provide a conservative estimate of 500,000 new jobs; a reduction from the present 40 hours to 35 hours would provide 2.5 million jobs.

On overtime, an increase from time and one-half—the present legal rate—to double time would add an estimated 450,000 new factory jobs and about 1 million jobs in all.

On the question of the cost of reducing the workweek, the council noted that the price to the employer "is essentially similar to the cost of any wage increase "and if the reduction of the standard workweek is spread over several years, "the needed increase in hourly wages can be absorbed out of the rise in productivity without a general increase of unit labor costs."

Profits, Productivity Up

The statement pointed out that productivity has been rising at the rapid rate of 3.5 percent in the past three years and profits are at record-breaking heights. Most companies, the council added, "should find little or no cost problem in a gradual reduction of working hours over the next several years."

On the overtime problem, the council said that the present penalty rate is no longer "fully effective" in discouraging employers from scheduling overtime, and that in 1963 of all hours worked in manufacturing, 7 percent were overtime hours. Complete elimination of industrial overtime could create about 900,000 jobs.

But, the council added, if only half the present overtime were eliminated, there would be about 450,000 new jobs plus those in the non-manufacturing sector, or about 1 million.

Commenting on Pres. Johnson's proposal to establish increased overtime rates by tripartite committees on an industry-by-industry basis, the council said it is "not adequate." It would impose "a potentially legalistic and time-consuming procedure which some employers would certainly seek to transform into an absolute roadblock," the council warned.

This procedure would also raise the problem of different industrial boards possibly creating "grave inequities between industrial wage levels." The answer, said the council, is amendment of the Fair Labor Standards Act to increase overtime pay to double time for all working hours that "exceed the act's standard workweek."

200,000 Lost Jobs Seen If Works Program Dies

Bal Harbour, Fla.—If the accelerated public works program is allowed to expire, 200,000 jobs the program is currently providing will vanish, the AFL-CIO warned in a plea to Pres. Johnson to urge Congress to extend the program.

The federation's Executive Council called for action by the President "with a mounting sense of urgency," pointing out that all funds provided by the 1962 legislation have been committed and projects completed, but that "a huge backlog" of public works remains.

A new federal appropriation of $2 billion for public works, the council declared in a statement, plus $1 billion in matching state and local government funds will directly create about 300,000 on-site and off-site jobs, "many of them for unskilled and semi-skilled workers who are the chief victims of automation."

An indirect dividend would be 150,000 to 300,000 additional jobs from the purchasing power of those employed on the projects and in the production and distribution of materials.

Reviewing the history of the program since it was signed into law by Pres. Kennedy in September 1962, the council said 6,000 projects have been undertaken in 3,000 communities hit hardest by unemployment. These projects, when completed, will have a total value of about $1.5 billion.

"These are tangible benefits," the council declared, helping greatly to improve the public facilities of depressed communities and putting thousands of Americans to work at useful jobs. The statement concluded:

"The need is imperative. The President and Congress must act. The unemployed today, and those who will otherwise be unemployed tomorrow, deserve no less."

Most Disputes Cases Settled by Mediation

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Continuing successful mediation of internal disputes was reported by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, with two-thirds of the cases filed settled without the necessity of a determination by the impartial umpire.

Since the effective date of the plan—known as Article XXI of the federation's constitution—on Jan. 1, 1962, there have been 265 complaints or claims filed, with 150 settled through mediation or by mutual agreement. Mediation is still in progress in 29 cases.

There have been 74 determinations by the impartial umpire and 7 fact-finding reports, and 5 cases are still pending before him. Of the 74 determinations, violations of the Internal Disputes Plan were found in 55 cases. Appeals were made in 27 cases with 23 resulting in denial by the Executive Council subcommittee handling the appeals, one referred to the council and two pending.

There have been 15 complaints of noncompliance with the umpire's determinations. The subcommittee achieved compliance in eight cases, three are pending and noncompliance was found in four. Two unions are involved in the latter category in two cases each—the Journeymen Stonecutters Association and the National Maritime Union, and sanctions are in effect for these organizations.

The council named two additional impartial umpires to help handle disputes cases—Dr. Philip Taft, professor of economics at Brown University and labor historian, and Saul Wallen of Boston, a widely known arbitrator.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told reporters that the disputes plan originally called for a panel of umpires but that to date all cases had been handled by David L. Cole. The additional umpires will ease some of Cole's burdens, Meany said. He added that he will assign the umpires to the cases as they arise.

Meany also announced the members of a special subcommittee to study the section of the disputes plan dealing with established work sites, a study voted by the 1963 convention. The federation president will head the group, which will include Vice President Joseph A. Beirne and Peter T. Schoemann.

The council acted in one case before it, a claim for justification for action that would otherwise violate article XXI. It ruled that the Air Line Pilots Association has justification in attempting to organize and represent stewards and stewardesses who are currently represented by the Transport Workers Union.

Council Presses Attack on Joblessness

Stresses Hours Cut, Doubletime Penalty

in one way or another on the poverty-and-jobs issue, including declarations on civil rights, education, higher minimum wages and extension of coverage, strengthened unemployment compensation and hospital care for the aged.

In addition to these areas covered in the early sessions, the council took these positions:

- Called for bold measures and substantial funds to achieve meaningful progress in the war on poverty while hailing Pres. Johnson's "forthrightness and courage" in challenging the nation to end "this ugly blight." (Story Page 1.)
- Declared a cut in the workweek to 35 hours and double time for overtime could provide an estimated 3.5 million jobs, a major step toward solving unemployment. (Story Page 2.)

Automation Probe Sought

- Urged a full-scale national investigation of the impact of automation to establish the "needed balance" between the technological revolution and the adjustments to automation that must be adopted if the country "is to endure without vast disruption." (Story Page 5.)
- Warned that expiration of the accelerated public works program would wipe out 200,000 jobs and pleaded with the Administration to extend it. (Story Page 2.)
- Called for passage of the pending Youth Employment Opportunities bill as an essential part of the program to eradicate poverty, with the program to be supervised by civilians. (Story Page 5.)

In the international area the council adopted statements:

- Warning that economic or political policies which help make any Communist dictatorship "fat and strong" are "suicidal" and will embolden the current Soviet "peace offensive," which is in reality a breathing spell to allow the Communists to consolidate their position. (Story Page 4.)
- Urging the U.S. Government to review and discuss with the Panamanian Government the issues stemming from the treaty governing the Panama Canal so that a solution can be reached to these "most urgent" problems. (Story Page 4.)
- Terming the decision of the United Kingdom and other western nations to renounce the boycott of Cuba a source of "grave concern" because the Communist-ruled island regime was beginning to show signs of "economic deterioration." (Story Page 4.)
- Urging the U.S. to take the initiative in extending the concept of international fair labor standards through the United Nations and the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade meetings scheduled for this year. (Story Page 5.)

In other actions the council:

- Urged House passage of a bill to establish a National Council on the Arts and a National Art Foundation. (Story this page.)
- Called for pay increases for government employes in line with the principle of comparability with private industry pledged in earlier legislation. (Story Page 4.)

Senior Citizen Group Backed

- Reaffirmed its Oct. 10, 1961, resolution supporting the National Council of Senior Citizens for Health Care Through Social Security, declaring its purposes to be "entirely consistent with the policies of the AFL-CIO," and urging affiliates to cooperate with the organization.
- Called for an investigation of the impact of multi-company ownership of crude oil and oil products pipelines by the government in terms of the effect of the ownership on the consumer.
- Voiced support for strikes involving the Office Workers and the Intl. Book Exchange; the Clothing Workers and H. I. Siegel Co.; the printing trades unions at Kingsport press.
- Urged the government to name one of its Polaris submarines for Samuel Gompers, first president and founder of the AFL.
- Announced support of the Afro-Asian Institute by AFL-CIO affiliates of $100,000 a year for two years, with unions providing scholarships for the education of Asian and African trade union leaders at the institute in Tel Aviv.
- Set the next council meeting for Washington on May 18-20 and scheduled the summer meeting for Chicago Aug. 3-6.

JOINT DECLARATION stressing the need to maintain the bonds uniting free world unions was signed by Gen. Sec. Andre Bergeron (speaking) of the French Confederation of Labor (Force Ouvriere) and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, with the Executive Council witnessing the ceremony.

Bold Measures and Ample Funds Seen Needed in War on Poverty

magnitude of poverty remaining in the U.S.—the fact that 35 million Americans still live in families with incomes of under $3,000 before taxes"—the statement continued, but that "progress towards eradicating this cancer has slowed down almost to a halt in the past decade of spreading unemployment and under-employment."

The council stressed that "success in winning civil rights and dignity for Negroes and other minority groups is inseparably linked with our success in effectively waging war against want."

Noting that the President's war-on-poverty pledge has aroused "substantial public interest," the council commented that "if we really mean to wage this war, victory will not come easily."

"Offensive must be mounted on many fronts," it added. "Long-entrenched attitude must change. A vast amount of money will have to be expended."

In its analysis of the nature of the problem, the council noted that from early New Deal days until the mid-1950s "substantial progress was made in lifting the incomes of our neediest families," but that since the mid-1950s "the portion of our families still improverished has remained practically stationary."

This is rooted in the spread of joblessness, the council said, and in government policies "excessively concerned with the welfare of corporations and the already well-off, rather than the needs of our fellow citizens most in want."

Studies of poverty reveal that over half of the families affected "have members who are employed or seeking work," but can find jobs only in low-wage fields.

Reasons for Joblessness

Of those who are unemployed, their joblessness is traceable to displacement due to automation, discrimination, lack of skills "or simply because jobs are not available."

Persons 65 or older head the families of almost one-third of the neediest. One-quarter of the most impoverished families are without any breadwiner because of disability, death, desertion or old age. Non-white Americans comprise over 20 percent of those most in want. Most of the poorest can be found in metropolitan area slums and in the large number of distressed industrial and rural areas.

Adequate measures to "immediately alleviate human suffering are imperative," the council declared. But while these humanitarian efforts are pursued, steps dealing with root causes are critically needed.

Measures needed to create jobs, the council said, include "a vast increase in federal outlays for job-creating public works," youth employment programs and effective adjustment procedures to the labor-displacement and community disruption of automation, defense cutbacks and — frequently — foreign imports.

Special measures to assist the jobless, such as an improved unemployment compensation system, a national manpower program, a more effective national public employment service, fair employment practices legislation and a stronger area redevelopment effort, are also required, it stated.

Higher Minimum Asked

Among programs to lift the wages of low-paid workers, the council said that extension of the minimum wage and an increase in the hourly rate "are essential." There should be special aid for the "tragically exploited farm workers."

The government must also "vigorously support" the right of all workers to organize and sustain effective unions and to engage in collective bargaining, the council declared. It pointed out that poverty is usually most prevalent among groups in which union organization is weak or non-existent and in areas where trade unionism is compelled to function against the handicap of hostile state legislation.

The war on poverty, the council stressed, must include aid against hazards of old age, desertion, illness and death. Adequate income protection must be provided for those who cannot be self-sustaining even in a full-employment economy, it said, and special aids are necessary, including a hospital insurance program for the aged under social security and increased social security benefits.

Benefit and coverage levels of all state social insurance and welfare programs, it continued, must be brought up to date, including higher payments to meet family needs in the 1960s; federal standards to upgrade the workmen's compensation system of the states; and an insurance program for workers whose income is cut off by illness.

In education, housing and personal adjustment, the council said, increased and improved opportunities must be made available to the children of the poor if the cycle of poverty is to be broken.

There is need for a vast increase in the quality of education, health-care, low-cost public housing, consumer counselling and personal guidance service for members of low-income families, the council statement noted.

The council concluded that a successful war against poverty will do much for American Negroes, "because they are such a disproportionately large part of our families still in want." By taking the steps necessary to end poverty "we will create the conditions and climate that will enable us to end more quickly the ugly fact of discrimination in American life."

50c Assessment Voted For Memorial Funds

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO General Board has approved a voluntary assessment program of 2.5 cents per member per month for 20 months as labor's contribution to the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation and the John F. Kennedy Library.

The assessment program is expected to raise between $5 and $6 million dollars, with $2 million earmarked for the Kennedy library and the rest for the Eleanor Roosevelt memorial.

The action had been recommended to the board by the federation's Executive Council as a method of pooling the drives to perpetuate the memories and the work of two great Americans and warm friends of the labor movement.

AFL-CIO affiliates will determine how the assessment will be handled, whether through international or national union treasuries, through local union funds or through direct membership fund-raising. The assessment will be effective Mar. 1, 1964, and run through October 1965.

Federal Aid to Arts Seen Nurturing Native Talent

Bal Harbour, Fla.—House passage of a bill to establish a National Council on the Arts and a National Arts Foundation was strongly urged by the AFL-CIO. The measure has already been adopted by the Senate.

"We firmly believe," the Executive Council said, "that our government does have a responsibility, long recognized in the old world, to help sustain the cultural arts."

The House bill introduced by Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N. J.) would, the council said, conserve "national human resources by aiding talents in music and the other arts; implement the government's responsibility to help keep arts and artists alive as essential contributors to our nation's heritage," and help make available to Americans everywhere the cultural contributions now limited chiefly to large urban centers.

Housing Plan Supported As 'Minimum'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Prompt approval of Pres. Johnson's program for housing and community development was urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council as a "first and minimum step" toward aiding in the reduction of poverty and improving the housing of the one-fifth of the nation which now lives in slums or sub-standard dwellings.

To overcome the deficiency and meet rising needs for good housing, the council said, construction "must be kept at a minimum annual rate of 2.5 million units per year" over the next 12 years.

The council noted that housing represents over 40 percent of all new construction and that housing outlays constitute nearly one-sixth of the total gross national product. New housing stimulates other economic activity, it noted, and can be a "potent generator of employment" and a prime weapon to combat joblessness.

The council reiterated its call for prevailing wage levels and other protective labor standards for all workers engaged in any housing program involving federal financial assistance. It also stressed an end to discrimination in any form in access to government financed housing.

It urged support also for a cabinet-level Dept. of Housing and Community Development, as proposed by the President, as essential to provide national leadership and coordination to all housing & community development activities and to translate local initiative into community development action.

SOLID FRONT of sea and waterfront unions was organized during the Bal Harbour, Fla., meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Board to combat deviation from presidential "commitment" that 50 percent of grain shipments to Russia be made in U.S.-flag vessels. Shown at a press conference are, from left, Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers, Pres. Joseph N. Curran of the National Maritime Union and Pres. Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen.

Agreement Reached On Wheat Shipping

country will respect, and properly, only policies and procedures which are established in this way."

Meany's reply, telegraphed from Bal Harbour, Fla., where the AFL-CIO Executive Council was in session, stated that "under the plan for future meetings" worked out with Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, he had met with the top officers of the ILA, the Seafarers and the National Maritime Union "and have urged them in keeping with the program outlined by Sec. Wirtz to resume work on the cargoes in question."

Meany said that ILA Pres. Thomas W. Gleason, SIU Pres. Paul Hall and NMU Pres. Joseph Curran agreed to the request "and in so doing it is my feeling they have acted in the best interest of the nation as well as the best interest of their own membership."

"It is my view," the telegram continued, "that this controversy has served to focus attention on certain serious problems adversely affecting the welfare of American seamen. I am confident that the program and procedures that have been worked out to resolve this dispute will be instrumental in helping to solve these problems."

President Hails Decision

The White House announcement of the agreement gave no details, but a spokesman said "the President regards this decision by the unions as a responsible move on the part of American labor" and that he had extended his thanks and congratulations to Meany by telephone.

At a news conference in Bal Harbour as the Executive Council wound up its mid-winter meeting, Meany expressed support for the maritime unions' stand that they are entitled to handle at least 50 percent of the wheat shipments, including those to the Soviet satellite countries.

He also called for extensive government examination of problems posed by "our deteriorating merchant marine" and the wide use of foreign-flag shipping. Noting that American seamen, in long years of struggle, have won better wages and working conditions, he said they are now being deprived of employment as companies use foreign flag ships.

The labor boycott of the wheat shipments to the Soviet Union was begun by the ILA, with the backing of the two seamen's unions, over what was regarded as failure of U.S. agencies and commercial grain shippers to live up to a "commitment" that 50 percent of the grain cargoes would be carried by American-flag vessels.

Waiver Criticized

The unions charged that a waiver departing from the 50 percent formula was granted to one of the traders, Continental Grain Co., in violation of "the pledge given by the late Pres. Kennedy."

Following the exchange of telegrams by Johnson and Meany, Gleason announced he was wiring all ILA vice presidents at Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports to inform them that the ban on loading wheat for shipment to the Soviet Union had ended.

Council Backs Boycott:

Allies' Cuban Stand Cause of 'Concern'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The decision of the United Kingdom and "other allies" in renouncing a boycott of Cuba is a source of "grave concern" because the shipment of materials and equipment to the island comes at a time when "economic deterioration" was beginning to affect the stability of its Communist regime, the AFL-CIO declared.

The AFL-CIO has never objected, the Executive Council said, to the shipment of food and medicines "to spare the suffering of innocent people in Cuba." But the sale and shipment of other materials is to be deplored, it asserted.

The Communist regime in Cuba is now acting as the model of "agitation, infiltration and subversion for all other Latin American countries," the council declared, with the objective of developing a "broad split" between the U.S. and Latin America as the first step toward imposition of Communist totalitarian regimes.

The council warned that Cuba's Castro is attempting to win support by exploiting "misguided nationalists in collusion with unscrupulous politicians hungry for power." It voiced support for the "firm stand" taken by Pres. Johnson during the Guantanamo Naval Base water incident, adding that "any weakening of this resolute stand would embolden Castro to attempt further and graver provocations."

Noting that there are a number of inter-American treaties ratified by nations in the Organization of American States to cope with the present Cuban danger, the council warned "these treaties must be invoked and action taken before it is too late."

Military dictatorships and other reactionary regimes "only tend to prepare the ground for Communist subversion and success," the statement stressed, urging elimination of social and economic injustices that "provide fertile soil for the operations of Communists and other demagogues."

But vigorous political and diplomatic steps must be taken also, the council noted, to stop the growing number of saboteurs and undercover agents, "the increasing volume of arms and guerilla techniques being exported by Cuba to countries throughout the Western Hemisphere and other areas."

Finally, the council said, "the AFL-CIO rejects any suggestion coming from any quarter to accept the Communist dictatorship in Cuba as an irreversible event in history and to accept coexistence with it." The Cuban people must be aided to regain their liberty and elect a government of their own free choice, the statement said.

U. S.-Panama Parleys Urged in Canal Dispute

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO urged the U.S. government to review and discuss with the Panamanian government the issues stemming from the treaty governing the use of the Panama Canal, declaring the solution of these problems is "most urgent."

The federation's Executive Council adopted a statement on Panama declaring that the recent events in the Central American country are a test of "our policy of true equality and inter-American solidarity."

The statement called for discussions and negotiations through normal diplomatic channels "and not under the threat of street demonstrations" to normalize political, social and economic relations. The council deplored flag-flying incidents in the Canal Zone and the violation of a joint flag-flying agreement by U.S. citizens living in the Zone.

It supported the stand taken by the Administration "in not allowing itself to be stampeded into any rash action of reprisal," adding that the U.S. must not permit privileged American interests in the Zone "or the special privileged oligarchy in the Republic of Panama" to exploit the difficulties that have arisen.

The council welcomed the good-will intervention of the Organization of American States and its special investigating committee, expressing the hope that it will determine the true facts that led to the "tragic incidents" of Jan. 9—the flag-raising which touched off street rioting and violence.

The statement noted that as early as January 1949, U.S. and Latin-American trade unionists investigated conditions in the Canal Zone and made recommendations later approved by the Executive Council of the AFL—including a policy of equal pay for equal work and extension of welfare benefits and opportunities to all workers in the zone, especially to those of Panamanian nationality. The council added:

"Although a number of these recommendations have since been partially adopted, this has, in many instances, been only a token rather than a complete fulfillment of the legitimate Panamanian aspirations."

Council Backs Speedy Rise in Federal Pay

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Pay increases for government employes should be quickly adopted by Congress, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared, in line with the principle of reasonable comparability with private industry pledged in earlier legislation.

The council supported also the program of government employe unions for retirement with full benefits after 30 years of service regardless of age, higher contributions by the government to health benefits and life insurance programs, and retention of at least 50 percent of life insurance coverage for employes at age 65.

It backed the drive for adoption of a 35-hour workweek in government and elimination of speed-up practices now in effect, and endorsed full overtime benefits for substitute workers in the postal service.

The council stressed that "continued improvement in labor-management relations in the federal government must be sought" and that while union membership in federal agencies continues to "grow at an encouraging pace," the need for wider organization continues.

Policies Aiding Reds Viewed as 'Suicidal'

Pres. Johnson's proposals to the Geneva disarmament sessions, declaring his program would reduce the danger of nuclear war. It welcomed also the President's plan to strengthen the peace-keeping machinery of the United Nations to avoid wars arising from territorial disputes, and urged the Administration to speed the establishment of a NATO multilateral atomic force which would "increase the defense capabilities of the free world and improve the prospects for world peace."

Recognition Opposed

The council called for rejection of any attempts by the Communist East German regime to secure recognition and urged the U.S. and its allies to stay out of negotiations "for direct or indirect agreements" between West Berlin and the Communists. The statement also urged a high priority for removal of the Berlin Wall and maintenance of American military forces in Germany and Berlin at adequate strength.

The council reiterated American labor's "firm opposition" to diplomatic recognition of the Chinese Communist regime and its admission to the UN. It added:

"We pledge our full support to all measures which the administration may find necessary for safeguarding the independence and freedom of South Vietnam and the other peoples of Southeast Asia."

In an analysis of the Soviet "peace offensive," the council noted that such an "offensive" has come about whenever the Communists needed a breathing spell to consolidate their position "and dull the vigilance" of the forces opposing them.

The present "offensive" started after the Soviet defeat in the Caribbean at the hands of Pres. Kennedy, but stemmed also from the strain on Soviet economic resources and the failure of its agricultural policies, which have led to its "current serious food crisis."

Economy in Trouble

The council declared that "the USSR is today in great need of western credits and deliveries to enable it to overcome its serious economic predicament."

The Soviet Union also needs more time, said the council, "to defeat the Peiping (Chinese) threat to its primacy in the Communist world."

In reality, the council warned, the Soviet "peace offensive" is a "devious but unrelenting 'offensive' against peace and democracy," citing its activities in Southeast Asia, Africa and Latin America and its attempts to secure western acceptance of its postwar annexations and control over its European satellites by a proposed "non-aggression" pact between NATO and the Warsaw Pact powers.

Senate Action Asked On Davis-Bacon

Employers who do not pay fringe benefits have an "unfair advantage" in bidding on federal construction contracts, the AFL-CIO charged in a letter urging Senate approval of the House-passed Davis-Bacon fringe benefit bill.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller pointed out in a letter to Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.) that fringes such as health, welfare, insurance and pension plans "scarcely existed" when the Davis-Bacon bill was enacted in 1931 to protect area labor standards in bidding on government construction.

Biemiller supported the fringe benefit statement filed previously by Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the Building & Construction Trades Dept.

'Social and Economic Impact':

Probe of Automation Urged on Congress

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A "full-scale national investigation of the social and economic impact of automation" is an immediate necessity, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared, urging prompt action by Congress to establish a commission to do the job.

An automation commission, the council declared in a statement, "could begin to establish the needed balance" between the technological revolution and the adjustments to automation that must be adopted if the country "is to endure without vast disruption."

The commission would be composed of leaders in industry, labor and the executive and legislative branches of the government, the council proposed, with power to take testimony under oath and to subpoena witnesses.

This proposed body could promote the establishment of a technical clearing house to gather information about impending techological change, and a federal information and guidance service to assist unions and employers in collective bargaining solutions to the problems of automation.

As to the scope of the problem, the council said:

"Automation is displacing thousands of jobs each week, while the labor force is growing at a stepped-up pace. It is destroying hard-earned skills. It is relocating plants and industries. It is disrupting entire communities. And with unemployment at persistently high levels, it is affecting race relations, labor-management relations and many other aspects of American life."

The government has "encouraged and subsidized the spread of automation," the council asserted, noting the billions of dollars spent in tax write-offs for new plants and machines, tax investment credit for new equipment, and numerous research and development subsidies. The statement added:

"But there has been little corresponding concern for the disruptive and dislocating effects of automation on workers and their communities."

The proposed commission could recommend economic policies that would make the new technology "consistent with the goals of the Employment Act of 1946," the council said, as well as examine training, worker relocation, investment and other programs adopted by other nations to meet similar problems.

By bringing together in the commission "the ablest men in public and private life," the statement noted, there would be created "a more general awareness of the human consequences of technological change and do much to make such change smoother, more orderly and humane."

This commission could help the nation "realize the great promise of the new technology while avoiding the kind of social havoc which followed in the wake of the first industrial revolution," the council added.

PROBLEMS OF HEALTH CARE were discussed before the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting by Dr. Caldwell B. Esselstyn, chairman of the board of directors of the Group Health Association of America and executive director of the Rip Van Winkle Clinic, Hudson, N.Y.

Board Approves Pooled Fund For 'Socially Desirable' Housing

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A plan to allow AFL-CIO unions and labor-management welfare, pension or retirement plans to pool their funds in a mortgage investment trust to create socially desirable housing projects, provide additional employment in the construction trades and bring higher returns to the unions and contributing funds has been approved by the AFL-CIO General Board.

The board, composed of representatives of all affiliates and departments as well as members of the Executive Council, acted on a recommendation of the council to set up the mortgage investment trust and an auxiliary housing corporation. The latter would provide seed money and encourage local non-profit sponsors in the development of lower income housing.

The trust is estimated to have a multi-billion dollar potential based on estimates of the assets of union funds and jointly administered labor-management welfare and pension funds. The immediate objective is to secure investments from affiliates and funds of about $100 million.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the pooling arrangement would allow small unions and welfare and pension funds to participate in federally-insured mortgage investment programs under the same arrangements as now used by larger unions, notably the Ladies' Garment Workers and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The mortgage investment trust, he commented, was contemplated when the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Investment Counseling was set up three years ago under the direction of Alexander Bookstaver.

"Now is the time to create the pool," he said.

Benefits Spelled Out

The statement adopted by the council and approved by the board said the participating unions and funds, as well as organized labor as a whole, would benefit from the plan in this way:

"The pooling of funds would provide a medium to create socially desirable housing projects and at the same time create additional employment in the construction trades and allied industries that provide material, furnishings, appliances and other necessities for these new developments.

"Through the lending of seed money to local non-profit housing corporations sponsored by labor or other public interest organizations, housing for moderate income and elderly members of participating organizations would be financed with below-market interest rate loans from government funds, to permit substantially lower rents than now charged in regularly financed housing projects.

"A massive attack would be made on America's tremendous unmet housing needs.

"A higher interest return would be obtained on investments in government-insured and guaranteed mortgage loans than on investments in government or other bonds with the highest degree of safety."

Trustees to Govern

The trust will be governed by a board of trustees of 10 members to be selected from the participating organizations. The board would select a manager for the trust to deal with mortgage bankers and bank officials to acquire and service mortgages in different parts of the country.

The non-profit housing seed money corporation would be organized with the trustees acting in a dual capacity as corporate directors to support the initiation of non-profit rental housing for moderate income and elderly families.

The trust, the statement stressed, "provides an ideal vehicle for the investing, with the full guarantee of the U.S. government, of funds that must not be handled in a speculative manner yet should earn the highest possible interest return, putting them to a practical and useful social purpose."

The board action authorized the creation of the trust and the auxiliary housing corporation. It instructed Meany to name a council committee to implement the resolution as soon as possible and encourage all affiliates and welfare plans to participate and to publicize the policies and benefits of the program throughout the trade union movement.

U. S. Initiative Urged In Standards Fight

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The U.S. should take the initiative in extending the concept of international fair labor standards through the United Nations and the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade (GATT) meetings scheduled for this year, the AFL-CIO declared.

Both the UN Conference on Trade & Development meeting in March at Geneva and the GATT negotiations opening in May present the opportunity for establishing the principle that "no nation has the right to base international trade competition on labor exploitation," the Executive Council said.

Procedures should be adopted by international agencies to ensure that "wages and working conditions in each country reflect a fair share of advances in productivity and technology," the council declared.

"Only fair standards, with effective enforcement machinery, will assure continued access to world markets for all nations," it added.

The concept of international fair labor standards was proposed originally by U.S. labor representatives in the mid-1940s, based on the idea that while standards are not the same in each country, there must be a general standard with a mechanism available to insure improvement through fact-finding and international confrontation.

The answer, said the council, "is an international, many-sided agreement to make sure that the workers in both the developing and developed nations share in industrial progress and that competition not be based on labor exploitation."

Tugmen's Walkout Backed by Council

Bal Harbour, Fla.—All AFL-CIO affiliates were urged to extend their "full cooperation and support" to Local 333, United Marine Div. of the National Maritime Union, which has been on strike against New York tugboat operators since Feb. 1.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, in a statement issued here, termed the strike "a legitimate trade union action" caused by the employers' refusal to pay adequate wages or "to give fair consideration to other issues, including overtime pay, wage differentials and certain working conditions."

Civilian Rule Urged Under Youth Job Bill

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Passage of the Youth Employment Opportunities bill is an essential part of the program to eradicate poverty, the AFL-CIO declared, but youth programs stemming from such legislation should be directed, managed and supervised by civilians.

The Executive Council said the concept of the National Youth Administration of the 1930s should be adapted to present needs

Endorsing the program of providing young people with job opportunities, work experience and training in job skills, the council objected to reported administration consideration placing all or some of the youth programs under the Dept. of Defense.

"'We firmly reject any such proposal," the council emphasized, stressing the need for civilian supervision, and adding: "Top sergeants are no substitute for teachers."

Henry J. Kaiser to Get Murray-Green Award

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The 1965 Murray-Green Award will be presented to Henry J. Kaiser "for his outstanding contributions to the health and welfare of the community—particularly in voluntary medical care, housing and labor-management-community relations," the AFL-CIO Executive Council announced.

The award highlighted adoption of a Community Services Committee report which included exploration of the possibilities of developing projects to bring legal services to low-income families and cooperation with the National Urban League in an experimental program of training league people in community leadership.

The 1964 Murray-Green Award will be presented posthumously to Sen. Estes Kefauver of Tennessee in Miami Beach on May 7 as part of the community services' National Conference on Financing Voluntary Health & Welfare Services. The committee report recommended that the theme of the 1965 national conference be "consumer counseling."

The Executive Council approved, on recommendation of the committee, a statement on the shorter workweek and the constructive use of leisure time which recommended:

- Development of visual and educational materials and programs on the use of free time.
- Planning and conducting of state and regional conferences on free time.
- Support of appropriate legislative action to provide cultural and recreational facilities and opportunities.
- A suggestion of possible programs for international and national unions and state and local central bodies of a specific educational, cultural recreational or service nature.

COPE-Backed Democrat Wins

San Francisco—Philip Burton, a Democrat running with COPE endorsement, won election to Congress by polling 52 percent of the vote in a seven-man race here.

The special election was held for the seat vacated by Rep. John F. Shelley (D) after his election as mayor of San Francisco.

Burton, a member of the state legislature, outpolled four other Democrats and three Republicans in his first-ballot victory.

The War on Poverty

THE AFL-CIO has long sought to focus public attention on the paradox of poverty in the midst of America's plenty. We have spelled out steps which must be taken to end it and we have sought to implement this program through both public and private action.

Our concern is not only the magnitude of poverty remaining in the United States—the fact that 35 million Americans still live in families with incomes of under $3,000, before tax. We are even more concerned because progress towards eradication of this cancer has slowed down almost to a halt in the past decade of spreading unemployment and under-employment.

What is more, success in winning civil rights and dignity for Negroes and other minority groups is inseparably linked with our success in effectively waging war against want.

Pres. Johnson must now reverse nearly 10 years of stagnation in the effort to reduce the prevalance of poverty. Moreover, the Administration's anti-poverty campaign in 1964 must be viewed as hardly a first, small step. Bold measures and substantial funds will have to be added to achieve meaningful progress in this worthy national crusade.

No nation in the history of the world has a greater capability of lifting all of its people above the level of want. The test we now face is our will to do it.

If we now engage in merely a token effort—a mere skirmish instead of a war—we will be deluding the millions of impoverished and frustrating the expectations of the nation and of the world.

ON THE OTHER HAND, the victory that will result from a genuine crusade will not only benefit those now in want. It will increase the self-respect and well-being of every American and it will give added meaning to the reality of the American way of life.

Pres. Johnson's pledge to lead the nation in unconditional war on poverty lays down a long overdue challenge to the conscience of the American people. Already substantial public interest has been aroused but, if we really mean to wage this war, victory will not come easily. Offensives must be mounted on many fronts. Long-entrenched attitudes must change. A vast amount of effort and money will have to be expended.

Action to achieve employment opportunities at decent wages for all Americans able and willing to work must be viewed as the primary underpinning of the anti-poverty program. This is true not only because so many impoverished families have a member who is, or could be, employed and because the possession of a decent job is the best way to raise their income status and personal dignity. In addition, the restoration of a full-employment, maximum-production economy is also of paramount importance because as we rapidly raise our national income by effectively utilizing now-wasted resources, America will be even more able to meet the social costs of its anti-poverty crusade on every front.

Meany Outlines Labor's Case In Seeking 35-Hour Workweek

Following is a partial transcript of remarks by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany on the 35-hour workweek as he was interviewed Feb. 23 on "Face the Nation," CBS television program, by Paul Niven and Stanley Levey of CBS News and John A. Grimes of the Wall Street Journal:

MEANY: . . . I think that as time goes on, more and more people are beginning to realize that in meeting this problem of unemployment—the nation's number one economic problem—you are not going to meet it by one factor alone.

The best answer to our arguments for the 35-hour week is an economy which provides work for everybody who is able and willing to work. That is the best answer.

We realize the tax cut should give an incentive to business, because it is going to pour a certain amount of additional purchasing power into the economic life of the nation, and this is what makes jobs.

But we have a situation in this country where corporations are expanding. In the past when corporations expanded, they used their profits—plowed them back in and expanded their business—produced more. This meant more jobs. Unfortunately, this is not true today . . . If they plow back a certain amount of money, they expand their production, but they reduce the number of jobs. . . .

In 10 years we have not gained a single employe in this country on a full-time basis in private profit industries.

There are less people working today for private profit on a full-time basis than there were 10 years ago—this despite a tremendous increase in the labor force. The increase has been in government and part-time employes. So this stands out as a very disturbing fact.

GRIMES: Do you think that a 35-hour week will help cure this problem?

MEANY: Yes.

GRIMES: But won't it raise other problems? Labor Dept. figures show that "moonlighting" is on the increase.

MEANY: There will be problems, the problem of what to do with leisure time and so forth. But we certainly should not shy away from meeting the number one problem of the country because it is going to create some smaller problems. Anything you do in this nation will always create other problems. . . .

We feel that over a period of time if the workweek could be reduced with no loss of takehome pay—on a step-by-step basis, of course—and with constantly increasing unit production, we would be able to absorb these costs and wind up in a few years with 5 or 6 million more jobs.

GRIMES: As part of your 35-hour week campaign, you also want Congress to pass legislation calling for doubletime pay for overtime in all of industry. The Administration has a proposal that calls for setting up industry committees that will determine on an individual basis what industries should pay the doubletime. Do you find this approach satisfactory?

MEANY: . . . We would prefer very much an across-the-board approach to this problem. Bear in mind that the idea of doubletime for overtime and time-and-one-half for overtime from the very inception was to prevent overtime. We don't want overtime. . . .

WE HAVE a situation today where employers have laid off a number of employes in a slack period. When business revives, instead of putting back these employes, who have seniority and a right to come back, they work present employes overtime, because they feel, somehow or other, this is more convenient to do. This is a practice that we would like to get out of. We would like to see those employes who have been furloughed or laid off brought back. . . .

LEVEY: Do you notice any change in the government's position on this 35-hour question? It seems to me a year ago, when Mr. [W. Willard] Wirtz [Secretary of Labor] was here at your Executive Council meeting, he seemed equally opposed to a shorter workweek as the result of collective bargaining or as a result of law. This year he seems to be indicating that if unions want to go out and get the 35-hour week at the bargaining table, that is okay with him and with the government. Is that your interpretation of it?

MEANY: Well, right after we met here last year we had a round-table discussion on this matter with Pres. Kennedy, and Sec. Wirtz was present. This question of the government's position on the 35-hour week being thrown at our people at the bargaining table was raised, and Pres. Kennedy made it quite clear . . . there certainly should not be any government pressure . . . that would discourage a shorter workweek through collective bargaining. I think that this represents a change from that time and is reflected in Sec. Wirtz's attitude.

Morgan Says:

Properly Conceived Foreign Aid Profitable as Well as Effective

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

LOS ANGELES—Foreign aid is supposed to be out of favor and out of style. But properly conceived it can be not only a highly effective instrument of our foreign policy but a soundly profitable investment as well.

The Johnson Administration, and especially a suspicious, recalcitrant Congress, could do far worse than lend an attentive ear to a remarkably positive argument for foreign aid put forth by Gerard Piel, publisher of that remarkably responsible and informative magazine, the Scientific American.

Morgan

In New Delhi, India, the other day, Piel was awarded the Kalinga prize, UNESCO's annual award for the popularization of science. In a paper delivered on that occasion, Piel put some important points on foreign aid in perspective. After two centuries of industrial revolution, he noted, there are two kinds of nations—developed and underdeveloped, or in plain language, rich and poor. The development of the underdeveloped countries, he said, will set the course of history for the next 100 years.

A recent innovation of history, the rich nations, embracing less than a third of the world's population but consuming more than two-thirds of the world's output, must help the poor nations. Why? This call for aid, in Piel's view (and I share it), is not an appeal to benevolence. Developing countries carry a rightful claim on the assets of 20th century civilization:

"The first among these assets is scientific knowledge and the power this gives man over nature. Science and technology are the heritage of all men, because they constitute the accumulative experience of our species. . . ."

Then his thesis goes on to argue that not only can the rich afford to respond without perceptible cost to their own well-being but, in a sense, they cannot afford not to, for their own well-being. We too easily forget, Piel indicates, the awful price the West has paid in human terms for industrialization.

We readily point to the cruel cost of the ruthless Russian revolution but we are inclined to ignore the sacrifice of workmen to the industrial revolution in England and the fact that in the United States "it was 35 million steerage immigrants—a flood of humanity equal to the nation's population at the end of the Civil War—who furnished the primary capital for . . . (our) industrial revolution. . . ."

If these precedents are followed, one after another of the emerging nation-states will come under authoritarian leadership. Indeed "the nations that are moving are those most harshly governed, and the rate of development seems to correlate directly with the disposition to apply and submit to coercion."

An exciting and singular exception is India, which is trying to wage its political, social and industrial revoluton democratically without resort to coercion or class hatred and violence. The outcome is in doubt but we have an enormous stake in helping India's efforts for if they do succeed they could, the publisher of the Scientific American feels, represent a turn as historic as the industrial revolution itself.

Along with several other experts who have analyzed the problem, Piel believes that since the U.S. economy "must soon find conveniently large open sluices for its surpluses—other than armaments—its foreign aid outlay could easily double. With disarmament, it might easily double again."

This would "generate demand for the products of neglected and vital sectors of industry, including the heavy machinery builders and the machine-tool industry, whose domestic business proceeds in cycles of 'chickens today and feathers tomorrow.' "

Furthermore, he reminds us again—though I don't quite see how Congress and other critics so easily persist in forgetting—that 80 cents of every dollar appropriated for foreign aid is spent within the borders of the U.S.

In our surface affluence we seem to conceal from ourselves the fact that "the American economy faces a serious crisis. The rate of growth in recent years has not much exceeded the increase in population; a high percentage of the country's industrial plant remains chronically idle, and unemployment has been rising in waves of alarmingly larger amplitude. Automatic factories, offices and shops, in other words, have been producing as much poverty as wealth."

In effect, Piel is saying that Lyndon Johnson's war on poverty should include a broad front for foreign aid because by such a campaign we will be aiding ourselves—a sound argument that the government should have embraced long ago.

'Great Advances' in Colombia Stirred by Alliance for Progress

THE ALLIANCE for Progress has helped stimulate great advances in Colombia with 22,000 schools planned, 70,000 houses built, hundreds of small dispensaries constructed and new lands being opened for cattle feeding, U.S. Ambassador Fulton Freeman said from the State Dept. before moving to his new assignment as ambassador to Mexico.

Thomas C. Mann, his predecessor in Mexico City, has been named assistant secretary of state for Latin American affairs by Pres. Johnson.

Freeman said that Colombia has adopted a progressive income tax as a result of which total tax revenue was increased 40 percent last year and is expected to jump a further 40 to 50 percent this year. He was interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

Last year's slash in foreign aid funds by Congress, although it seriously affected our programs in Latin America, generally did not damage them in Colombia, Freeman said.

"Even at the time the [Alliance for Progress] charter was being signed, Colombia had already taken the qualifying steps," he pointed out. "Tax reform legislation had been passed a year before the alliance was a reality, and shortly afterwards an agrarian reform bill had become law.

"Since the passage of that bill, it has been only a little more than two years now—7,000 families have received titles for property who before had no land whatever.

"In addition, Colombia has a planning department in operation and, shortly after the alliance charter was signed, completed and sent to the Organization of American States, the first 10-year plan for any Latin-American country."

Colombia has no effective Castro Communists, Freeman said, because of the Castro treatment of the Catholic Church, resented in Colombia which is 95 to 98 percent Catholic, and the effect of the Castro execution of hundreds on a country that "does not believe the state has the right to take the life of any person."

COLOMBIA has a coalition government, he explained, with a Conservative now in power. He succeeded a Liberal, who was president from 1958 to 1962. Also each party as an equal number of seats in Parliament.

Although progress under the alliance in Latin America is "spotty," Freeman was of the opinion that "we have made considerable progress when one considers the program has been in effect for only a little over two years."

"I feel confident that at the end of 10 years there will be a complete change in all of Latin America," he predicted.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

A "GREAT BARRAGE of mail, obviously inspired by the American Medical Association and its state affiliates," has poured into Congress since Pres. Johnson sent up his message on health care, reports Rep. Frank Thompson of New Jersey, a Democrat, in his newsletter to constituents. And he tells a parable of the squirrels.

It seems, he says, that once the sun shifted somehow, and winters grew longer and longer, and many of the squirrels began starving during the winters because they couldn't gather enough nuts in the short summer and fall.

Someone suggested that all squirrels should contribute extra nuts to a "great hollow tree in the center of the forest," so that any squirrel that ran short could draw on that supply.

To most of the squirrels, this sounded fine. But not to "the flying squirrels, who could get from tree to tree faster than the regular squirrels and therefore always had more than enough nuts."

The flying squirrels chanted, "It would weaken our character. . . . If a few lazy squirrels can't collect enough nuts, they deserve to go hungry. After all, it's not our fault if they can't fly."

The flying squirrels finally agreed to a redistribution system so that some nuts would be on a lot of little trees—but in some areas no nut trees were set out, in others the rules allowed extra nuts only after a squirrel had starved two days, three days, or four days.

"Let's do what we planned in the first place," said the squirrels. But the flying squirrels said:

"No, no, never. That will weaken our characters and make us wishy-washy. . . . Let's not change anything."

"And so nothing was changed," says Thompson's parable. "And the winters got longer and longer and more and more squirrels starved.

"But it was all right, you see, because they died with good, strong characters."

THE GOLDWATER presidential campaign, which most observers feel has been stalling, also keeps running into the problem of internal rivalries. There are clashes in California and clashes in Florida, and it isn't at all sure what delegate strength the senator can command in the Mountain States.

Further than that, the senator makes an odd impression on veteran political reporters, who find him curiously unorthodox and likely to get a speech over with and leave without bothering to shake hands.

Goldwater indicates that his problem is with the columnists, who he thinks are giving him a bad time. And he still is on the stalk for delegates.

The real trouble is the severe drop in market-price value of the once-famed "southern strategy"—the doctrine that the senator could be both nominated and elected with southern states, the GOP midwestern "heartland," and the Mountain States.

This "southern strategy" doesn't look viable to the people who have backed the winning candidates at Republican conventions for 30 years—the publishers and bankers, the top business figures who know what time it is in world affairs.

They think that Pres. Johnson will carry the South despite his strong stand on civil rights and will carry it even after he signs a comprehensive bill, if a bill gets by the Senate filibuster.

They think that the election will be won or lost this year exactly where it has been won or lost in the past—where the people live, in the populous industrial states that are also big agricultural states and have big electoral votes.

This is where Pres. Johnson will be doing much of his campaigning, and it can reliably be said that the White House expects the Republican candidate to be campaigning in those states, too. And they expect it no matter how many delegates Sen. Goldwater has on the first ballot in San Francisco next July.

ALLIANCE FOR PROGRESS has helped stimulate the distribution of land to 7,000 families and the construction of 22,000 schools and 70,000 new homes in Colombia, Fulton Freeman (right), who returned recently after serving as U.S. ambassador there, reported on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People. Interviewer was Harry W. Flannery, AFL-CIO radio coordinator.

Expert Gives Advice to Elders On Housing, Medical Insurance

Last in a Series of Two Articles on Retirement

By Sidney Margolius

AS previously reported, food and beverages ($84), housing, utilities and furnishings ($103) and medical care ($26) are the three big items in a typical modest budget of $276 a month for a retired couple.

Cutting House Costs: Housing problems range from "none at all" reported by couples who had managed to pay off mortgages before retirement, to "very serious." Those reporting a serious dilemma notably often include widowed or unmarried older women, recent interviews revealed.

Sec. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee has called such housing an "acute and urgent need."

Several federal programs can aid at least some retired people. A number of public housing projects for the elderly have opened up around the country the past two years. Rentals are set on a sliding scale based on income, and are usually 20 percent lower than comparable private rentals. In one such project, rents range from $35 to $72, depending on size of apartment. There is only one catch. Older people who have applied tell me there aren't enough of these apartments to fill the requests. Nonetheless, it is advisable to ask your local public-housing authority if there are any retirement projects in your area for which you may be eligible, and get on the waiting list.

Another program promising some apartments for older people is the rental housing sponsored by non-profit groups such as churches, consumer co-ops and public agencies with low-rate mortgages provided by the Housing & Finance Agency. This program had a slow start. More recently, it has been reported that 140 applications had been received. To find out availability in your area, contact your housing authority and local FHA office.

Retirement hotels as in Florida and on the west coast have been promoted by both non-profit and commercial organizations. But they are not cheap; typically, $83 to $160 per person a month, including meals.

A program of low-cost mortgages available through the Farmers Home Administration is especially useful to retired couples living in rural areas and small towns. These loans have an interest rate of only 4 percent.

Medical Insurance: Continuing Blue Cross when you retire, or joining through one of the open-enrollment periods made available from time to time by Blue Cross, is the most economical alternative widely available for solving the medical-insurance dilemma.

Blue Cross and Blue Shield, while they still would take a major part of the medical budget, are safer than private company indemnity policies because they are "direct service" plans, or at least partly direct.

Direct service plans pay full costs for the specific coverages they provide, and thus pay a larger part of the bill than indemnity policies. This is especially important in buying hospital insurance, which is the No. 1 need of older people, followed by surgical coverage. One out of six older people goes to the hospital each year for an average stay of two weeks and an average bill of $525—twice as long and twice as much as average hospital bills of younger people.

In contrast, the private-company indemnity policies, while they may seem reasonably priced, limit the amount they pay. For example, such policies may pay only $10 or $15 a day for hospital board, and up to $150 for "extras," while actual rates are much higher today.

IN THE PAST YEAR a number of "Over 65" plans have been offered in various regions of the country by groups of private companies on a non-profit basis. These pooled plans have been interpreted as the insurance industry's answer to the labor and co-op-supported proposals to provide medical insurance under Social Security. Well, the answer already is proving to be a weak one.

The first of these plans, "Connecticut 65," reported a $550,000 loss for the first 15 months of operation and has asked the State Insurance Dept. for permission to raise rates an estimated 16.5 percent.

Similarly, the Continental Casualty Co., which recently promoted with heavy advertising medical insurance for people over 65 on a mass-enrollment basis, has announced that the rate for three types of coverage will rise to $25.50 a month from $21.

If Blue Cross or other direct-service plans are not available to you, the only alternative is a mass-enrollment plan offered by a private organization, including the American Association of Retired Persons, 711 14th Street, N. W., Washington, D. C.; Continental Casualty, Mutual of Omaha or Firemen's Fund Insurance Group.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Happiness Is Stockpiles of Trivia That Soothe Ego and Household

By Jane Goodsell

FOR CHRISTMAS I got a bottle of Joy perfume—the most expensive perfume in the world, it says in the advertisements. It smells heavenly, and I feel pampered and luxurious every time I dab it on my ear lobes—which is once, or maybe twice, a week. But my bottle of Joy hasn't changed my life. It hasn't transformed my personality into a serenely radiant, supremely confident new me.

Something has, though. Perhaps you've noticed the change in me. I'm less nervous and fidgety. Better-adjusted. But it's not my Joy perfume that has accomplished this miracle. It's my four dozen pencils.

A few days ago I plunked out 99 cents for a box of lead pencils, which I scattered with wild abandon throughout the house—in drawers, on shelves, by both telephones, in the glove compartment of the car and in my apron.

This 99-cent purchase has changed my life. No longer need I rush frantically around the house, pawing through drawers in search of a pencil to write down a telephone number or a shopping list. Now, when I reach for a pencil, I find one! It seems like a miracle. And between you and me, pencils at my fingertips do a lot more for my mental health than Joy at my ear lobes.

THE SALUTORY EFFECT of my 99-cent purchase has set me wondering. Maybe I should take the money I've been saving toward a new spring coat and go on a shopping spree aimed at reducing the emotional tension around our house. I've started a shopping list:

- One dozen sets of keys to the car. Actually, this is a conservative estimate.
- Two dozen pairs of mittens for each child. Surely all those mittens ought to ensure our finding at least one mismatched pair.
- Two dozen pairs of scissors. We already own six pairs and yesterday I searched for half an hour before I found one of them. Have you ever tried to cut a hangnail with pinking shears?
- Six dozen paring knives. If you have ever burrowed through a garbage can before breakfast in search of the paring knife you threw out with the potato peels the night before, you'll understand the importance of a paring knife stockpile.

Stand of Council on Rights, Health Needs

Civil Rights

A BIPARTISAN majority of the House of Representatives has adopted, by an overwhelming vote, the strongest civil rights measure in the history of the United States and one of the major signposts on the road to full civil rights for all has been passed.

This is an achievement which the AFL-CIO Executive Council hails with great satisfaction, for this measure includes many of the objectives for which we have been fighting for years. But this is not a victory; there is no room for complacency. The fight in the Senate of the United States must still be waged and won.

The Senate in the past has too often been the graveyard of civil rights legislation; this cannot be tolerated again. The urgency of our times and the complete humanitarianism of this issue underscore this fact. We are convinced that this bill can and will be adopted. We urge the members of the Senate to join this battle; to resist every crippling amendment; to shun compromise; to let nothing come before adoption of the civil rights act of 1964.

For our part, we intend that all of the legislative forces of the AFL-CIO be committed to this battle. We join with Pres. Johnson in insisting that this piece of legislation, so truly needed not only by minority groups but by this nation, be enacted into law as the most worthy monument to the man who fought so hard for its achievement —Pres. John F. Kennedy.

Health Needs

PRES. JOHNSON has correctly given first priority on the agenda of the nation's unmet health needs to hospital insurance for the aged.

In his call for action to make the benefits of modern medicine available to all, in order to end "the unequal sharing of the health services we have," the President has put first the very measure the AFL-CIO has long held to be indispensable to a healthy nation.

The enactment of the Administration's proposal, enabling people to contribute during their working years toward basic health benefits in their old age, is an essential step toward making needed care available to all.

The House Ways & Means Committee has now completed hearings on a variety of proposals to meet this need. The hearings were thorough and fair and we commend the chairman and the members of the committee for the type of hearings that were conducted.

Two clear results of these hearings are:

1. There can no longer be any doubt in the mind of any reasonable man that there is an urgent need for insuring against the burden of expensive health care for the elderly. Any "doubting Thomas" has only to read the record of the hearings for proof.

2. There can equally be no doubt about the fact that neither private insurance nor public relief alone can meet this need without the basic underwriting of a broad government program built on the principle of social security.

Now it is up to the Congress and that, as an immediate matter, means it is up to the House Ways & Means Committee.

The facts are in, the dimensions of the problem are known, the methods for meeting it are clear. We believe the committee can meet this need and fulfill the will of the people. We urgently request that they move with speed to do so.

Beyond this most urgent and pressing need, there are other improvements that must be made in the interest of better health for all Americans. We applaud and support the President's program to amend and extend the Hill-Burton Act, to encourage more rational planning of health facilities, to authorize a new program of grants to assist in the renovation and replacement of existing obsolete facilities, and to increase the authorization for grants for nursing homes and other long-term facilities.

We also believe that the Administration, in its efforts to improve health and eliminate poverty, must assume a leadership role in eliminating racial discrimination in the provision of health services. The nation must make a concerted effort to reduce the difference now existing in health levels of Negroes and whites.

We were heartened to note the President's full support of legislation providing mortgage guarantees and loans to encourage the further spread of group medical practice, particularly in rural areas and when group practice is associated with prepayment programs.

Profile of 2,500 Service Rejectees:

Manpower Task Force Studies Correlate Poverty, Ignorance

The correlation between poverty and ignorance is starkly evident in the profile drawn by a Presidential task force of the thousands of young men who fail each year to qualify for service in the nation's armed forces.

The report of the task force on manpower conservation, headed by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, estimated that if pre-induction examinations were given to youths as they turned 18, about one-third of them would be found unfit for military service, and about half of these would be rejected for mental deficiencies.

The report, titled "One-Third of a Nation," said that the "most important single fact" emerging from studies of young men who failed the mental test was the large proportion who are "children of poverty."

It also noted that four out of every five rejectees were school dropouts, and about four out of 10 of these said they had been forced to leave school to support their families or themselves.

These findings formed the basis of a "human salvage" program just launched by the Labor Dept. and the Selective Service Administration with the aim of identifying and helping young men whose failure to pass the draft test indicates they are poorly equipped for civilian responsibilities as well.

In issuing the directive for the new program, Pres. Johnson observed that the task force's findings "are dramatic evidence that poverty is still with us, still exacting its price in spoiled lives and failed expectations."

'Promise' Not Kept

"For entirely to many Americans," the President said, "the promise of American life is not being kept. In a nation as rich and productive as ours this is an intolerable situation."

The task force itself put it this way:

"One of the fundamental facts about democracy is its recognition that mental ability is distributed widely throughout any population. In every generation, talent appears at every social stratum, in every geographic area. Given equal opportunity, large numbers of the offspring of the poor will prove their worth at an early age and go on to live lives of substantial achievement. However, this process can easily be thwarted, and in the long history of the world usually has been.

"There is little question that the process has not worked for a great many of the young men who fail to meet the mental requirements for military service in the United States today."

Interviews with a nationwide sample of 2,500 recent rejectees rounded out the social and economic profile of the group as follows:

- The rate of unemployment was 28 percent, four times greater than the rate for all young men in the 20-24 age group. An additional 5 percent were out of work and not looking for jobs.
- Only about 20 percent had finished high school, compared with an estimated two-thirds of all men age 20 to 24.
- Those working at the time of the survey averaged $56 a week in earnings—$64 a week among white workers and $48 among nonwhite workers.
- About three-fourths of those working were employed in unskilled, semi-skilled or service jobs, against only about half the entire male population in the 20-24 age group.
- About 20 percent of the fathers or fathers-in-law with whom the rejectees were living were not working, and about 25 percent were employed as unskilled workers.
- More than half the fathers of the rejectees had never finished the eighth grade and only 16 percent had completed high school.
- Half the rejectees came from families with six or more children, whereas overall about 10 percent of the nation's children are in families that size.
- Half the families of the rejectees had total incomes of less than $4,000 in 1962, and one-fifth of the families had incomes of less than $2,000.
- One of every eight rejectees came from a family which was receiving public assistance at the time of the survey, and one-fifth of the famiiles had received such assistance during the previous five years.
- Nearly a third of the rejectees came from homes broken by divorce or separation.
- About 70 percent grew up in urban areas, 20 percent on farms and less than 10 percent in rural nonfarm areas.

The government's "salvage" program is attempting to marshal the counseling and referral resources of the federal-state employment system and make basic education and job training available to unemployed rejectees. The task force study found that more than 80 percent of those failing the mental test would welcome this training, and most of them are willing to leave home if necessary to get it.

At present, pre-induction examinations are given to young men in the 22-24 age group, and those who pass usually are inducted within a year. Starting next July, the tests will be given to youths as they register for the draft at age 18, although the older age groups will continue to be called first for actual induction.

The earlier tests, Wirtz said, will help identify youths who have special training or educational problems at a time in their working careers "when they can benefit most from the employment and training and basic education services available under this new program."

Oklahoma Students Join to Defeat R-T-W

Stillwater, Okla.—The Young Democrats of Oklahoma State University have voted to "actively campaign" for the defeat of a so-called "right-to-work" proposition placed on the ballot in the state's May 5 primary election.

The campus chapter charged in a resolution that the "true aim" of the proposal, which would outlaw the union shop through an amendment to the state constitution, is to "lower wages."

Its effect, the college student group warned, would be to "bring serious labor-management strife to Oklahoma for the first time" and "take the bloom off Oklahoma's expanding economy."

Leonard Gambrell, president of the university's Young Democrats, said the state is "now attracting new industries that need educated, top-flight workers." He added:

"These industries expect to pay good wages and bargain with their workers collectively. They are not opposed to unions.

"If the union shop is outlawed, an increasing number of our most capable workers will leave Oklahoma. This has been the history of other 'right-to-work' states, where wages and salaries lag far behind the national average.

"Competent people migrate to where pay scales are highest.

"The result of a 'right-to-work' law would be labor-management strife, exodus of our most capable people, lower pay, and a generally weaker Oklahoma economy."

The proposed constitutional amendment was put on the ballot through a petition campaign after the state legislature had repeatedly turned down bills to ban the union shop. It is backed by a coalition including the National Right to Work Committee and a special committee of the U. S. Chamber of Commerce.

UAW Ratifies 3-Year Pact With Case Co.

Racine, Wis.—Members of Auto Workers Local 180 have voted unanimously to ratify a new three-year contract wtih the J. I. Case Co. providing wage increases, the union shop and other improvements.

By agreement of the parties, central bargaining items negotiated here will be applied to some 5,000 workers in five other plants of the agricultural implement firm in Illinois, Iowa and California.

Union negotiators praised the "changed bargaining climate" which they contrasted with the turbulence of past talks with company representatives. A company spokesman predicted the new contract will mean "labor peace and stability" helpful in restoring the firm to its "former competitive position in the industry."

The new pact provides a 5-cent increase on timing rates for piecework each year of the contract; a seven-cent hourly increase for day workers for the first two years of the pact, 8 cents during the third year.

Other benefits include four weeks' paid vacation after 20 years; an improved 365-day insurance plan; and better health and safety provisions and grievance machinery.

ILG Cloak Board Sets Contract Talks

New York—Contract betterment will be sought by the Ladies' Garment Workers for 55,000 coat, suit, skirt and sportswear workers in contract talks due to open soon.

The New York Cloak Joint Board of the union has notified five employer associations of its desire to change the terms of contracts expiring next May 31. Locals have scheduled meetings here and in New Jersey, Connecticut and New York state to formulate proposals, the union said.

ILGWU Vice Pres. Henoch Mendelsund will head union spokesmen for 40,000 coat and suit workers, Vice Pres. Shelley Appleton for 15,000 skirt and sportswear employes.

Job Trainees Doubled In ARA's Second Year

The pace of job training under the Area Redevelopment Act doubled during the second year of ARA operations, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has reported.

More than 22,000 unemployed or underemployed persons were approved for training in 146 different occupations, Wirtz said. This represented an increase of some 13,000 individuals and 57 new job titles over the previous year.

"This act is significant in pioneering worker retraining as part of the national attack on unemployment," the secretary said. "And most important it enabled us to direct that attack at one of the most persistent sources of unemployment—the economically depressed areas."

Program in 22 Areas

Wirtz noted that training was provided in 212 distressed areas in 42 states, Puerto Rico and American Samoa.

He described the ARA occupational training program as "a forerunner to the more comprehensive and nationwide Manpower Development & Training Act program" and said that as such "it has pioneered new trails in vocational education."

He noted that because of the depressed nature of the areas in which the ARA functions, there are built-in limitations on the number of job opportunities, the number of people who can be trained for them and the types of occupations for which they can be trained.

Even so, he reported, of the 8,729 enrollees who completed training during the year, 71 percent obtained work, most of them in jobs directly related to their newly acquired skills. This represented a rise of 3 percent over the placement rate for the first year.

Wirtz said ARA training had been particularly effective in reaching long-term and less-educated jobless. More than 40 percent of the trainees had been out of work six months or longer and 46 percent did not have high school diplomas.

About 60 percent of the trainees were between 22 and 44 years old. Thirty percent were under 22 and only 11 percent were 45 or older.

The secretary's report also showed that:

- Six states with large amounts of persistent unemployment—New Jersey, Michigan, Illinois, Oklahoma, Kentucky and West Virginia—accounted for the largest numbers of trainees and courses.
- More than half the trainees were preparing for production jobs that involve, for the most part, semi-skilled operations.
- About 19 percent of the trainees, a high proportion of them coming from older age groups, were in training for service occupations.
- Clerical and sales courses accounted for about 10 percent of the trainees, mostly young women perfecting secretarial skills or learning to use new types of office machines.

Administration of the ARA falls within the Dept. of Commerce, but the Labor Dept. is charged with responsibility for job training in cooperation with the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Bill in Rules Committee

Last year, the House defeated a bill to continue and expand ARA's program of grants, loans and training assistance to economically distressed areas. The legislation was revived, however, when the Senate approved it 65-30. The Senate measure has been cleared by the House Banking & Currency Committee but remains bottled up in the Rules Committee.

Pres. Johnson's budget message to Congress called for enactment of the bill and sought new authorization of $222 million for ARA operations in fiscal 1965.

New ABC Local Gets 62c Package

Michigan City, Ind.—Workers at the Old World Baking Co., a division of the United Biscuit Co., joined the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers Dec. 19 and won their first contract by Feb. 6.

The initial agreement provides gains put by the local at 62 cents an hour over a three-year period. Wages went up 10 cents this year and will rise another 9 cents Jan. 18, 1965, and an additional 9 cents a year later.

Other benefits include a stepup of 15 cents an hour, in addition to general hikes, in starting rates; company payments of 10 cents an hour into the union-industry health and welfare fund; 8 cents hourly premium pay for second and third shift workers; vacations up to four weeks; six paid holidays; seven hours guaranteed work per day; and other benefits similar to those in other ABC-United Biscuit agreements.

Industry Bars Talks On Overtime—Carey

Workers in the electrical manufacturing industry would "gladly" give up overtime work to provide 60,000 jobs for persons now unemployed, Pres. James B. Carey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers declared.

Carey, keynoting a four-day IUE Full Citizenship & World Affairs Conference in Washington, D.C., said management leaders in the industry have refused to sit down with the union "and plan together for the creation of more jobs through the reduction of scheduled overtime, establishment of a shorter workweek" and other measures.

The conference drew 200 IUE local leaders from all over the nation and a galaxy of prominent speakers, including Sec. of State Dean Rusk and 10 senators and congressmen.

Rusk chose the occasion for a major foreign policy address in which he spelled out U.S. policy toward Cuba and toward other Communist countries.

He served notice that there will be "no retreat" from the U.S. policy of opposition to the Castro regime "as long as it continues to threaten the security and stability of other nations in this hemisphere."

Rusk warned that countries which sell Cuba goods important to that nation's economy are hampering the defense of the western hemisphere against "subversion and aggression."

The U.S. has different policies toward various Communist nations, he said, because "the Communist world is no longer a single flock of sheep following blindly behind one leader."

There were sessions and discussions on medical care, disarmament, consumer problems and congressional reform. A report by COPE Dir. Al Barkan on the 1964 political campaign was followed—after a coffee break—by an address by Ambassador Teodoro Moscoso on the Alliance for Progress.

Congressional speakers and panel participants included Senators Clifford P. Case (R-N.J.), Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), Philip A. Hart (D-Mich..), Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.), George McGovern (D-S.D.), and Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), and Representatives John H. Dent (D-Pa.), John V. Lindsay (R-N.Y.), and Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.).

The conference delegates visited the grave of the late Pres. Kennedy and left a wreath.

Canada Given IAM Aircraft Revival Plan

Ottawa, Ont. — The Machinists Aerospace Council has offered the government a nine-point program to put Canada's aircraft industry back on its feet and provide new jobs.

IAM Vice Pres. Mike Rygus headed a 23-man delegation that pointed out the industry has been hit by heavy unemployment and frequent layoffs due principally to fluctuations in defense orders. Industry experts, he said, are predicting a further cut.

Key points in the IAM program are greater stress on long-term research and development; prompt renewal of government contracts; financial incentives to offset U.S. tariffs on repair and maintenance work in Canada on U.S.-owned aircraft; preferential treatment for Canadian manufacturers; accelerated depreciation allowances on machine tools because of high obsolescence.

Also, greater coordination and planning in production schedules to stabilize and fully utilize the work force; increased emphasis on production sharing agreements with other nations to insure work for Canadians; maximum production sharing for Canadian manufacturers when Canadian air lines replace aircraft, and establishment of an air transport industry council to anticipate aircraft needs.

Crop Growers in California Drop Bracero Plan Support

Los Angeles—The powerful Council of California Growers has announced it will not seek any more extensions of the controversial "bracero" program that brings in Mexican nationals to work on U.S. farms.

The surprise announcement was greeted with considerable pleasure by union leaders and others who have long worked to get rid of the bracero program. Thomas L. Pitts, executive secretary-treasurer of the State AFL-CIO, hailed the decision as "sensible and forthright" but warned that careful planning would be required in recruiting U.S. farm workers under proper safeguards.

John V. Newman, spokeman for the growers' organization, said the decision to accept as final the early end of the bracero program was based not only on the narrow margin by which Congress extended it until the end of this year, but also on the "serious unemployment situation" domestically.

The growers also called for a series of studies by the state and federal government to show availability of unemployed workers who might be willing to take on farm jobs; location and time of jobs; wages needed to attract urban unemployed; housing and other facilities needed for domestic workers; availablity of workers from other states.

The council position reverses a long-standing grower argument that domestic workers "will not do" many farm labor jobs, that Mexican braceros therefore are needed, and that growers have already tried adequately to recruit Americans for these jobs.

While Congress had voted to continue the program only until Dec. 31, there has been widespread speculation that the growers would put up a major fight to extend it for at least another year, and probably longer.

Pitts pledged labor's fullest cooperation in recruiting domestic farm workers for jobs previously held by braceros and said the state central body would make suggestions on recruiting, wages, housing, transportation and other matters at a hearing set for Mar. 13 under joint federal-state sponsorship.

Gov. Edmund Brown and U.S. Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning will be co-chairmen of the day-long meeting in Sacramento.

Pitts said that while some aspects of the grower's proposals for state studies appear "unrealistic," labor is "in general accord with them on the need to get out the specific facts of the case and to develop a comprehensive program to uproot the causes of rural poverty and enhance farm job conditions and opportunities for the unemployed."

The Rev. John Simmons, chairman of the Emergency Committee to Aid Farm Workers, which has been working with unions in this area in opposition to the bracero program, said:

"The action by the growers could promise a new era for farm workers, if their programs are pursued sincerely."

Max Mont, secretary of the committee, said the attitude of the growers, "if followed adequately, could lead to a solution of long-standing problems which have kept [U.S.] farm workers down to the lowest level of our society."

It is vital, however, he said, that in addition to the proposals of the California Growers, "American workers be given something comparable to the system used for Mexican braceros: a guaranteed minimum workweek, and a planned itinerary so that different farm jobs can be pieced together to make a meaningful occupation for farm workers."

'R-T-W' Peril to Rights, Wilkins Warns Negroes

So-called "right-to-work" laws offer no benefits of any kind to Negro workers, Executive Sec. Roy Wilkins of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has told leaders in Oklahoma.

"Work" legislation, he said in a statement, is supported chiefly by segregationists who are "the same people who made possible the shame of Birmingham, of Oxford, Miss., and Little Rock, Ark."

Wilkins denounced the pending R-T-W proposal scheduled for a May 5 referendum in Oklahoma and said:

"I urge all our people now engaged in the battle for civil rights to vote against this new threat to freedom of opportunity.

"This law would take away the civil rights, the better job opportunities, the higher pay and better working conditions we have gained with the help of labor.

"The 20 states where the 'right-to-work' fraud is now in force are the states where the Negro has had to struggle hardest against the forces of bigotry, discrimination and segregation.

"There is nothing in the so-called right-to-work law to aid or benefit the Negro worker."

Wilkins' denunciation of "work" statutes was made public in Washington, D.C., by the National Council for Industrial Peace through Pres. Jake Simmons, Jr., of the Oklahoma NAACP.

Simmons is an executive board member of the Oklahoma Committee to Preserve Free Marketing & Bargaining, a state affiliate of the NCIP, and opposes the current drive for an anti-union shop proposal as an amendment to the state constitution.

The circulation of "work" petitions was started in 1961 following a meeting in Oklahoma City of a new U.S. Chamber of Commerce special committee created for the purpose of outlawing the union shop "wherever and in whatever form it may exist."

Petitions to carry the anti-union shop law to referendum were circulated by employers after the state legislature refused to enact a "work" law. A court battle backed by the State AFL-CIO attacked the validity and adequacy of signatures on the petitions and the state labor body is leading the campaign for defeat of the proposal.

For Insurance Bargaining:

Two Appeals Courts Split on NLRB Rule

The issue of what constitutes an appropriate bargaining unit for insurance agents under National Labor Relations Board rules appeared headed for the U.S. Supreme Court in the wake of conflicting decisions by two federal appeals courts.

The Insurance Workers, involved in both cases, will welcome a prompt settlement of the issue, Sec.-Treas. William A. Gillen said, because a refusal by five important firms to bargain has delayed contract protection for many newly organized members while the dispute is being tested in the courts.

Three appeals courts have ruled on the issue in two years. Two favored the union position, one favored management's claim that the board's unit determination was unlawful.

In a decision upholding the NLRB, the 3d Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia voted unanimously to enforce an NLRB order directing the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. to bargain with the IWIU for agents in two district offices in New Castle County (Wilmington), Del.

A day earlier, the 1st Circuit Court of Appeals in Boston set aside a board decision that a single Metropolitan office in Woonsocket, R.I., was an appropriate unit. This decision, too, was unanimous, and the court stated a directly contrary position to that of the 3d Circuit judges on the issue.

Extent of Organization

The point in both cases was whether the NLRB had followed the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947 which provides that, in the determination of a unit appropriate for collective bargaining, the extent to which employes have organized shall not be the controlling factor.

The 3d Circuit, in upholding the board's Wilmington decision said that Congress intended to overrule the "extent of organization" theory used previously by the NLRB and required the board to determine if a bargaining unit is appropriate in and of itself, apart from the extent to which the employes are organized. The court wrote:

"The extent to which the union failed to organize should not determine the appropriateness of the group it did organize. To hold that, because the union failed to organize on a broader basis, the smaller unit petitioned for is inappropriate, would be to penalize the union for failing in an attempt to organize."

The 1st Circuit, overturning the NLRB's Woonsocket decision, reviewed board rulings in other cases and concluded: "The board's policy . . . has not been consistent over the years."

In 1944, the judges observed, the board changed its previous policy and decided, in the absence of unusual circumstances, to avoid setting up units of insurance agents "smaller than statewide" in scope.

Policy Changed in 1961

In 1961 a board majority changed that policy by setting up a one-office unit for the IWIU in the case of the Quaker City Insurance Co., Alexandria, Va.—and this decision later was upheld by the 4th Circuit Court.

The 1st Circuit Court read the law and the NLRB decision differently, saying: "We can only conclude" that the NLRB majority has "reverted to its pre-1944 policy of regarding the extent of union organization as controlling."

Welfare-Pension Assets About $66 Billion in '63

Assets held by private welfare and pension plans totaled about $66 billion in 1963 and represented "one of the largest concentrations of investment accumulation in our country," Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz observed in releasing his annual report to Congress on the administration of the Welfare & Pension Plans Disclosure Act.

Wirtz predicted that at present rates of growth assets held by these private plans would reach $100 billion by 1970.

The figures do not include reserves of more than $40 billion held by government retirement programs or $20 billion in the reserves of Old-Age, Survivors & Disability Insurance.

The report showed that of the 161,750 welfare and pension plans filing information required by the act, 88.1 percent were administered by employers or employer associations. Only 1.8 percent were administered by worker organizations and 6.7 percent by joint boards of trustees.

Organized labor gave vigorous support to enactment of the reporting and disclosure law in 1958 and to the 1962 amendments which beefed up the secretary of labor's enforcement powers.

Wirtz said that plans reporting under the act cover more than 22 million persons—a figure that does not encompass family members covered as beneficiaries.

"Altogether," he went on, "a third of our labor force has a stake in plans to provide them with hospital, surgical or medical care, and to assure them an income in the event of sickness, accident, disability or unemployment."

On the other hand, about one-fifth of all workers have no welfare or pension protection of any kind, Wirtz observed, declaring:

"The fact that more than half of all the nation's funds in private welfare and pension plans is held in only 100 of these plans is a painful contrast to the knowledge that fully one-fith of our people are living in poverty, without any of the benefits of similar protections against ill health and unemployment.

"With every new accounting of our massive wealth, there is a corresponding accounting of the national conscience.

"Unless we use our wealth to meet, insofar as we can, the needs of the aged, the ill, the young widow raising a family alone, the poor farm family moving into an urban environment, the young being raised in slums and all of the other disadvantaged Americans. then we remain poor in spirit."

Hatters Local Votes $1 Increase in Dues

New York—Members of Hatters Local 24—employed in New York's millinery shops — voted overwhelmingly for a $1-a-month dues increase. The secret ballot vote was 499-62 for the raise.

TWO SUPPORTERS of expanded federal housing programs, Rep. Albert Rains (D-Ala.), left, and Sec. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee, discuss the Administration's new housing and community development proposals. Rains is chairman of the House Banking & Currency subcommittee holding hearings on the bill.

AFL-CIO Asks Boost In Low-Income Housing

Labor's program for a "massive expansion" of public housing for low-income families and other federally-aided home construction was presented to House and Senate subcommittees as "one of the most vital and urgent tasks before this Congress."

Sec. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee urged Congress to build on the Administration's housing and community development proposals to fashion a double-edged weapon to reduce both poverty and unemployment.

Where the Administration asked for 60,000 public housing units a year for low-income families, including both new construction and rehabilitated apartments purchased from private owners, the AFL-CIO "strongly and urgently" recommends 100,000 units a year as "the absolute minimum," Shishkin said.

He emphasized that public housing is the only proven means of bringing "decent housing" within the means of "the one-fifth of our people with income below the poverty level."

Likewise, he said, Congress should expand the Administration's request for an additional $1.4 billion in urban renewal funds over the next two years to a five-year, $1 billion-a-year program.

Shishkin said labor "welcomes and supports" Pres. Johnson's new proposal for federal assistance in developing planned communities of new homes and apartments in metropolitan areas as an alternative to "suburban sprawl." He urged that developers be required to conform to approved metropolitan area plans and that safeguards against "land speculation, profiteering, unethical promotion practices and misrepresentation" be written into the program.

'Patent Generator' of Jobs

Urging a broad-scale step-up in housing construction, Shishkin emphasized that "new housing construction along with the related urban renewal activity is the most potent generator of employment across our entire industrial scene."

The construction of 10,000 houses, he declared, requires approximately 20,000 man-years of employment and leads to additional job-creating expenditures for furnishings, furniture and appliances.

Companion bills to carry out the Administration program have been introduced by the chairmen of the House and Senate Banking & Currency subcommittees on housing, Rep. Albert Rains (D-Ala.) and Sen. John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.).

Shishkin said "good progress" has been made under the 1961 housing law, but that even the 1.6 million new housing starts last year—the highest level of recent years—"fell nearly a million units short of the minimum requirement estimated by the AFL-CIO." The new construction, he asserted, has tended to be concentrated in housing for upper-income groups.

"Thus the housing needs of moderate-income and of low-income families were not being met, while the market for high-priced homes and high-rent apartments was recurrently saturated," he added.

Shishkin said 2.5 million new units a year must be built for the next 12 years in order to catch up with the need.

Earlier, Housing & Home Finance Administrator Robert C. Weaver told the House subcommittee that the Administration's community planning program is a "most significant new departure" in federal housing programs. Federal aid, he declared, is necessary for orderly community growth.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce served notice that it will fight the Administration's program, which it asserted "would further centralize federal government power over communities and add to the abuses which have grown up in the public housing and urban renewal programs."

Rains Not to Seek Another New Term

Rep. Albert Rains (D-Ala.), sponsor and floor manager of virtually every major housing bill in recent years, has announced that he will not seek reelection to Congress.

Rains, 62, has served in Congress since 1945, is second in seniority on the House Banking & Currency Committee and chairman of its Housing subcommittee.

Unions Help Win Fight To Keep Trains Running

The Interstate Commerce Commission has refused permission for the New Haven Railroad to discontinue five passenger trains between New London, Conn., and Worcester, Mass.

Railroad unions and the states and communities involved had opposed the abandonment proposal.

Kaiser Buys Studebaker Defense Plant

South Bend, Ind.—The Kaiser Jeep Corp. has bought out Studebaker's defense products division—including a sprawling 416-acre plant here—and will hire several hundred former Studebaker employes to produce Army trucks.

Some 7,000 South Bend workers lost their jobs last December when Studebaker closed its U.S. operations, and most of them are still jobless.

Regional Dir. Ray Berndt of the Auto Workers said in Indianapolis that Kaiser officials had agreed not to impose arbitrary age restrictions in hiring former Studebaker employes. The hardest hit of the laid-off workers were those over 50, Berndt said—too young to retire but rejected as "too old" by other employers.

The Kaiser plant was used during World War II to produce airplane engines. Studebaker purchased it in 1961, but had used it only for storage. Kaiser will use it to fulfill an $80 million Army truck contract being transferred from Studebaker and hopes to acquire additional military truck contracts to keep it in operation. The main Studebaker auto plant was not included in the sale and remains idle.

Jodoin Raps Plan to Trim TCA Routes

Ottawa, Ont.—An announcement by the transport minister of Canada that he favors turning over part of Trans-Canada Airlines operations to private interests has drawn fire from Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress.

Jodoin said the "disclosure" by Transport Minister J. W. Pickersgill "appears to be the first step in sabotaging an airline that is the pride of the Canadian people." He added that if the proposal is put into effect, it would mean the "destruction" of about one-third of the TCA system and the discharge of possibly 200 pilots, some with 10 years' seniority.

Asserting that communities now served by the TCA would "suffer serious loss" in service, Jodoin said:

"The Canadian people have invested large amounts of public funds toward building a publicly-owned airline which has won international recognition. The government should make clear without the slightest delay whether the destructive plan proposed by the minister of transport is being considered as formal government policy."

LBJ Film Backs Hospital Care Bill

Pres. Johnson's strong endorsement of the King-Anderson bill in a recent address to a group of senior citizens has been recorded in a new 6-minute film trailer. It is designed for incorporation into the film on hospital care for the aged, "For All the Rest of Your Life."

The trailer containing the remarks of Pres. Johnson updates the film, which also presents a vigorous statement by the late Pres. Kennedy in support of the social security approach to old-age hospital care.

Unions which have copies of the film may purchase the trailer for $7.35 from the National Council of Senior Citizens, 1627 K Street, N. W., Washington, D. C. New prints containing the President's statement may be purchased for $25. Excerpts from Johnson's remarks have been incorporated in the 10 rental prints in the AFL-CIO film library.

Leaders Win 1st Round:

Senate Vote Shows Civil Rights Support

The civil rights bill was readied for the Senate floor as Administration leaders won a floor battle to bypass the hostile Judiciary Committee and place the House-approved bill directly on the calendar for action.

The vote gave impressive evidence of substantial bipartisan support to speed the bill despite the certainty of a southern filibuster. On the roll-call, the bill was placed on the calendar by a 54-to-37 vote—a major advance from the 45-39 margin by which the voting-rights bill of 1957 was withheld from the Judiciary unit.

Sen. Mike Mansfield (Mont.), the Democratic leader, indicated after the roll call that he would have no objection to brief committee hearings with instructions to the Judiciary group to report back the bill without amendment within a few days.

He then said the rights bill would remain on the calendar while the leadership sought first for passage of a $17 billion defense procurement bill and a combined wheat-cotton bill, considered of major importance by some southern states. A cotton bill was passed by the House last December, and the Senate Agriculture Committee amended the bill to add sections covering wheat prices.

Russell Appeal Rejected

The battle to send the rights bill to the Judiciary Committee was led by Sen. Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.), who for 20 years has been top strategist for southern filibusters. He appealed a ruling by the presiding officer, who at the moment was Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.), overturning a Russell point of order.

Mansfield led the fight against the appeal, pointing out that the same procedure had been followed in 1957 and that the Senate had already ruled on the issue. He finally moved to table Russell's appeal, which closed off debate and led to the roll call.

Twenty Republicans joined 34 Democrats in voting, in effect, to uphold the placing of the bill on the calendar. Only eight Republicans and 29 Democrats, most of them southerners, voted no.

The Judiciary Committee under the chairmanship of Sen. James O. Eastland (D-Miss.) has never reported any civil rights legislation except on direct instructions of the Senate.

Mansfield's offer to allow brief Judiciary unit hearings apparently was designed to soothe tempers ruffled in the floor combat.

It was not yet clear if the southern senators would launch a filibuster when Mansfield seeks to call up the rights bill or would stand aside and let it go to the floor, moving into the filibuster thereafter.

A decision to block taking up the bill would give the southerners two chances to try to kill the measure—once on the original request for unanimous consent to consider it, again after the bill had been pushed through this procedural roadblock.

Johnson Signs Tax Cut, Predicts Quick Impact

Johnson, who had made enactment of the tax slash a top priority legislative goal, reminded the nation that "this legislation was inspired and proposed" by the late Pres. Kennedy.

Immediately after the signing ceremony, accompanied by Cabinet members and Mrs. Johnson, he drove to Mrs. Kennedy's home to present four pens used in signing the historic bill—one each for the former First Lady, the Kennedy children and the John F. Kennedy Memorial Library.

The final-passage votes in the House and the Senate demonstrated vividly the bandwagon of support for the once-controversial and long-delayed tax cut.

The House voted 326-83 for final passage of the bill which emerged from House-Senate conference.

The Senate sent the bill to the White House by a 74-19 vote, with only 10 Democrats and nine Republicans opposed.

The impact of the tax cut will be felt almost immediately in pay checks and pay envelopes, as the withholding rate drops. Some examples:

- A single person making $75 a week will receive $2.50 more in take-home pay.
- A worker with one dependent and an income of $100 a week will take home $3 a week more
- A man with a dependent wife and three children making $150 a week will find $3.70 more in his paycheck.

A new "minimum standard deduction" provision will remove from the income tax rolls an estimated 1.5 million persons with low incomes.

About two-thirds of the cut applies to income received during 1964, with the full reduction going into effect next year. The withholding tax cut applies to all paydays on or after Mar. 5, although the Treasury has said it will be lenient with employers who are unable to adjust their bookkeeping by that date.

Union Hits Olympians' Scab Hats

New York—Strong objection to the American Olympic Committee's purchase of non-union hats for U.S. athletes has been voiced by Pres. Alex Rose of the Hatters.

Rose said, on the basis of published reports, that the committee had agreed to buy western-style hats made by Texas-Miller Products, Inc., of Corsicana, Tex., and urged it to reconsider.

Texas-Miller, which makes Adam Hats and other brands, had a contract with the Hatters until last August. Since then the union has been asking all consumers not to buy hats produced under non-union conditions and at wages Rose described as among the lowest in the industry.

Rose said in a message that "It is unfortunate that your committee, which depends to such a large extent on public support," is preparing to patronize a firm which "refuses to provide decent wages and conditions for its workers."

The committee, Rose urged, should make sure U.S. Olympic teams, at the games next October in Tokyo, are "suitably hatted with union-made headwear produced by workers whose conditions reflect the high ideals and standards" achieved by U.S. workers.

California Lost Time Sets New Postwar Low

Sacramento — Fewer California workers were involved in work stoppages in 1963 than in any year since the end of World War II, State Industrial Relations Dir. Ernest B. Webb announced.

The 1963 total of 1.4 million mandays lost was a sharp drop from the previous year's total of 2.66 million lost days because of labor disputes.

Chicago Teachers Gain Step Toward Bargaining

Chicago—The Chicago Board of Education in a 7-1 vote agreed to recognize the Chicago Teachers Union as bargaining agent for its 13,000 members and other teachers in Chicago's 21,000-person school system who want it to represent them.

CTU Pres. John M. Fewkes said the union is encouraged by the board's action because it "represents a real step toward collective bargaining" which may "lead to more decisive action."

The board vote reversed a previous refusal to recognize any teachers' organization and climaxed a determined drive by the union—Local 1 of the American Federation of Teachers—for bargaining rights as majority representative of teaching employes.

Following the board vote the union executive board postponed the mailing of strike ballots, scheduled to start Mar. 2, and called a meeting of the union house of representatives and school delegates Mar. 5 to discuss further action.

Fewkes had reported earlier that a strike if authorized by Local 1 members would begin Mar. 12. The postponement was agreed to because School Board Pres. Clair Rodewig served notice on other board members that he may move at the next board meeting to reconsider recognition of the union.

Authorization Cards Sought

Meanwhile the union sent authorization cards to all teaching employes with a request that they authorize Local 1 to represent them in collective bargaining.

This was found necessary, Fewkes said, because at the school board meeting Feb. 26 at which the union was authorized to represent its members, Rodewig moved to give recognition also to the Chicago division of the Illinois Education Association as bargaining agent for its members.

He served notice on his fellow board members that if the motion is not passed at the Mar. 11 meeting, he will move to reconsider recognition of Local 1 and will vote against such recognition.

The board vote climaxed a concentrated drive by Local 1 for bargaining rights. Strong teacher backing for the union was voted at a Feb. 7 mass meeting attended by 3,500 teachers and almost 1,000 others who could not find seats in Orchestra Hall.

At the meeting, the union got pledges of assistance and full-scale support from Pres. William A. Lee of the Chicago AFL-CIO and heard Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers label the National Education Association, parent organization of the Illinois Education Association, as a spokesman for administrators.

Last-Day Speech Voids Election at Grossinger's

Monticello, N. Y.—A National Labor Relations Board regional office has set aside the election held last Dec. 14 in which Hotel & Restaurant Workers Local 343 sought to win bargaining rights for workers at Grossinger's, resort hotel in the Catskills.

The NLRB's Buffalo office found that management of the Liberty, N. Y., resort had violated the rule forbidding either an employer or a union from addressing "captive" audiences of employes within 24 hours of a scheduled election.

A Grossinger representative made a speech on company-paid time to many of the hotel's 600 workers the day before the election, the NLRB office ruled. A new election date will be set, it said, after processing union charges of unfair practices by Grossinger management and after a company request for a review of the regional director's action.

Meanwhile the union has renewed its organizing efforts. In a comparison of conditions at Grossinger's and those at the Concord Hotel in the same area, the union has called attention to these features of the first contract for Concord workers:

Periodic wage increases, company payments into a pension plan and a free health and welfare program, time and a half pay for overtime after eight hours, seniority, job security, arbitration of grievances, and other benefits.

Stiffer Overtime Pay Rate, Broader Coverage Urged

Bias Barred In Hospital Aid Law

By David L. Perlman

Private hospitals built with the help of federal grants may no longer discriminate against Negro patients or doctors, and the "separate but equal" clause of the Hill-Burton Act permitting such segregation is unconstitutional.

The Supreme Court let stand a 4th Circuit Court of Appeals decision which specifically knocked out this clause in the 18-year-old Hospital Construction Act, one of the rare federal statutes which countenances segregation.

The appellate court last November, in a 3-to-2 decision, ordered two Greensboro, N. C., hospitals to admit Negro patients on the same basis as white patients and to grant staff privileges to Negro doctors. The hospital had received more than $3.2 million in federal grants under the Hill-Burton Act.

Hospital Plan Rejected

Both hospitals had defended their admitted segregation practices on the basis that the Hill-Burton Act permitted exclusion of Negroes provided that a state plan for hospital services makes "equitable provision" for comparable facilities elsewhere in the area for those excluded.

A series of Supreme Court decisions in recent years has left no question that discrimination in governmental facilities is clearly unconstitutional.

Hill-Burton grants are made to the states, which in turn allocate the funds to both public and nonprofit private hospitals and nursing homes under state plans which must be approved by the U.S. Surgeon General.

The "threshold question," Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff said in his circuit court decision, was whether this procedure gives the policies of participating private hospitals the character of "state action."

A lower federal court held that it did not, and denied the petition for an injunction sought by 11 Negro doctors, dentists and patients who had been refused access to the hospitals.

District Court 'Wrong'

Sobeloff said the district court had "wrongly decided" the case. The hospitals, he said, operated as "integral parts" of "intermeshing state and federal plans" and thus come within the scope of the 14th Amendment's ban on discrimination.

He made it clear that the decision relates specifically to the Hill-Burton Act and does not necessarily cover

Protection Sought For 4.6 Million

Congress has been asked by the AFL-CIO to extend wage-hour protection to millions of additional workers as a "vital weapon" in the nation's war on poverty.

"What possible excuse can there be for paying a laundry worker or a hotel dishwasher less than 50 cents an hour?" AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Kenneth Meiklejohn asked. He testified on behalf of Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller at a House Labor subcommittee hearing.

"It is bad enough to be poor because of unemployment. It is even worse to suffer poverty—the grinding, demeaning poverty of 35 or 50 or 75 cents an hour—while hard at work in a useful occupation," he said.

Meiklejohn urged Congress to bring an additional 2.7 million workers under the Fair Labor Standards Act and to add a ceiling over hours to the minimum wage coverage of 1.9 million workers who currently are only partly protected by the law.

He said labor welcomes the Administration's proposal to extend coverage to 735,000 more workers and remove the overtime exemption from most groups now excluded, as provided in a bill introduced by Subcommittee Chairman James Roosevelt (D-Calif.). Meiklejohn urged, however, that the committee expand on the bill and "go farther along the road . . . toward legal safeguards for those wage-earners who are most in need of them."

He urged extended coverage for these major groups:

OFF THE PICKET LINE and down the street went Striker James Miller (right), a member of Retail Clerks Local 1360 in Philadelphia, in pursuit of a bandit who had just held up the Food Fair store where he was maintaining his vigil. The chase was successful, and $3,742 in loot was recovered. Here Miller, back picketing, receives a $300 reward from Albert Finkelman, manager of the store. Next step for management was to seek an injunction ordering seven RCIA locals back to work.

Doubletime Geared to More Jobs

Doubletime pay for overtime work, through an "across-the-board" amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act, is needed to help reduce the present "intolerable" level of unemployment, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

A higher overtime penalty rate "would open up as many as a million full-time job opportunities," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller declared in testimony before a joint session of two House Labor subcommittees. He was accompanied by AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger.

The two labor witnesses held firm to their estimates of the job-creating potential of higher overtime pay in the face of a heavy barrage of critical questioning from GOP members.

Statistics shot back and forth as committee members contended that increased employment in service industries more than made up for loss of jobs in manufacturing. Goldfinger retorted that the manufacturing losses were in full-time jobs while many of the service jobs were only part-time.

To Republicans who questioned whether union members would be willing to give up overtime just to provide jobs for the unemployed, the AFL-CIO spokesmen said bluntly that the "real fear" of workers is being displaced by automation. The drive for shorter hours

'Substantial' Increase Seen:

1st-Quarter Gains In Profits Likely

A "substantial" gain in profits in auto, steel and many other industries is expected to pace an overall earnings increase in the first three months of 1964, the Wall Street Journal reported.

The 1964 first-quarter profit jump is anticipated on the heels of an 8 percent increase in the final three months of 1963 over the same period a year earlier.

The 8 percent rise is considered especially significant because the profit rate for the fourth quarter of 1962, over which the increase was registered, was the highest for any quarter in recent history with the exception of 1950, when Korean War scare buying boomed profits.

The fourth-quarter rise followed gains of 15.2 percent and 15.9 percent in earlier quarters of 1963, the Journal reported, and was spread widely through industry and business, with only six of 32 groups reporting reduced earnings.

"For the current quarter," the Journal said, "the promise of another year-to-year gain lies mainly in the prospect that at least two of the biggest industries and many smaller ones will show earnings higher by substantial margins. Most of the others expect earnings at least to equal those of the first 1963 quarter."

The auto makers expect a "substantial gain," said the Journal, noting that the industry's fourth-quarter profits were at record highs even though one company, Studebaker, has discontinued making cars in this country.

Also in line for a substantial gain is the steel industry, the Journal said, noting that its fourth-quarter 1963 profits had increased over the 1962 period by 46.7 percent.

Scranton Benefit Slash Faces New Test Mar. 9

Harrisburg, Pa.—A well-oiled campaign by Gov. William W. Scranton (R) to push his unemployment compensation-crippling bill through the legislature has been slowed down, at least momentarily.

Rising statewide opposition, rallied by AFL-CIO unions and state and central bodies, has given Republican senators from industrial areas—most of them hard-hit by joblessness—reason to take a second look at the bill. All Democratic members of the State Senate are announced as opposed.

With the measure originally slated to sail smoothly out of the Senate Labor & Industry Committee and out on to the floor at an earlier date, proponents scheduled a second try on Mar. 9 after several days of heavy inner party turmoil.

The Pennsylvania AFL-CIO called for a Mar. 9 "all-affiliate emergency meeting" in the capital, with representatives from unions throughout the state. High on the agenda was to be discussion of a possible march to the capitol where the legislature is meeting.

The sudden faltering within Republican ranks lessened the chances for swift action. With 26 votes required for passage and exactly 26 Republicans in the Senate, not a single vote can be lost nor a Republican senator be absent.

Seeking a way out, Republican leaders put the bill before their party caucus where amendments were considered to "soften labor opposition," despite the governor's steadfast position that he would accept no compromise.

'Crumbs' from the Loaf

The Pennsylvania AFL-CIO, however, described the amendments as an attempt to "return crumbs from the loaf being taken from the state's jobless."

State AFL-CIO Pres. Harry Boyer announced that labor remains steadfastly opposed to the measure.

"Regardless of amendments, the bill is repressive to those who have no jobs, no money, no means to be heard and only the despair of their lives before them," he said.

'No Rights . . . No Work' In R-T-W, King Charges

A civil rights leader, the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., has condemned so-called "right-to-work" laws as being a denial of both the civil rights and job rights of the nation's Negro workers.

King, a leader in the Negros' struggle for civil rights and equality of opportunity, denounced the current attempt to enact an anti-labor "right-to-work" law in Oklahoma.

"This so-called 'right-to-work' law provides no 'rights' and it provides no 'work'," King said. "It is instead a law to rob us of our civil rights and our job rights."

The anti-collective bargaining proposal will go before Oklahoma voters in the May 5 primary. It is opposed by many of Oklahoma's outstanding church, civic and farm leaders, including leaders of the Negro community. It was rejected by the Oklahoma legislature in two recent sessions.

King urged Oklahomans to vote against the so-called "right-to-work" law in a statement to the Oklahoma National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which was made available to the National Council for Industrial Peace for release in the nation's capital by Jake Simmons, Jr., state NAACP president.

Simmons is a member of the executive board of the Oklahoma Committee to Preserve Free Marketing & Bargaining, which is leading the fight against the attempt to

GE Agrees To 4.25% Rise At Hanford

Wage increases averaging 14 cents an hour have been agreed to by the General Electric Co. and the Hanford, Wash., Atomic Metal Trades Council in a wage reopening agreement covering 3,540 workers at the Hanford plutonium works of the Atomic Energy Commission.

The council, representing production and operating employes in approximately 20 local unions, said the agreement features a 4.25 percent general wage increase, effective Feb. 24, and "breaks" the GE pattern of settlements at other plants—generally 3 percent at the start and 2.5 percent a year later.

The settlement was announced in Washington, D. C., by Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.

Union and management had been bargaining on wage terms since last Aug. 1. After a deadlock the dispute was scheduled for a hearing Mar. 5 before the Atomic Energy Labor-Management Relations panel. The parties returned to the bargaining table at the suggestion of the panel and reached agreement Feb. 29, subject to membership approval.

The pact also provides that GE will pay $137.50 to any employe who transfers to another contractor as GE phases-out its operations at Hanford, where it is the contractor for the AEC.

The contract term is for varying lengths, with June 1967 the final expiration date for GE.

Slaiman Given Civil Rights Directorship

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced the appointment of Donald Slaiman as director of the Dept. of Civil Rights. He has been serving as acting director.

Walter G. Davis becomes assistant director; William E. Pollard of Los Angeles will join the staff, Meany said.

Slaiman, who served in key local union posts with several AFL-CIO unions, holds degrees from City College of New York and the University of Buffalo. He joined the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights in March 1959 after several years as director of the Michigan Labor Committee for Human Rights and regional director of the Jewish Labor Committee.

Davis, who joined the department in 1961, had served as executive vice president and director of education and research for the Transport Service Employes after service as a local steward and president. He has a bachelor's degree from Columbia University.

Pollard, an organizer for the Los Angeles Joint Board of the Hotel & Restaurant Workers, had served as president of the Joint Council of Dining Car Employes. He is chairman of the Labor & Industry Committee of the West Coast Regional National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and a member of the Urban League Labor Committee and the California Committee for Fair Employment Practices.

Railway Clerks Win Representation Vote

Oakland, Calif.—The Railway Clerks easily out-polled the Teamsters in a representation election among clerical and related employes of the National Carloading Corp., which has its headquarters here. The AFL-CIO affiliate had 225 votes to 101 for the IBT, with 2 ballots marked for no union.

Revised CPI Index Shows Price Increase

A newly revised consumer price index shows a one-tenth of 1 percent increase in January to a new high of 107.7 percent of 1957-59 average prices.

The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics changed the market basket of goods and services it uses to compute ups and downs of the cost of living on the basis of new surveys of how consumers spend their money. The market basket was last re-evaluated in 1953.

Under the "old" price index, which will be issued concurrently with the revised CPI through June, there would have been no change from December's price level.

Surveys on which the new index is based showed that workers and their families are spending a smaller portion of their income for food than they did 10 years ago and a larger portion for housing and transportation. The new index also takes into account the spending habits of single wage earners and salaried clerical workers. Previously only families of two or more were included in the sampling.

Escalators No Problem

Union research directors through the Labor Research Advisory Committee to the BLS have urged periodic updating of the index, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research said.

Most union contracts providing escalator cost-of-living clauses are still geared to the old index, but the BLS said it anticipated no serious problems in shifting to the new table. It offered technical assistance to unions and employers to facilitate the changeover.

Quarterly wage adjustments, based on the three-month change in the old index, will bring 1-cent hourly wage increases to about 1 million workers, the BLS said. These include 780,000 auto workers, 100,000 farm and construction machine workers, and 75,000 in aerospace industries.

Factory workers' spendable earnings—including the retroactive effect of the tax cut—moved up in January to record highs of $90.60 for a worker with three dependents and $82.89 for a single worker.

To arrive at these figures, the BLS adjusted the tax cut to reflect an average $2 a week increase in take-home pay for the entire year, even though workers did not receive any portion of it in their January paychecks and will receive a greater amount during the balance of the year.

For 1963 as a whole, the BLS said, spendable earnings averaged about $87.50 for a worker with three dependents and $79.50 for a single worker, a gain of about 2 percent from the previous year. Because of higher living costs, the increase in "real" spendable earnings was about 1 percent.

The price sampling of retail outlets has been revised to cover more suburban stores and discount houses, the BLS said, and the number of items in the "market basket" has been increased from 325 to about 400. Items added range from window air conditioners and garbage disposals to inter-city bus fares and funeral expenses.

The average family whose expenditures were studied in the preparation of the new index had after-taxes spendable income of $6,230 and the average single person a spendable income of $3,560.

Computer Servicemen Win Strike

New York—The most complex electronic computers, as well as the simpler adding machines and typewriters, need the skilled servicing of union members if they are to stay in good working order, the Smith Corona-Marchant Corp. has discovered.

The firm rejected proposed contract improvements during negotiations for a new agreement with Local 459, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and demanded a tightening of clauses spelling out several fringe benefits.

Employes turned down the company's "final" offer and walked out Jan. 17 from locations in New York City, Brooklyn, White Plains, N.Y., and Newark, N.J., and on Jan. 26, when local pacts expired at Philadelphia and Wilmington.

With the aid of Federal Conciliator Douglas Pugh in arranging meetings, a new contract was negotiated under which the union members get wage increases of $7 weekly over two years, protection against job loss due to subcontracting, and improved pension and insurance coverage.

Metal Trades Dept. Elects Anthony Matz

Miami Beach, Fla.—Pres. Anthony Matz of the Firemen & Oilers was elected ninth vice president of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. at a meeting of the executive board here.

Matz takes the place of the late Ray Muehlhoffer, president and secretary-treasurer of the Metal Polishers, who was third vice president of the department. The other vice presidents moved up.

Senators Urge Hearings:

Bill Filed to Compel Sale of Florida Line

Five members of the Senate Banking & Currency Committee have urged early hearings on a bill by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) which would force the sale of the struck Florida East Coast Railway by breaking up the economic empire controlled by the Alfred I. du Pont Estate.

Edward Ball, board chairman of the railroad, is also administrator of the estate, which controls a chain of 31 Florida banks and major industrial enterprises as well as the FEC line. Efforts to deal with Ball in settling the 13-month strike have been described by Assistant Labor Sec. James J. Reynolds as "a lesson in utter futility."

Morse has charged that Congress was "misled" in 1956 when it excluded the banks controlled by the du Pont Estate from the Bank Holding Co. Act in the belief that profits went to charity. In fact, he told the Senate, only 12 percent of the $7.5 million annual income goes to a charitable foundation.

The holding company law prohibits organizations with 25 percent or larger interest in two or more banks from owning nonbanking enterprises.

Banking Committee members who told the Senate early hearings should be held on the Morse bill were Senators Paul H. Douglas (Ill.), William Proxmire (Wis.), Maurine B. Neuberger (Ore.) and Thomas J. McIntyre (N.H.), all Democrats.

Meanwhile, there were these developments:

- Federal mediation efforts continued, but no progress was reported as the railroad continued to reject government-proposed arbitration. The unions have said they are willing to arbitrate.
- A federal judge in Jacksonville granted an injunction sought by the Railroad Trainmen to compel the railroad to cancel unilaterally imposed changes in work rules. Although the operating unions have not been on strike, their members have respected the picket lines set up by the non-operating brotherhoods and the railroad has hired strikebreakers for both groups of workers.
- Chairman G. E. Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives' Association reiterated labor's condemnation of dynamitings which have taken place on the struck railroad, declaring they are harming the union cause.
- Miami Mayor Robert K. High, angered at the railroad's refusal to provide protection at crossings, threatened to block unguarded crossings with police cars. There have been a series of accidents, some fatal, caused by strikebreaker-driven trains colliding with automobiles and trucks at intersections.

Still unsettled is the controversy over FEC deliveries to the Cape Kennedy missile center over a government-owned railroad spur. Thus far the National Aeronautics & Space Agency has refused to comply with recommendations of a government fact-finding board that the struck railroad be barred from the government property.

Tugmen Win Walkout On Wages, Crew Shifts

New York—Harbor tugmen, on strike for 33 days, finally won their demand for wage increases of 50 cents an hour for licensed men and 35 cents for unlicensed men, plus 17.5 cents an hour in pension and welfare benefits.

The 3,200 striking crewmen, who man 350 tugs, harbor tankers and barges, turned down two previous company offers before ratifying the final agreement with the Marine Towing & Transportation Employers. A few hours later the first crews were back at work in the world's busiest port.

The men are members of Local 333, United Marine Division of the National Maritime Union. Negotiators headed by Capt. Joseph O'Hare, president, and Sec.-Treas. Willard Quick won these other improvements in a three-year pact:

Agreement on a study committee to improve the manning schedules looking toward the addition of a fourth shift on ships where relief is needed; a study of manning by an outside agency; provision for a grievance committee to meet quarterly in an effort to iron out grievances before contract expiration.

The new contract provides an increase in pension benefits from the present $75 a month to $100 in the first year and $125 in the second contract year; improved hospitalization and accident coverage; credit of a day off every 20 days on long coastal trips; an adjustment in manning rate differentials, and other fringe benefits.

The strike started Feb. 1 when the tugmen rejected management's "best" offer of a 35-cent increase over three years for licensed men 25 cents for unlicensed. Late in February the offer was increased to 41 and 31 cents, and members voted to hold out for 50 cents and 35 cents.

When five employers broke away from the association group to accept 50 cents and 35 cents, the strikers voted to stay out until everyone got the same gains. The settlement was ratified Mar. 4.

Major issue besides wages and manning schedules was an increase in the differential between captains and crewmen to make licensed jobs more attractive, the union said. That objective was achieved.

Tobacco Pact Yields 36¼-Hour Week

Montreal, Que.—A 36¼-hour workweek with no loss in pay was won by Tobacco Workers Local 318 in a new three-year contract at Canadian Tabacofina Co., Ltd. (Benson & Hedges, Canada, Ltd.).

The plant has been operating 38¾ hours weekly. The second shift was cut immediately to 36¼ hours, while the day shift will make the move in two equal installments this year and next.

The contract also includes a wage increase of 8 cents an hour retroactive to Dec. 1, 1963; another 8 cents next Dec. 1, and 6 cents in 1965. Wages now range between $2.19 and $3.01 an hour for men and from $1.90 to $2.45 for women.

Final Round in 8-Year Fight:

High Court Asked to Review NLRB Darlington Decision

By Eugene A. Kelly

The final round in the eight-year fight of 500 South Carolina textile workers to save their jobs and their local union from extinction at the hands of the country's largest textile manufacturer has opened in the U.S. Supreme Court.

The action moved to the high court when a petition for review was filed for the National Labor Relations Board by U.S. Solicitor Gen. Archibald Cox.

At issue in the crucial legal battle is the right of the Roger Milliken family, owners of the Darlington Mfg. Co., to discontinue operations at the firm's cotton print mill in Darlington, S.C., and discharge its employes without bargaining with the Textile Workers Union of America, winner of a representation election in 1956, shortly before the Millikens shut down the mill.

The union filed unfair labor practice charges and the NLRB ordered management to rehire the discharged workers at another of the Deering & Milliken chain's 102 mills or put them on a rehiring list and give them back pay to the date of discharge. The Millikens refused, and last Nov. 15 the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at Richmond, Va., ruled 3-2 that an employer has an absolute right to go out of business at one location without further obligations for unfair labor practices or back pay to the stranded workers.

Major Questions Spelled Out

Cox in his petition for review said the questions presented to the Supreme Court are these:

- Whether an employer who owns several plants "violates the National Labor Relations Act when he permanently discontinues operations in one plant and discharges its employes to avoid bargaining with the union freely designated by the employes as their representative, and to retaliate against the employes for their union activities."
- Whether the NLRB has the power to order that the fired employes be employed or placed on a preferential list for hiring at other plants, and be given back pay from the date of discharge to the date they are hired again.

Also involved in the suit is the assumption that Darlington and the Deering-Milliken chain are to be treated as a single employer with several plants. Cox, arguing that the assumption is "plainly correct," asked the high court to accept it.

Three 4th Circuit judges, in their decision last year, reversed the NLRB finding that Darlington and the other firm, Deering, Milliken & Co., constituted a single employer liable for back pay.

Other Circuits Cited

They said that "power to command an employer to stay in business indefinitely, or assess him with damages for permanently going out of business, is not an NLRB prerogative." The three are Judges Albert V. Bryan, Herbert S. Boreman and Clement F. Haynsworth.

Attorneys for the fired workers will, if the high court permits, argue for the opinions voiced by the minority, Judges J. Spencer Bell and Chief Judge Simon E. Sobeloff, who said in dissent that management's conduct not only "violates the basic policies" of the labor act but is literally forbidden by the act.

Also, Bell wrote, such conduct has been "held to be an unfair practice by decisions of this and other circuit" courts.

The dissenting opinion noted that after the union won the NLRB election on Sept. 6, 1956, mill officials telephoned Roger Milliken of the union's victory "and one day later, Roger Milliken decided to close down the mill," which was, the court wrote, only a small unit in a "vast industrial empire employing more than 19,000 persons owned and controlled directly or indirectly by the Milliken family."

It said also: "Its closure was intended to be and was a grim deterrent to the thousands of employes in the affiliated plants who might entertain similar notions of unionization. . . . I am convinced that the record as a whole amply supports the (labor) board's findings."

FIFTEENTH ANNIVERSARY of the first Washington legislative conference held by the Textile Workers Union of America was celebrated with a birthday cake and a lone symbolic candle for TWUA Pres. William Pollock to blow out. The union's legislative meetings were originated by AFL-CIO Education Dir. Lawrence Rogin (seated, right), then TWUA education director. Standing are, from left, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Clinton M. Fair and Stanley Rosen, William DuChessi and Paul Swaity of the TWUA.

cripple free collective bargaining in Oklahoma.

King, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and foremost advocate of the non-violent, passive resistance philosophy of the civil rights movement, charged that the so-called "right-to-work" law is a device of "segregationist forces to keep us from achieving our civil rights and our right of equal job opportunity."

"It is an anti-union law," he said. "Its purpose is to destroy the labor unions and the freedom of collective bargaining by which the unions have improved the wages and working conditions of everyone.

"These so-called 'right-to-work' laws, which are not right-to-work laws at all, have been enacted in southern segregationist states in order to make a crime out of anyone trying to achieve the freedoms guaranteed by our Constitution and Bill of Rights.

"It is a whip to preserve the sharecropper wages and poverty system that has been used to 'keep working people in their place.'

"Wherever these state laws have been passed, wages are lower, the job opportunities are fewer and there are no civil rights."

King warned Negro workers not to be "fooled" by the false "right-to-work" slogan. He said:

"This high-sounding label does not mean what it says. It is a dishonest twisting of words with the aim of making a vicious law sound like a good law. It is a travesty on the true meaning of the word 'right'."

The so-called "right-to-work" laws, which have been adopted mainly in anti-labor states, outlaw the right provided by federal law of labor and management to negotiate union security provisions in collective bargaining.

Convention Actions Ready in Book Form

A 202-page volume containing the text of all major policy resolutions adopted by the fifth AFL-CIO convention in November 1963 at New York City is now available.

The book, "Policy Resolutions," contains over 110 resolutions adopted by the convention. Its table of contents lists the policy statements by category.

Also available is the 1,200-page two-volume complete proceedings of the convention.

Copies of both publications can be obtained from the Pamphlet Division, AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 Sixteenth Street, N.W., Washington, D. C. "Policy Resolutions" costs 85 cents per copy or 100 copies for $75. The proceedings are available at $2.75 per volume, $5.50 for the two-volume set.

Unions Assail Use of Dogs in Princess Anne

The Maryland State & D. C. AFL-CIO has strongly protested the setting of police dogs against Negro students from Maryland State College demonstrating for civil rights in Princess Anne, Md.

The council "deplores" the use of dogs "against human beings who are exercising their constitutional privilege of free protest," Pres. Charles A. Della said in a telegram to Gov. J. Millard Tawes (D), and added:

"We sincerely urge you to take steps to see that such practices are halted immediately."

Another protest was filed by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., which found the use of dogs and fire hoses in Maryland "reminiscent . . . of what happened in Birmingham."

Jack Conway, executive director of the department, pointed out that Maryland's equal accommodations law excludes the Eastern Shore, "making the area's Negroes third-class citizens," and said that unless the legislature corrects the situation, the lawmakers must "bear the responsibility for further racial conflict."

"The situation in Princess Anne is hardly unique, even in the North and West," he added. "It highlights the need for passage of the civil rights bill now before the U.S. Senate. It serves notice upon the Senate leadership that failure to break the filibuster and to enact the bill without substantive change will serve only to touch off the present tinderbox of resentment that exists among our Negro, Puerto Rican and other minority citizens."

Dubuque Labor Honors Volunteers

Dubuque, Ia.—Nine women and one man received awards at a Dubuque AFL-CIO meeting for volunteering more than 5,000 hours of work to the central body and the COPE Women's Activities Division. They are Mrs. Nora Barry, Mrs. Augusta Kelly, Mrs. John Grogan, Mrs. Jeanette Parker, Mrs. Bonnie Birch, Mrs. Al Von Ah, Mrs. Marion Miller, Mrs. Maryan Miller, Mrs. Hilda Latimer and Hugh Clark.

25,000 Rail Clerks Win 'Productivity Sharing'

Cincinnati—A supplemental pay plan, geared to semi-annual shipment-handling productivity gains, is the major feature of a new and revolutionary type of national labor agreement between REA Express and some 25,000 of its employes represented by the Railway Clerks.

Reached with assistance of the National Mediation Board, the pact was jointly announced by Pres. C. L. Dennis of the union and REA Pres. William B. Johnson. It provides for employe cash shares in shipment productivity increases in each of two six-month periods, beginning July 1.

The productivity gains, determined from regularly maintained operations data, can stem from any combination of management's capital investment and methods improvements, business growth in terms of greater shipment volume, and increased individual employe efforts.

Since late 1959, REA has reorganized its operations and management procedures, spending some $62 million for automotive and materials-handling equipment, construction of more than 60 new terminals and facilities and other capital improvements. Through new rate and service concepts, the express company has become an increasingly more competitive factor in the small shipments transportation field.

In addition to the supplemental pay plan, under which 3 cents an hour is guaranteed for the two periods, the agreement provides for various substantial aggregate increases and is retroactive to July 1, 1963.

Estimated Cost $17 Million

The total cost of the wage increase package through June 30, 1965, was estimated at some $17 million.

"The novel productivity share feature," the joint announcement said, "gives these employes, clerical, platform, vehicle and train personnel, a further direct and significant stake in the private enterprise operations and economics of the express business and a direct financial interest in the growth of the company's business volume."

The productivity cash share plan is termed "non-inflationary," the announcement noted, because it is designed to provide additional compensation, but avoid unit-cost increase pressures for higher shipment rates that would be paid by the shipping public.

The union and company presidents said that the productivity cash share concept was "born out of recognition by REA and the BRC of the realities of change in our dynamic society and the resulting needs to lead in sound and carefully planned experimentation of new ways and new methods."

"The Railway Clerks, in other transportation labor negotiations, and REA, in its drive for stability and profitability and in its efforts to achieve a more competitive status as to rates and service, previously have demonstrated their common belief and willingness in taking a chance on what is new and untried."

Under a plan tailored to REA Express' nationwide operations, the cash productivity shares will be determined under a formula resulting in a total share amount per hour for the aggregate gains over the same period for the previous year. Each individual BRC employe's cash payment will be that amount, multiplied by his total straight-time hours for the six-month period, generally about 1,000.

The Railway Clerks have represented most express employes since 1920.

Working with REA and the BRC during the mediation proceedings were NMB Chairman Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., and Mediator Tedford E. Schoonover.

Allis-Chalmers Settles U.S. Claim

The Allis-Chalmers Co., one of the 29 companies indicted in Philadelphia in 1960 on charges of conspiring to fix prices in the electrical industry, has agreed to pay the federal government $185,000 to settle damage claims.

The firm was the 12th to meet the government's damage claims, for a total of $8.8 million. The agreement, due to be filed soon in the U.S. District Court in Philadelphia, compensates the government for overcharges on electrical equipment worth $5.9 million sold to the Tennessee Valley Authority and other U.S. agencies.

Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said the settlement takes into account the pattern of agreements reached with other indicted companies; current competitive conditions in the industry, and the impact of private damage suits against the company. Some 1,800 private suits have been filed against the firms involved in the case.

Affluence—and Poverty

THE LABOR DEPT.'S revision of the consumer price index has touched off a spate of news stories and commentaries about the growing affluence of urban wage earners, making much of a drop in average expenditures for food and an increase in spending for housing, transportation and health and recreation.

A closer examination of the data on which the new CPI is based, in terms of actual income levels rather than averages, discloses that spending patterns vary greatly and that providing for the basic necessities is still a crushing burden for that segment of the population earning below $3,000 a year—the poverty level.

In Chicago, for example, the data show wage earners in the $2,000-to-$3,000 income bracket spending 29.1 percent for food in 1963 compared to 20.8 percent for those earning $15,000 and up. This is further underscored by the fact that the 20.8 percent in the higher income group is figured after provision for savings; the lower income group has no savings and the majority is spending more than it actually earns.

The $2,000-to-$3,000 group spends 35 percent of its income for housing compared to 27.7 percent for the $15,000 plus group. And, as could be expected, the low-income wage-earners spend less for medical care, transportation and recreation.

Thus, those living in a state of poverty spend two-thirds of their income for food and shelter with one-third left to cover all else.

The point to be drawn from the new CPI is that changed spending patterns may be found in the average worker earning somewhere between $5,500 and $6,500 a year with his major source of income coming from wages or salaries.

But in this case, as in so many others, the averages conceal the bare existence pattern of living at the poverty level as well as the pattern of the upper-income groups which in the Chicago figures had average savings of 35 percent of after-tax income.

While the new index is a useful tool to measure the price changes that affect so many of the nation's economic activities, it provides also an insight into the distorted nature of income distribution and, more pointedly, a close-up of how the poor and wealthy live.

The Unprotected

THE FEDERAL wage-hour law is a guarantee of a minimum level of subsistence and human dignity; the fact that millions of low-wage American workers are not protected by its provisions is a continuing and grievous shortcoming.

Of the estimated 44 million workers in non-supervisory or non-governmental jobs, only 27 million are currently covered by the law placing a floor under wages and a ceiling over hours. Millions of low-wage workers who need the protection most urgently are excluded from the protection of the law.

They include workers in restaurants, hotels, laundries, agricultural processing, cotton ginning, small logging operations, hospitals and other health services, theaters, non-profit organizations and farms.

Millions more are excluded from coverage under the federal act because they are not engaged in interstate commerce and must seek protection under state laws which, by and large, are far inferior to the present federal statute and in many cases are non-existent or limited to a few special categories of workers.

The nation has a moral obligation to extend wage-hour law protection to 4.6 million workers now exempt or excluded from full protection, especially those in the low-pay occupations.

'How About Letting Us In?'

Federationist Article Says:

More of Uncle Sam's Employes Are Joining a Union Every Day

(The following is excerpted from an article in the March issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist entitled "The Government Worker Goes Union.")

THE FEDERAL government is sampling for the first time the collective bargaining it long urged on private industry—and finding it palatable.

It is admittedly a weaker brew than that served in the private sector of the economy. Nevertheless it has proved a potent stimulant to union activity in a civil service system weaned on paternalism.

Two years after Pres. Kennedy directed federal agencies to recognize and bargain with unions representing their employes, 700,000 government employes are working under union contract—nearly one-third of the civil service. A dues checkoff has been authorized. Some 15,000 local union leaders have taken part in AFL-CIO training programs covering such trade union fundamentals as grievance procedures, contract enforcement and negotiating protocol.

These impressive totals include the postal unions, which had their jurisdiction well-organized before Jan. 17, 1962, the date of Kennedy's executive order. In the largest union representation election ever held—a nationwide mail ballot—they won bargaining rights for 490,000 workers.

But no one who has followed the progress of federal employe unionism outside of the postal service and a handful of other organized enclaves can fail to be impressed by the burst of activity during the past two years.

The AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., well-represented but far from having majority status at most naval shipyards, put on major organizing drives which led to exclusive bargaining rights for some 60,000 workers at 10 of 11 shipyards and nearly 25,000 more at other installations.

The Government Employes passed the 125,000 mark in dues-paying membership, a gain of nearly 35,000 since the executive order. District 44 of the Machinists, in addition to sharing in the metal trades progress, won a string of bargaining elections on its own and reports a 35 percent membership gain.

Other crafts have comparable success stories and organizations new to federal unionism have entered the picture. Maritime unions, for example, now bargain for more than 4,000 seamen on government vessels. The Building Service Employes speak for workers at some veterans' hospitals and other places.

There have been problems, frustrations and disappointments as well as progress. Neither the ground rules for collective bargaining nor the manner in which agencies have implemented them have been satisfactory. But this has not detracted from the appreciation of how far the federal government has moved—under the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations—from what could be described as an "uncle knows best" policy.

AT THE TIME of the executive order, it was estimated that roughly between 5 and 10 percent of the government's classified employes were union members, but even this overstated the degree of white collar unionization. While all clerical and professional employes are in the classified civil service, not all classified employes are in white collar fields. Union strongholds in the classified service include such cohesive groups as meat inspectors, guards and Veterans Administration hospital attendants.

After two years of union recognition and collective bargaining, there is still only a small, though growing, percentage of government white collar workers carrying union cards—in either an AFL-CIO union or in a scattering of unaffiliated groups. Some of the latter have moved closer to trade union functions while others have openly deplored the trend towards collective bargaining.

Nevertheless there have been some dramatic breakthroughs—convincing evidence that it is possible to organize a large segment of government white collar employes.

An American Bar Association committee noted in a report on the government's labor relations policy that "most agencies are much too devoted to their own regulations. They must learn that regulations are not Holy Writ. They can be changed or modified—and they can also be discussed or negotiated."

The report noted with approval that the Post Office Dept. has agreed that provisions in its national contracts supersede any inconsistent sections of the Postal Manual, the department's unilaterally written book of regulations.

And so groups of government employes have been winning the . . . ingredients of industrial democracy.

Morgan Says:

Political Action by Corporations May Put Propaganda in Schools

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

ON WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, one of the nation's most responsible newspapers, took note editorially and with some concern of the growing movement among corporations to train their employes in the fine art of politics. True, said the Post Dispatch, the more businessmen and all citizens know about the art of government "and the more they contribute their personal services to it, the better for the country as a whole."

Morgan

"There are, however," it went on, "potential pitfalls in the burgeoning political programs of Republic Steel, General Electric, Ford, American Can and some 350 other corporations which have already given some half a million persons such training.

"Bipartisan though they are set up to be, their cast is predominantly Republican, which is well enough and in the nature of things, but all the more reason to make sure that education does not become indoctrination under economic pressure.

"A pitfall of truly impressive dimensions would be entered if corporations should follow the advice of Harold C. Lumb, vice president . . . at Republic Steel, that this political education movement should address itself to influencing public school education.

" 'The public affairs movement has yet to make a real impact on the schools—particularly on curricula and textbooks,' says Mr. Lumb. 'Here we should work cooperatively with curriculum committees to see that our viewpoint is represented. For example, the Educational Research Council of Cleveland is presently revising the entire school science curriculum for about 40 schools, and we're cooperating with them to see that this job is well done'."

The Post-Dispatch concluded that "if corporation political education is to keep its skirts clean, it will scrupulously forbear from trying to interfere in the teaching of the American child. For those who like Mr. Lumb appear to think otherwise, the record of electric power companies in propagandizing public school textbooks and teaching several decades ago should be a warning."

The power company lobby may or may not have abandoned its efforts to ghost-write textbooks but other businesses have not, and the utilities themselves are currently involved in another kind of brain-washing—home and/or office movies.

In a Senate speech some weeks ago, the junior senator from Montana, Lee Metcalf, revealed in full detail an elaborate scenario casting the privately-owned power companies in the heroic role of defenders of that virginal maiden, Free Enterprise, against the sinister motives of the villain, Public Power, alias Creeping Socialism, whose many disguises include the Rural Electrification Administration. The label on this public relations package is "Project Action" and the prize inside is a 30-minute movie in full color entitled "The Power Within."

THE INSTRUCTIONS on how to screen the movie are, if possible, more fascinating than the plot in which a fearless and imaginary congressman importunes a farmer named Ed Jenkins and his son Bill to get cracking and slay the dragon of Big Government before it devours them all. The rule book describes how to recruit an audience from plant personnel, PTA's, church groups, chambers of commerce and even trade unions. Then it tells how the narrator and the film can leave the spectators spellbound after "opening their minds."

When the reel is finished, it cautions, "leave the lights off for a few seconds and then turn them up slowly . . . if possible. A sudden brilliance, noise, movement or change of atmosphere can destroy much of the feeling you have created in each individual"—who, obviously in a red-blooded, fighting mood now, will fire off a letter to his congressman demanding that REA be prevented from muscling in on the private power companies—whose heart-rending story, in effect, is being financed by tax-paying consumers because the cost of Project Action, presumably, is written off as business expense.

How electrifyingly influential these kilowatted Perils of Pauline will be remains to be seen but the effort is only part of a continuing big business campaign "to get its story across," as the saying goes. The American Federationist, a trade union monthly, reports for example that a few years ago the Akron, O., Chamber of Commerce spent $12,000 on a history book for Akron grade schools extolling the free enterprise system.

Our open society is worthy of being extolled but should its history be written by press agents or historians? Public power versus private power is a legitimate issue, but it should be debated candidly in open forums, not smuggled into the national consciousness by a kind of hypnosis. And politics is a game we should all learn how to play better but under standard rules, not under ulterior pressure or by surreptitious coaching from the sidelines—whether from a corporation, a labor union or any other special interest group.

Washington Reports:

Pilots of Civil Rights Bill in House Defend Accommodations Title

REP. EMANUEL CELLER (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, says he is hopeful that the civil rights bill will pass the Senate as it did the House.

Celler, who teamed with the ranking Republican on the committee, Rep. William M. McCulloch (R-O.), to pilot the legislation through the House, was interviewed with McCulloch on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

Celler said he thought the overwhelming 290-130 vote in the House, involving a strong coalition of northern and western Democrats and Republicans, the leadership of the late Pres. Kennedy and the backing of Pres. Johnson, will assure success in the Senate.

McCulloch said those who advocate that the controversial public accommodations section be made voluntary for a time do not reckon with the fact that compliance could have been voluntary back through many years, but there has been no such compliance.

"I think, if we are to have an end to discrimination by reason of color or national origin, we must have legislative nudging at the federal level," the Ohio Republican asserted.

(Sen. Everett Dirksen (R-Ill.), minority leader in the Senate, has advocated that the title be made voluntary for a period.)

McCULLOCH ALSO declared that those who have been calling the public accommodations section unconstitutional are basing their arguments on a Supreme Court decision of 75 years ago. Since then, he said, the situation has basically changed.

Celler explained the bill would "provide that where a state discriminates [by denying voting rights because of race or color] that state, to the degree of its discrimination, shall have its representation in Congress—that is numbers of congressmen—cut down to the degree that it discriminates." [The Fifteenth Amendment authorizes Congress to enforce this principle by legislation.]

McCulloch, answering the contention that a businessman has a right to decide who he is and is not going to serve, declared that Anglo-Saxon law has long held that anyone who goes into such business is there to serve the public, provided those who come are reputable.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

GOV. ROCKEFELLER FLEW into this capital, delaying a return to his New Hampshire primary campaigning, to get himself clearly lined up with other Republican leaders who seem to have decided that foreign policy is the issue on which they choose to belabor Pres. Johnson, at least for the moment.

The governor of New York obviously was seeking maximum mileage in his press conference, and Washington was the place he had the best chance to get it. Many of the things he said here had already been uttered in New Hampshire and points west, but he put all of them together and possibly sharpened them somewhat.

The foreign policy issue—"What about Cuba? Vietnam? Cyprus?"—is being stressed now in speeches by all announced and potential GOP presidential candidates, by the Republican congressional committees, by the "leadership" group, Sen. Everett McK. Dirksen of Illinois and Rep. Charles A. Halleck of Indiana.

The Dirksen-Halleck approach seemed as adroitly designed as any other, because it boiled down to a statement that the country was worried by bad news from Vietnam but that it was up to Johnson, not the GOP, to invent a new policy that would produce more satisfactory results.

The approach has the additional merit of validity, because the President does in fact bear the burden of foreign policy leadership and has access to information both more detailed and more balanced than governors and members of Congress can get.

At the same time, a concentration of criticism on foreign policy can become either negative or tedious in the end. When a President starts campaigning for his own re-election, the advantage of his position in discussing world issues is enormous.

IN COMMENTING on the somewhat confused New Hampshire primary, Rockefeller said he would consider his showing a "victory" if he managed to "win" by "one vote." And that is a fair estimate.

The announced candidates who are running full-scale campaigns, complete with delegate slates and functioning political staffs, are Rockefeller and Sen. Goldwater.

But there is widespread suspicion that the GOP balloting will end up with results more encouraging to the potential convention nominees who aren't there—either former Vice Pres. Nixon or Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge—than to the hard-working open candidates.

Sen. Margaret Chase Smith of Maine, also an announced candidate for the nomination, conducted a campaign that was baffling in its low-pressure friendliness without any real request for votes. She was soon considered as likely to poll only a small fraction of the total—and the total itself was considered as not likely to be overwhelmingly large.

The trouble is that Rockefeller, Nixon and Gov. William W. Scranton of Pennsylvania generally are thought of as representing the northern internationalist wing of the GOP, with major differences between them on details of domestic policy. So is Mrs. Smith, who has an individualistic voting record in the Senate.

The hard-shell conservatives are left with Goldwater, who certainly isn't gaining ground. The New Hampshire voting on Mar. 10, however, should clear up a few things at least tentatively.

THE SCRANTON ELEMENT in the presidential sweepstakes has become the most interesting. The Pennsylvania governor insists he will accept an "honest" draft but that he won't seek the nomination actively.

His speech to the New York Economics Club greatly impressed the businessmen members with its "call for leadership" and his repudiation of what he indicated had been a Republican attitude—a habit of being cast in a negative role, always on the defensive. (This is exactly what younger GOP members of the House think, which is why they want to change the leadership.)

But Scranton immediately reiterated to reporters that he wasn't running for anything and wouldn't run for anything, and he ordered his press secretary to try to get his name off the Oregon primary ballot—where he had been listed without his consent.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL as passed by the House is effective and comprehensive legislation and should now be approved by the Senate, the men who piloted the measure through the House, Rep. William M. McCulloch (R-O.), left, and Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

Hoffa Guilty In Federal Jury-Fix Case

Chattanooga — Teamsters Pres. James R. Hoffa was convicted here by a federal court jury on two counts of jury tampering in an earlier court case that ended in a hung jury and a mistrial.

Maximum penalty provided by law is five years in prison and a $5,000 fine on each count. Sentencing will be delayed until the trial court completes hearings on a defense motion for a mistrial on complaints that Hoffa, his co-defendants and counsel were harassed by government surveillance.

Hoffa, free in $75,000 bail set by U.S. District Judge Frank W. Wilson, said he would appeal the verdict.

Two of the Teamsters Union president's co-defendants, Chicago insurance man Allen Dorfman and a West Virginia businessman, Nicholas J. Tweel, were acquitted.

Convicted with Hoffa were Ewing King of Nashville, former president of Teamsters Local 327; Larry Campbell, a business agent of Hoffa's home Local 299 in Detroit; and Thomas E. Parks, Campbell's uncle and an employe of a Nashville funeral home.

1962 Trial

Hoffa was tried in late 1962 in Nashville on charges of accepting illegal payments from an employer. Two members of the jury were excused before consideration of the evidence began and were replaced by other members of the jury panel.

The jury here deliberated for five hours and 40 minutes before reaching its verdict. Its members were praised by Wilson for "conscientious and obvious dedication."

The Teamsters were expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957 on findings of domination by corrupt influences. At a Teamsters convention earlier that year, at which Hoffa was elected president to succeed Dave Beck, federation Ethical Practices Committee charges of improper practices were read to the delegates but immediately expunged from the convention record.

GBBA Urges State Action On Pay Floor

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The war against poverty demands a "massive effort" to enact state minimum wage laws with standards no lower than those set by federal statutes, the executive board of the Glass Bottle Blowers said in a resolution passed at a meeting following sessions of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The board declared it is apparent that "the great bulk of this nation's islands of poverty" is composed of the 17 million workers not now covered by the federal Wage-Hour Act.

Only 29 states "make any pretense at setting a legal minimum wage," it noted, with most of what state laws do exist "archaic, totally inadequate and, at times, ridiculous." The board cited Arkansas, whose minimum wage law was adopted in 1915 and calls for "the grand sum of 16 cents an hour."

GBBA locals were urged to join with AFL-CIO city and state central bodies to fight "as long as necessary" to secure passage of state minimum wage laws based on the federal pay floor. The AFL-CIO is backing a federal minimum of $2 an hour.

Discrimination Banned In Hospital Aid Act

all recipients of federal aid where state action is not involved.

The distinction is significant since the House-passed Civil Rights bill, now pending in the Senate, authorizes the government to suspend federal grants to any program administered on a discriminatory basis. Opponents of this provision are expected to argue that there is no longer any need for legislation on the basis of the Hill-Burton decision, although in fact the court limited its findings to this single program.

In what the court noted as an "unusual" action, the Justice Dept. joined in attacking the constitutionality of the "separate but equal" proviso. Normally the Attorney General supports the constitutionality of laws passed by Congress.

A spokesman for the legal defense fund of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which fought the case through the courts, hailed the outcome as "an entering wedge for Negro physicians into the mainstream of medical practice in the South."

It remains to be seen, the NAACP added, "whether the medical profession will voluntarily follow the law or whether a long, hard process of litigation such as we have had with schools will be necessary."

A spokesman for the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare told the AFL-CIO News that the Surgeon General's office is no longer approving any requests for Hill-Burton grants for segregated institutions. He said the policy was adopted last November after the circuit court's decision.

The effect of the Supreme Court's refusal to review the decision is to leave the appellate court ruling unchallengeable in the five-state jurisdiction of the 4th Circuit Court. While it is possible for another circuit court to arrive at a contrary opinion, this is considered unlikely in view of the Supreme Court's refusal of review in the North Carolina case.

Another federal law still on the books—the Land Grant College Act—also has a "separate but equal" clause. The colleges which receive land grant funds are all state institutions and presumably come within the scope of the constitutional ban on discrimination by governmental bodies.

Cocoa Beach, Fla.—Mrs. Jean Larson of the Communications Workers has been appointed Women's Activities Div. director of COPE for Florida's 11th congressional district.

In Congressional Report:

Employers Nudged On Retraining Costs

The Joint Economic Committee called on management to "accept retraining and other human displacement costs" resulting from automation as charges against alleged savings "rather than avoid them by shifting such costs onto the shoulders of government or the displaced individual laborer."

The committee in its comments on Pres. Johnson's Economic Report also declared that labor and management should follow policies "which permit the gains of productivity to be generalized through price reductions."

The Democratic majority on the committee hailed the recently adopted tax cut legislation, saying it was properly timed for a "healthy" expansion of the economy. The slash, said the majority, removes any need for a tight money policy through higher interest rates in terms of fighting inflation.

The six-man Republican minority differed, declaring that the size of the tax cut and its timing were "likely to result in a build-up of inflationary pressures" and that the Administration should abandon its "easy money bias."

The majority indicated that the responsibility for any future inflation rests in the hands of manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers. If they use the tax cut "as an excuse to raise prices, they will defeat the original purposes of the tax bill," the majority said.

It argued that a stable price level would be disrupted by an "arbitrary reduction in the workweek from 40 to 35 hours or less." It welcomed the "evolutionary" trend of historical reduction in the workweek and said it should continue "so long as changes can be made within a framework of stable and declining unit labor costs."

On legislation to "place a higher penalty on overtime as a means of increasing employment," the majority called for "thorough study" to determine its probable effects on both unit labor costs and employment. It added that until such a study is made, "this committee cannot make a valid economic judgment."

The Republican minority attacked the doubletime for overtime proposal as "wrong in theory and worse in practice."

On automation, the majority said the objectives of the Employment Act of 1946 must "be vigorously pressed to assure the maintenance of a healthy and dynamic economy to the end that those fired or not hired as a consequence of automation will have little difficulty in finding a demand for their services elsewhere."

High Court Affirms '1 Person, 1 Vote' Rule

The U.S. Supreme Court has affirmed its "one person, one vote" opinion on congressional districting in a case involving seats in Texas but indicated that it will not press for immediate action where the congressional election process has started to operate.

The court in its 7-to-2 decision did not spell out the timing but said Texas officials could have until Apr. 1 to ask the trial court for relief from its judgment that all 23 congressional seats must be filled at-large unless new districts are drawn.

The Supreme Court suggested that the trial court consider the problem "in the light of the present circumstances, including the imminence of the forthcoming election and the operation of the election machinery."

Filings for congressional primaries closed Feb. 3 in Texas and the campaign is under way, with the election set for May 2.

Some legal authorities saw in the decision the implication that the Supreme Court will not press for immediate redistricting in any state where the election process is already operating.

Beyond the timing element, the court affirmed its decision of last month in the Georgia case that congressional districts must be substantially equal in population, employing the principle of one person, one vote.

The Texas districts that touched off the case are widely differing in population, ranging from 951,527 in the Dallas district to 216,371 in a neighboring rural district.

'Be Cautious With Those Tests,' Educators Warn

"Psychological" tests of workers and prospective workers by management personnel departments are not "infallible" measures of an employe's abilities or qualifications, and union negotiators must learn how to prevent their misuse, two educators have pointed out.

In a report titled "Be Cautious With Those Tests," a warning against their use to bypass seniority was sounded by John H. Metzler, associate chairman of the industrial relations department at the Newark College of Engineering, 5,000-student school in New Jersey, and Dr. E. V. Kohrs, consulting psychologist at Stevens Institute of Technology, Hoboken, N. J., which enrolls 2,000 students.

Joint authors of the report published in the February-March issue of Labor Today, a journal of opinion, they note that "tests are not sufficiently accurate to be the only device for selecting persons for any specified purpose—marriage, attending college, or promotion on the job."

The authors report that "the misuse of testing, particularly in selecting personnel for promotion, is a matter of concern" to workers because of the growing practice of arbiters in "approving the right of a company to use testing as a qualifying agent for promotion."

The union negotiator today, they note, must be knowledgeable and must either have information on testing or know where to get it. Among the first sources checked for information, they say, should be the research department of the negotiator's own international union or of the AFL-CIO and its constituent departments.

Among danger points in testing the educators note these two:

- The test may not have been constructed properly, or may not have been validated or weighted properly.
- Those administering the test may, through lack of knowledge or skill, be misusing it and its results.

Even then, Metzler and Kohrs said, there is no proof that the tests will determine what they are supposed to measure.

On the subject of personality tests, they said "when you make a definite statement concerning what such a test disclosed about a person, you are in the same position as the horseplayer making a bet on the longest odds."

Because of the inexactness of statistical methods used in testing, they continued, it would be incorrect to say, as some testers do, that a difference of a few percentage points in tests is important.

Also, they report, "every reputable test has a manual describing how the test was constructed, where the norm groups were secured, the numbers involved, and all other details concerning both the test and the single correct procedure to follow in giving it." A union representative in such cases should, the article says, "secure a copy of the manual and read it correctly."

In judging a test, they add, the union must ask: "What characteristic does this test measure? Is this characteristic necessary for this job? If so, in what quantity?"

Metzler teaches trade union classes at Rutgers University and formerly was a staff representative for the Firemen & Oilers.

Toronto ILGWU Pact Increases Wages 7%

Toronto, Ont.—Eighteen hundred members of the Ladies' Garment Workers will receive 7 percent wage increases under a new 30-month contract with the Toronto Sportswear Manufacturers' Association, which represents 20 employers.

The contract provides pay boosts of 4 to 8 percent for piece workers and $3 to $5 a week for hourly-paid employes. Retirement benefits were increased from $50 to $60 a month and weekly sick benefits from $20 to $24.

Under Scranton's Proposal:

Jobless Aid Cut $35 Million, Employer Tax Up $4 Million

The unemployment compensation changes proposed by Pennsylvania's Gov. William W. Scranton would reduce benefits paid workers by $35 million a year while increasing the tax contribution of employers by only $4 million, the AFL-CIO has charged.

The Republican governor "is asking unemployed workers in the state to bear the largest share of the brunt of making the program solvent," said Raymond Munts, assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security.

Pennsylvania is one of 23 states which have "underfinanced" their jobless insurance programs for so long that "now they've reached the end of the road" and Scranton is "asking the worker to take the brunt of this bad planning," Munts said on Labor News Conference, public affairs program sponsored by the AFL-CIO and broadcast by the Mutual radio network.

"What is significant in the Pennsylvania story," Munts told Washington Correspondents Joseph Loftus of the New York Times and Anthony Day of the Philadelphia Bulletin, "is that a possible presidential candidate is using this to ride to power. And I feel strongly that anybody who tries to ride to power by sideswiping the unemployed today had better examine his constituency as well as his conscience."

Scranton's proposals on jobless benefits and similar assaults in other states were sharply criticized by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its February meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., where Pres. George Meany told newsmen that labor will "do everything possible" to help Pennsylvania workers fight the governor's attempts to weaken the existing law.

The council in a statement said "unemployment insurance should be an important part of our national arsenal against poverty" and added that enforcement of federal minimum standards, as proposed by the Administration, would do much to prevent poverty from spreading and without cost to the federal government.

More than 500,000 persons are out of work in Pennsylvania, Munts commented, and only about 230,000 or 240,000 of these are now drawing state insurance benefits.

Scranton, he said, proposes to eliminate from the latter group about 90,000 to 100,000 persons. And these, he pointed out, "are the low-paid workers, the persons who have been unemployed the longest, and persons who have had the most intermittent employment" during the last year.

Benefits Cut, Too

Noting that under present law, a Pennsylvania worker exhausts the "first round" of benefits after 30 weeks and then must wait 22 weeks before reapplying, Munts said the governor proposes that "you will not be entitled to any more benefits" after 52 weeks unless you have found work in the meantime.

"That's fine," he said, "if jobs are available. But what does he propose to do about these folks who have been looking for work, who are eligible to draw benefits and who haven't been able to find jobs?"

It is a myth, Munts asserted, that employers will "leave" Pennsylvania or "any other state" because of an unemployment insurance tax rate of 2 or 3 percent. He cited testimony before Congress of a U.S. Chamber of Commerce spokesman that a "comparison of average employer tax rates in the various states does not support this view" of rates being a factor.

By contrast, Munts quoted Scranton as saying that "company after company" has listed the unemployment compensation laws and "the condition of our fund" as a major reason for locating in another state. He added:

"Employers . . . at the state level . . . intimidate state legislatures and governors and politicians to try to get lower rates" but in testifying about proposals for a federal law, which would put all states on an equal competitive basis, "business does an about-face and says that [the tax] isn't a factor."

Two Reporters Split Guild's Broun Award

The Heywood Broun Award, for the best newspaper work of 1963 in the tradition of the Newspaper Guild's first president, has been presented jointly to reporters on two eastern papers—Samuel Stafford of the Washington Daily News and Arthur W. Geiselman, Jr., of the York, Pa., Gazette & Daily.

Stafford wrote a series of news stories exposing abuses in the distribution of surplus food in the U.S. capital. Geiselman spearheaded a long drive against housing code violations. Both campaigns brought corrective action by city officials.

The judges, whose decision was unanimous, were Alfred Friendly, managing editor of the Washington Post; Richard Hollander, managing editor of the News; and Julius Frandsen, Washington manager for United Press Intl.

The work of the two reporters was, the judges said, in the finest tradition of Broun "in endless and painstaking kindliness for the poor, the weak, and those whom he thought oppressed."

Geiselman's award was his second. In 1957 he shared the honor for a series of stories which led to police reforms. The co-winner that year was Aaron Epstein of the Daytona Beach, Fla., Journal & News.

The 1963 award winners shared a $500 cash prize and received ANG citations at a luncheon given by the ANG executive board. The presentation was made by Hollander for the three judges.

The judges gave a first honorable mention to a two-page story by A. H. Raskin in the New York Times of Apr. 1, 1963, on the New York newspaper strike and lockout. They said that, though it was a different field from those considered for the Broun Award, its "rigorous objectivity on a subject with which the reporter was intimately and personally involved, plus its punctilious and exhaustive reporting, made it one of the outstanding pieces of journalism" of the year.

Raskin was for many years the Times' chief labor reporter and now is a member of its editorial board.

Other honorable mention awards went to Robert Poos of the St. Louis bureau of the Associated Press for stories which helped win a parole for an 84-year-old man jailed at 20 for a murder; and to Robert Coughlan of Life magazine for a story of conflict between two famous nuclear scientists, Dr. J. Robert Oppenheimer and Dr. Edward Teller.

ILU Body Drafts Plan To Deal with Apartheid

Geneva—A coordinated program for dealing with South Africa's apartheid policy of racial discrimination was cleared by the Intl. Labor Organization's Governing Body for consideration by the ILO June conference.

At a four-day session here, the Governing Body, the ILO's 48-member executive group, adopted the drafts of two proposed constitutional amendments that would permit disciplinary action against South Africa.

The first would enable the ILO Conference to expel or suspend any member-states against which similar action had been taken by the United Nations, the ILO's parent body.

The second proposed amendment would permit the barring from the ILO Conference of any member-state found by the UN to be "flagrantly and persistently pursuing by its legislation a declared policy of racial discrimination such as apartheid."

Doubts Cited

U.S. Assistant Sec. of Labor George L-P Weaver led the group which held that all actions of a political nature should first be determined by the UN.

"Chaotic conditions" would result from the assumption by UN technical agencies of the "political responsibility of the UN proper," Weaver said.

There was some doubt among the Governing Body's worker members that the proposed amendment represented the "best possible solution," Jean Moeri, their veteran Swiss leader, said.

Nevertheless, the draft was adopted by 32 votes to 14, with 2 abstentions. The other parts of the anti-South African program were adopted without opposition.

These included an accelerated procedure for dealing with challenged credentials at the annual conference. Under the proposed change, decisions on challenges would be made early in the meeting.

Neither of the proposed constitutional changes can come into force before the 1965 conference and, even if passed this year, would still require ratification by two-thirds of the ILO's 110 member-states.

The Soviet bloc filed a proposal for an examination of the "social consequences of colonialism" but withdrew it when no support was voiced for what Moeri termed a "propaganda resolution."

A meeting of consultants on workers' education was scheduled by the Governing Body for the end of this year. Measures for getting young workers interested in the development of strong trade unions in the countries where organized labor is at an early stage will be studied.

Another step in the defense of workers was taken with the appointment of a three-man committee to make an on-the-spot investigation of charges that trade union rights are denied in Japan.

David L. Cole, former director of the U.S. Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, was named to serve on the committee. Its other members are Erik Dreyer, former president of the state mediation board in Denmark, and Sir Arthur Tyndall, a former judge on New Zealand's Court of Arbitration.

The Governing Body approved for submission to the June conference a 1965 budget of $18,684,347, an increase of $2,295,548 over the current year.

Chester Wright Dies; Adviser To Gompers

Miami, Fla.—Chester M. Wright, an adviser to the late Samuel Gompers, founding president of the former AFL, and a widely-known labor publicist, died at his home here after a short illness. He was 81.

He was founder and editor of Chester Wright's Labor Letter, part of Chester Wright Associates, a research and publications office he founded in Washington in 1933. He dissolved the firm to retire in 1948 and sold the Letter to John Herling, who has continued it.

He was editor of the Socialist Call, New York, from 1914 to 1916 and began his association with Gompers during World War I. He served as publicity director for the American Alliance for Labor & Democracy, which Gompers had founded, and later served as English-language secretary of the Pan-American Federation of Labor.

He is survived by his widow, June; two sons, a daughter and four grandchildren. Funeral services and burial were held here.

Scranton Benefit Slash Faces 2d Test Mar. 9

The governor later stated that by refusing compromise he meant that he was holding firm to the "principles" of the bill, which he claimed were to rebuild the fund, attract new industry and close "loopholes."

Scranton's bill, sharply criticized by the AFL-CIO Executive Council as attacking the unemployed rather than unemployment, would eliminate entirely or drastically cut unemployment compensation benefits for two out of every five now eligible. The first-year loss to the jobless under the bill is estimated to be $55 million.

The measure would penalize seasonal workers, low-paid and intermittent workers, mothers who return to work after childbirth, those on social security or private pensions and those receiving severance pay. It would require that the burden of proof of job-seeking be on the unemployed. It also proposes heavily to curtail the present over-all 30-week maximum payment period and sharply restricts those jobless for more than a year in qualifying for further benefits.

Throughout the state an unrelenting barrage of newspaper, radio and TV ads, on an unprecedented scale, continues to hammer away in favor of the bill. The ads are sponsored by the "Jobs for Pennsylvanians Committee," which Boyer terms "a phantom—a front for the big employers and the 'right-to-work' crowd."

The ads, by a conservative estimate, have cost the committee more than $500,000 to date. One newspaper advertisement directed to the "Ladies of the ILGWU" claimed that garment workers would benefit by the bill, although as women and seasonal workers they would be among those most severely affected.

The beneficiaries of the governor's bill, the State AFL-CIO charges, are primarily large employers who would reap heavy financial returns over the years under a proposed system of tax reduction on a basis of experience ratings and through a lessening of claims on the state's fund.

Stamp Plan Voted:

House Action Slated On Federal Pay Bill

A "comparability" pay raise for 1.7 million federal employes—designed to bring government salary scales more nearly in line with private industry pay—has been scheduled for an early House vote after Rules Committee clearance.

It would provide increases averaging about 4 percent for salaried government employes, including nearly 600,000 postal workers.

The bill, strongly supported by labor and the Administration, had been held up in the Rules Committee for nearly four months. Its chief point of controversy is a provision for a $10,000-a-year pay raise for members of Congress, department and major agency heads and federal judges. This would boost congressional pay to $35,000 and Cabinet and Supreme Court salaries to $45,000.

While the legislation reported to the House would make the increases retroactive to Jan. 1, managers of the bill told the Rules Committee they would agree to an amendment postponing the effective date to July 1 and to other changes to bring the annual cost down to $545 million.

The pay bill, tentatively scheduled for Mar. 10 action in the House, is the first test of the comparability principle written into the 1962 Federal Salary Reform Act. This directed the Administration to make annual reports to Congress on the comparability of government and private industry salaries, along with recommendations for pay adjustments.

The House Post Office & Civil Service Committee, in reporting the bill, declared that it represents "the first—and undoubtedly the conclusive—test as to whether Congress intends to abide by its commitment to the comparability principle or disregard it within a year after its adoption."

In another major congressional development, the House Agriculture Committee reversed itself and approved a nationwide food stamp program for needy families, modified by an amendment which could severely curtail its scope.

Last month the committee voted 19-14 to table the Administration's bill to make permanent and expand the program under which needy families can purchase stamps good for a variety of food purchases and obtain additional stamps without charge.

The food stamp plan was put into effect on a pilot basis in economically-depressed areas under the first executive order of the late Pres. Kennedy, and its expansion is a key element in Pres. Johnson's "war on poverty."

The committee revived the bill by an 18-16 vote, but tacked on an amendment requiring states to pay half the cost.

Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.), sponsor of the measure, sharply denounced the amendment, declaring it would cripple the program since the states' welfare budgets "are so strained that they could not come into the national program."

Reconsideration came after the House Rules Committee rejected a proposed research program seeking to eliminate health hazards from tobacco. Observers regarded the turndown as, in part, retaliation for the Agriculture Committee's rejection of the food stamp plan.

Meanwhile the Senate spent the week on farm legislation, involving cotton and wheat price maintenance, while the civil rights bill waited in the wings. An amendment to end the existing tobacco price supports was killed.

After the farm bill is out of the way, Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield is expected to move to take up the rights bill and set off the major legislative battle of the session.

Pres. Johnson, at a Feb. 29 news conference, strongly repudiated Republican suggestions that the Administration is prepared to "compromise" portions of the rights measure.

Johnson said the civil rights bill passed by the House "is the bill that the Administration recommends." Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), who will be floor manager for the measure, said he would oppose amendments that "strengthen" or weaken the bill.

War Against Poverty Called Political Struggle

The war against poverty is a political struggle, "not a federalized community chest," Michael Harrington, author of "The Other America," emphasized on As We See It, AFL-CIO public service program broadcast over the American Broadcasting Co. radio network.

Harrington's address originally was given at Georgetown University's 175th anniversary program on "Poverty in Plenty." His book has been a major factor in calling attention to the existence and extent of poverty.

In stressing the political nature of the war on poverty, Harrington asserted that the fight is going to involve the expenditure of public funds, "and there is no issue in the nation which is as political as that." Most people acknowledge, he said, that the $1 billion of new funds proposed for the first year of the battle by Pres. Johnson "is a drop in the bucket" in terms of the goals and "is totally inadequate."

"If one wants to fill in the details on this," he continued, "one need look no further than the various Kennedy task reports on the needs of the nation in the areas which the President has indicated.

"Money will be involved. Let me parenthetically add, since this society has curious ways of discussing money, that part of the problem is going to be to get the rich off the dole . . . because we have thus far a tendency to socialize for the wealthy and to free enterprise for the poor."

The immediate political problem, Harrington maintained, is to get the right kind of legislation through a Congress which on the basis of experience "is not against poverty." By dividing the nation into liberals and conservatives rather than into Democrats and Republicans, he explained, the liberals emerge as "the party of social change" and the conservatives as "the party of social stagnation."

"Under the present confusion," he said, "the party of social stagnation, inside both parties . . . has more power than it would have if it were ever out in the open . . .

"The crucial problem, it seems to me, in terms of the immediate politics of poverty in the U.S., in terms of flushing out this declaration of making it mean something, is to change the Congress."

RAISING OVERTIME PAY to double time could open up a million new job opportunities, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, left, told chairmen of two House Labor subcommittees. They are Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), center, and Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.).

Overtime Curb Urged To Create New Jobs

and elimination of excess overtime would protect existing jobs as well as open up new opportunities, Biemiller said.

Biemiller differed sharply with employer spokemen who have testified against any increase in overtime rates. He also criticized the "limited" approach of the Administration's proposal to have tripartite boards make separate overtime pay recommendations for each industry.

Since the purpose of the Administration bill "is to provide jobs by eliminating overtime," Biemiller said, "let's do it and let us not engage in creating new legal complications which could be used by employers to frustrate the very purpose of this proposal."

Labor is opposed to the Administration bill "in its present form," Biemiller declared.

When the time-and-a-half overtime penalty was first imposed, Biemiller noted, it had the effect of creating employment by discouraging overtime work.

Since then, he declared, there has been a "revolution" in fringe benefits which has raised the cost of hiring new employes and has made it more profitable for many employers to schedule heavy amounts of overtime work. He added:

"It has created the paradox of substantial overtime in a period when millions of workers are unemployed."

Appreciation for O'Hara

Biemiller expressed labor's "warmest appreciation" to Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.), sponsor of the Administration proposal, for having also introduced a bill requiring doubletime after 40 hours in any "industry of major economic importance." He said, however, that labor could not see any justification for excluding any field of employment.

"To the ordinary citizen, the industry of 'major importance' is the place where he is working at the time," he noted.

Labor is "pleased that the Administration has recognized, even in a limited way, the case for shorter hours of work," but the bill it has submitted "is just not adequate," Biemiller said.

He criticized "most strenuously" the Administration proposal to exclude industries which were brought under wage-hour coverage in 1961, declaring there is "no logical basis for any such exemption."

He warned the proposed tripartite industry committees would result in "endless delays," including problems of defining the industry covered by a wage order.

While industry committees were used in the early stages of the Fair Labor Standards Act, the circumstances were "vastly different," Biemiller declared. The boards had to determine only whether the statutory increases in the minimum wage would take effect before schedule, and it was up to opponents to prove that a proposed increase "would substantially curb employment." The Administration bill, he charged, would put the burden of proof on advocates of a higher overtime rate.

'Simple Solution'

The "simple" solution, the AFL-CIO spokesman declared, is to "apply an across-the-board requirement of doubletime."

Biemiller emphasized that the AFL-CIO still considers a reduction in the basic workweek and "a whole spectrum of legislation" necessary to lick the unemployment problem. No single item on labor's legislative program would do the job by itself, he declared, but, "all are important."

Earlier the subcommittees, headed by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.) and Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), heard spokesmen for the auto industry and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce oppose any change in overtime pay laws.

Theodore O. Yntema, a vice president of the Ford Motor Co. and spokesman for the Automobile Manufacturers Association, said doubletime penalty pay would encourage short-term employment and frequent hiring and layoff, and promote inflation.

A Chamber of Commerce economist, Richard S. Landry, argued that the unemployed aren't qualified to take over jobs which might become available if overtime were reduced.

Unemployment, he noted, is concentrated among those under 20, the unskilled, the uneducated and the non-white.

"These people receive the lowest wages when employed because of their low productivity," he asserted.

GOP Wins 2 Seats In Louisiana House

Baton Rouge, La.—Democrat John J. McKeithen won the governorship of Louisiana in an anticipated general election result but two Republicans captured seats in the state house of representatives—the first of their party to win in this century.

McKeithen got 468,335 votes in the unofficial count to the unusually high total of 296,512 for Charlton H. Lyons, Sr.—a margin of about 61 percent for the Democrat, who is a state public service commissioner. The GOP legislative winners were Morley Hudson and Taylor W. O'Hearn, both from Shreveport, as is Lyons.

AFL-CIO Asks Big Extension Of Coverage

employes in establishments with $250,000 in annual sales providing they are part of enterprises doing at least $1 million in annual business. By removing the $1 million test, the AFL-CIO proposes to cover an additional 674,000 retail workers.

Restaurants — By applying the same sales standard to restaurants, now totally excluded, 424,000 employes would be protected. An estimated 55 percent of these now are paid less than $1.25 an hour.

Hotels-Motels — The AFL-CIO asked coverage of 274,000 workers, some of whom earn less than 50 cents an hour.

Laundries—Only 17,000 of the 530,000 laundry workers in the U.S. presently are covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act. The Administration proposal would cover 80,000 more, the AFL-CIO's plan 173,000. A recent survey showed 10,000 workers in large laundries earning less than 75 cents an hour and some paid less than 35 cents. Bundle wrappers in Memphis, Tenn., averaged 58 cents an hour last year, only 11 cents more than in 1951.

Hospitals — "Hospital employes urgently need FLSA coverage" and "hospital operations affect interstate commerce," the AFL-CIO declared in asking coverage for 500,000 employes of both profit-making and non-profit hospitals.

FLSA coverage was also urged for 55,000 employes of large motion picture theaters, some 200,000 employes of non-profit institutions, and additional groups of workers in small logging operations, agricultural processing and cotton ginning, and miscellaneous services such as wholesaling.

The federation asked overtime coverage for 1.3 million local transit and other transportation employes now guaranteed only the minimum wage, 534,000 employed in agricultural processing and seasonal industries and 86,000 gas station employes.

Meiklejohn told the subcommittee that workers not covered by the wage-hour law "have lagged far behind their fellow citizens in terms of basic wages" and "state laws have not filled the gaps left by limited federal coverage."

"The states have clearly shown that they have no intention of acting in this area. Congress must act to fill this void."

50 Years Marked By Masons Local

Chicago—Cement Masons Local 502 celebrated its golden anniversary with a dinner dance on Feb. 29 at which tribute was paid to 33 members who also marked 50 years on the union's rolls.

The union was organized by merger of six locals of cement workers in the Chicago area at a time when wages were 65 cents an hour, with no fringe benefits, compared to the present $4.43—going to $4.60 on June 1—with life insurance, surgical and hospital care, sick benefits, pensions and a three-year apprenticeship training program.

Johnson Pushes Program To Cut 'Grim' Joblessness

House Kills Federal Pay Raise

The House killed a pay raise averaging nearly 5 percent for 1.7 million government workers on an upset 222-184 rollcall vote.

Postal and other government unions, which have led the fight for "comparability" pay raises to bring federal scales closer to those of private industry, attributed the bill's unexpected defeat to the controversy which developed over salary increases for members of Congress.

A proposed $10,000 raise for congressmen, senators, agency heads and federal judges—although representing only a tiny portion of the $544 million pay bill—was the target of a Republican-led attack.

On a series of voice and standing votes, in which members are not recorded, attempts to delete congressional pay raises and otherwise trim the bill were soundly defeated. However when opponents mustered the one-fifth of the House required to compel a rollcall vote on final passage, the entire bill was beaten.

Voting for the bill were 149 Democrats and 35 Republicans; opposed were 136 Republicans and 86 Democrats.

The rejected bill carried raises averaging nearly $350 a year, about 6 percent, for letter carriers and postal clerks. Other salaried employes, principally the 1 million in the classified civil service, would have received raises ranging from 3 to 22 percent, and averaging 4.3 percent.

Blue-collar federal workers would not have been affected by the bill since their pay is set by wage boards on the basis of prevailing wages in the communities where they work.

Congressional pay has not been raised since 1955 and a presidential commission of prominent Americans — including AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as well as leading industrialists and businessmen—last year recommended boosts even higher than in the House bill. The House bill would have raised congressmen and senators to $32,500, Cabinet members to $35,000 and associate justices of the Supreme Court to $45,000.

Dirksen Backs Raise

A group of House Republicans led the fight on the increase, warning of voter retaliation. However Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) told newsmen he thinks congressmen and senators are entitled to a raise and said he personally will lead the fight for a congressional pay raise in the Senate.

Congress two years ago voted for the principle of annual salary adjustments, based on changes in private industry pay.

FLOOR MANAGER for the civil rights bill, Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.), left, confers with Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) on strategy to win passage of the measure over strong southern opposition.

Senate Opens Debate:

Civil Rights Forces Organized for Fight

The Senate began its long-awaited civil rights debate with a series of parliamentary skirmishes foreshadowing a full-scale filibuster by southern opponents who have vowed to "fight this bill with all the vigor at our command."

At stake is a bipartisan-supported, House-passed bill designed to break down color bars to employment, guarantee non-discrimination in restaurants, hotels and other places serving the public, strengthen voting rights, and authorize a cut-off of federal funds used in a discriminatory manner.

The AFL-CIO has called the bill "the most important moral issue" before Congress and Pres. Johnson has urged its passage "exactly in its present form."

To an unprecedented degree, the bipartisan civil rights coalition is matching the southerners in organization.

Floor managers of the bill are Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.) for the Democratic majority and Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.) for the Republicans. They have set up a joint command post, which issues a daily strategy newsletter.

Elaborate Procedure

Senators have been designated by both parties to become experts on each section of the bill and be prepared to answer opponents point by point. An elaborate procedure has been set up by Humphrey and

Manpower Report Spells Out Policies

Pres. Johnson has outlined to Congress an "active manpower policy" aimed at a sharp reduction in the "grimly" persistent high rate of joblessness through a combination of needed legislation and administrative action.

In his message transmitting the annual Labor Dept. report required by Congress under the Manpower Development & Training Act, the President cited the job-displacing effects of automation and the rapid growth of the labor force as major reasons for the economy's failure to dent unemployment "despite 1963's strong economic advance."

Relating the drive against joblessness to the broad "war on poverty," the President set forth three "fundamental" manpower goals: "to develop the abilities of our people . . . to create jobs to make the most of those abilities . . . to match people and jobs."

"What is at stake," he declared, "is whether a free democratic economy can attain well-being for the less fortunate as well as the more fortunate . . . whether it can make population growth and technological advance fruitful for all rather than fateful for some."

With the manpower report, the President sent Congress a draft bill to create a National Commission on Automation & Technological Progress, along the lines urged by the AFL-CIO convention last November. Its task would be to assess automation's past effects and its probable future course and recommend steps by the federal government to help alleviate any adverse impact.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany observed that Johnson had "quite correctly assessed the enormity of the unemployment problem in the United States and the urgent necessity of moving promptly through both the legislative and administrative powers of the government to solve it."

Expressing "wholehearted" support of the goals outlined by the President and urging Congress to "get on with this task with compassion and dispatch," Meany declared:

"There is no more important domestic issue than putting America back to work. Our role as the leader of the free world and all of the domestic goals of the Johnson Administration require the strength in our economy that can only be achieved by full employment and full production."

In his message, Johnson declared that overcoming the problem of unemployment, which has remained above 5 percent for more than six years, "is the greatest immediate manpower challenge before us."

He called on Congress to help meet that challenge by acting on "a range of proposals" already before it and declared specifically:

- "Youth unemployment must not be allowed to grow unchecked. . . . Pres. Kennedy's proposed youth

Lodge Win Spurs New GOP Tests

By Willard Shelton

The major announced Republican presidential candidates headed west for new primary campaigns after taking a buffeting in New Hampshire, where the absentee Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge swamped both Sen. Goldwater of Arizona and Gov. Rockefeller of New York with a write-in vote that won him all 14 of the state's GOP convention delegates.

The first-in-the-nation New Hampshire balloting vaulted Lodge, now serving as U.S. envoy in Vietnam, into the forefront of GOP presidential aspirants.

He remains an undeclared aspirant but he sent a message a day in advance of the voting to his son, George Lodge, former assistant secretary of labor, expressing a sense of compliment at the prospective size of the vote he might roll up in write-ins.

Lodge led the GOP list with 33,459 votes in the complete unofficial tally, with Goldwater and Rockefeller — two candidates whose names were printed on the ballot—second and third with 21,748 and 19,457 votes respectively. Sen. Margaret Chase Smith (Me.), also an official can-

Unemployment Rate Dips to 5.4% As Jobs Exceed Seasonal Gain

An unexpectedly large job pickup in February brought a slight decline in the jobless rate to 5.4 percent, the Labor Dept. has reported, but the gain failed to dent the unemployment problem.

The job rise of 800,000 between January and February was nearly twice as large as the usual increase for this time of year, the report said.

However, the total of unemployed remained unchanged from January at 4.5 million. Officials explained that the number of people entering the labor force to seek work rose about the same as the total of new jobs.

Pres. Johnson, in a televised press conference, relied in part on the new job figures in forecasting an economic upturn. He also referred to rising investment in new plant and equipment and a bullish stock market.

"I'm very pleased by the early reaction to the tax cut and to the outlook for the economy in general," said the President. "The mail to the White House has been running about 10 to 1 in support of the tax cut."

Labor Dept. technicians attributed the "substantially better-than-seasonal" pickup to increased production in the steel, automotive and machinery industries and to greater activity in trade and construction. A detailed report due Mar. 18 will pin down the specific gains.

The seasonally adjusted jobless rate of 5.4 percent for February compares to 5.6 percent in January and to 5.9 percent in February a year ago. The 5.4 percent figure is the lowest jobless rate in the past 16 months.

Along with the lack of improvement in total unemployment, the number of longterm jobless—those seeking work unsuccessfully for 15 weeks or longer—remained at 1.2 million. This group totaled a postwar low for the month of 246,000 in 1953.

The February report showed de-

Randolph to Receive '64 Histadrut Award

New York—Pres. A. Philip Randolph of the Sleeping Car porters has been named winner of the 1964 Histadrut Humanitarian Award, the National Committee for Labor Israel has announced.

The presentation will take place at a dinner here on June 13. Proceeds of the affair will provide scholarships in Randolph's name at the Histadrut-sponsored Afro-Asian Institute for Labor Studies, which AFL-CIO affiliates help support and which trains young union leaders from the underdeveloped countries in the democratic approach to the solution of social and economic problems.

LABOR SEC. W. Willard Wirtz presents a copy of the Labor Dept. report on the nation's manpower to Pres. Johnson, who transmitted it to Congress with a message calling for a massive legislative and administrative effort to wipe out unemployment.

Johnson Asks Study Of Automation Impact

employment programs can help meet this urgent need, and I urge the Congress to act favorably on these programs as part of the war on poverty."

- "Poverty must be attacked through new and intensive combinations of varied federal, state and local government and private programs" to be outlined in a special message to Congress.
- "Education must be strengthened" along lines set forth in pending legislation and budget requests dealing particularly with elementary and secondary education needs.
- "Areas of high unemployment must be revitalized" through expansion of activities under the Area Redevelopment Act.
- "Overtime work must be examined critically to determine if it is feasible to convert regular and substantial overtime hours into new jobs."
- "Racial discrimination must be eliminated" on the job through the fair employment practices required under the pending civil rights bill.
- "Unemployment insurance must be extended and its benefits increased. . . ."
- "Protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act must be extended . . ."

On the administrative level, the President said he had directed his Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy to undertake a study of the impact of automation and the problems of adjustment it poses.

He also announced he is establishing a President's Committee on Manpower to launch "a continuing top-level assessment of the relation of the government's programs and our country's manpower assets and needs." Its members will include federal officials dealing with programs affecting manpower, under the chairmanship of Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

The proposed National Commission on Automation would be made up of 14 members drawn from outside the government and appointed by the President, with a federal inter-agency committee to advise it and maintain liaison with government departments.

The Labor Dept. report on which the President's manpower message was based reviewed recent trends in employment and unemployment and focused on a number of areas of major concern, such as the accelerating growth of the labor force, expected to reach an annual rate of 1.4 million in the late 1960s.

The report also discussed in detail the effect of federal, state and local governments on employment, noting that all three levels account for about a fourth of the nation's jobs—12 million in direct government work and 6.5 million more in private industries supplying government needs.

Government construction alone, at all levels, has a major impact on the private economy, the report observed. The nearly $18 billion spent by government agencies in 1962 on highways, schools, sewer and water systems and other projects, the report said, generated about 2 million jobs in private industry.

1st Strike in 77 Years Ends in IAM Victory

Palmyra, N. Y.—The first strike in the 77-year history of the Garlock, Inc., plant here ended with an across-the-board wage increase of 8 cents an hour for 1,050 members of Machinists Lodge 588.

The company is one of the country's major manufacturers of industrial rubber packing products.

clines in unemployment rates for the following: married men, down to 3 percent from 3.2 percent in January; adult men, down to 4.1 percent from 4.3 percent, and teenagers, down to 13.8 percent from 14.9 percent. The jobless rate for adult women remained about the same at 5.6 percent.

The total labor force time lost through joblessness and part-time work edged downward to 6.1 percent in February from 6.2 percent in January. This is the same as the rate for December; a year earlier it was 6.6 percent.

On the employment side of the picture, all of the gain of 800,000 over the month occurred in the non-farm sector, pushing that total to 64.1 million. This was 1.8 million higher than a year earlier. Farm employment remained about the same at 3.9 million.

Total employment thus reached 68 million in February. Counted among the employed were some 2.1 million workers on part-time for economic reasons, unchanged over the month and the year, the report noted.

The total labor force, including the armed services, rose to 75.3 million.

UAW Purchases Retirees' Center

Detroit—The Auto Workers have bought a three-story social club not far from UAW headquarters and will convert it into a model center for retired workers.

UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther announced the purchase at the second annual meeting of directors of union retiree centers. He said the purchase was to "carry out a long-standing pledge" to retired members.

Extensive remodeling of the building, formerly run by the Detroit Turners, will begin soon. The structure contains two gymnasiums, 10 bowling lanes, a swimming pool, kitchen and meeting rooms.

Reuther said he hopes the center will be used to provide training opportunities for persons wishing to work with older people, in conjunction with universities and institutes.

IUD Supports Stand On Wage-Hour Law

America's "affluence" is a "mockery" to millions of full-time workers who don't earn enough to "maintain their families at a minimum level of decency," a spokesman for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. told a House Labor subcommittee.

IUD Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman said the Administration's proposal for extending wage-hour coverage to an additional 735,000 workers is good "as far as it goes, but we do not think it goes far enough."

Clayman urged the subcommittee to "accept the recommendations of the AFL-CIO" for bringing an additional 2.7 million workers under the Fair Labor Standards Act and adding a ceiling on hours for 1.9 million persons now covered only by the minimum wage provision.

He urged Congress to turn a deaf ear to business claims that covering additional workers would reduce job opportunities, noting that similar "dire warnings" had been made when the wage-hour law was first enacted. Estimates of job losses from "artificial" fixing of wages, he said, ran as high as 3.75 million—"and proved false."

"We have every reason to believe that the current detractors of this bill are every bit as wrong in their dire prognostications today as their predecessors were in the past," Clayman declared.

He urged special attention to the need for coverage of hospital workers, employes of small logging and sawmill operations and hired farm workers.

Vice Pres. Leon B. Schachter of the Meat Cutters said extension of wage-hour coverage "would attack poverty at the point of maximum need."

He urged "complete" wage-hour coverage for agricultural processing workers, some of whom are totally exempt from the Fair Labor Standards Act while others are not covered by the overtime provision during peak "seasonal" operations. These exclusions, Schachter said, has brought "second class economic citizenship to hundreds of thousands of workers in the food processing industries."

Biemiller Tells Senate Unit:

Public Works' End Would Be 'Tragedy'

Full employment won't be achieved by wishful thinking, the AFL-CIO warned in Senate testimony calling for a continued and expanded accelerated public works program.

It would be a "tragedy" to let the program die, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told the Senate Public Works Committee.

"This is an unsurpassed way to put people to work and, at the same time, permanently enrich the nation," he testified.

Biemiller called for a new $2 billion program which, with state and local matching funds, would generate 400,000 jobs in areas of heavy unemployment and an additional 200,000 to 400,000 jobs resulting from increased purchasing power.

"These are jobs that America badly needs," he declared.

Committee Chairman Pat McNamara (D-Mich.) has introduced a bill for an additional $1.5 billion in federal funds to replace the $900 million which Congress authorized two years ago—and which will soon be exhausted.

Last December the House Public Works Committee, by a single-vote margin, approved a new $900 million program, but the bill is bottled in the Rules Committee.

Biemiller called on the Senate committee to "frankly face the facts" about unemployment.

'Facts' of Unemployment

The "facts," he declared, are:

- Unemployment has been on the rise for 10 years.
- There were fewer full-time jobs in private, profit-making businesses last year than there were 10 years ago.
- In 1963, a year of "prosperity," unemployment increased more than 150,000 despite a $30 billion rise in total production.
- America's job needs are accelerating with the spread of automation and a greater number of young people coming of working age.

Biemiller said bluntly that it would be "a dangerous illusion" to pin hopes for achieving full employment on the tax cut "or any other single measure." What is needed, he said, is "not just one action but many."

The initial program, he said, is helping to finance nearly 8,000 projects in more than 3,000 communities, creating some 220,000 man-years of work. There remains, he said, a "vast backlog of needed projects for which no funds are available."

Only 'Wherewithal' Lacking

"There is no doubt that there is work to be done," he declared. "All that is lacking is the wherewithal to do it."

Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman of the Industrial Union Dept. joined in urging committee approval for a $2 billion program.

The projects already completed, he said, have meant more and better health facilities, clean drinking water, sewage disposal facilities, sidewalks and streets.

The accelerated program "has meant work for the locally unemployed, both skilled and unskilled. It has meant laborers' jobs, as well as jobs for craftsmen. It has meant semiskilled factory jobs. It has meant jobs for timekeepers and other white collar employes."

He warned that the loss of these jobs, if the program is permitted to die, "will counter much of the positive effects of the tax cut."

Biemiller told the committee that the accelerated public works program is a means of implementing the job goals of the Employment Act of 1946, which he said commits the federal government to use its resources to bring about maximum employment.

"This is not a time for half-measures, or even three-quarter measures," he declared. "The need is immediate and growing, and it can be met only by imaginative, decisive action."

Colgate Workers Win Wage Hikes

Contract improvements affecting 1,700 workers at two plants of the Colgate-Palmolive Co. have been reported by the Chemical Workers and the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

At the Clarksville, Ind., plant, ICWU Local 15 reported a two-year pact with a lump-sum wage hike of $75 this year, plus 7 cents in October; an "agency shop" clause; double time for hours worked over 12 in a day; improved funeral leave, severance provisions, holiday pay, and a paid lunch period extended to day shift workers.

The OCAW said 600 workers at the Kansas City plant won similar gains, including a 37.5-hour week with a 30-minute paid lunch period.

Automation Threat Cited By McDonald

Detroit—For the good of the nation, labor and management and government must work "jointly and sincerely" to provide "full employment with adequate income to all who desire jobs," Steelworkers Pres. David J. McDonald told the Detroit Economic Club here.

Asserting that "there is no profit in production without purchase" by consumers, McDonald called for harnessing automation to the nation's needs "before it runs away with us."

The USWA chief said "automated idleness" is a "terrible deterrent to national growth." It has become chronic and will grow worse "unless we act cohesively and sensibly," he said.

McDonald said many civil rights difficulties would be solved if the problems of full employment were solved first. By providing job opportunities and training people to fill them regardless of creed or color, he observed, "we hit at the nub of the civil rights problem" and "provide a degree of economic freedom to match social freedom."

There is, he said, "no force on earth which can bury us but our own mistakes." He added that "the most monumental mistake we could make would be to ignore the necessity of insuring equality for all Americans" in every respect.

Canada to Transfer Employment Service

Ottawa, Ont.—The National Employment Service will be transferred from the Unemployment Insurance Commission to the federal Dept. of Labor as soon as a special committee of senior officials can work out the machinery.

The shift was proposed by a Special Committee of Inquiry in Unemployment Insurance in order to secure a stronger and more positive approach to the solution of manpower problems.

Union Plans Manpower Study:

Automation Hits Food, Hotel Jobs

The Hotel & Restaurant Employes, alarmed over the job-destroying effects of food-vending machines, pre-cooked foods and new automated kitchens, have voted to launch a study-in-depth of the effects of automation on the mass feeding and lodging industry.

The new union research project, Pres. Ed. S. Miller said, will include an investigation of the industry's manpower and retraining needs.

Some government experts are "fostering the idea that people displaced from industrial production jobs by automation are able to find work in the service trades," said Miller.

"The fact is," he added, "that the new techniques are killing off jobs in our industry too."

In Washington for a meeting of the union's executive board, followed by a legislative conference for 500 local union delegates, he noted "there is a widely held impression that automation has had little effect on hotel and restaurant jobs" but said the opposite is true.

Miller gave these examples of the problem:

- On the Indiana Toll Road, there is a chain of 16 restaurants "where you'll look in vain for a cook." Food is cooked and frozen in a central kitchen, trucked to the eating places, and heated on order in a microwave oven.
- The mushroom spread of offices has "brought bankruptcy to vending machines in factories and countless small restaurants" and sharply reduced jobs in industrial catering.
- Prepared mixes, pre-cooked foods and pre-portioned meat and fowl have "seriously dislocated traditional employment patterns" and displaced thousands of workers.

Miller said the union is "faced with the fact that the new methods also are destroying the jobs of the least skilled" and has an obligation to see that apprentice training opportunities are made available so they may acquire the higher skills the industry needs—as cooks, waiters, waitresses and barmen.

He said he will name a union committee to study the entire automation-training problem and to prepare to cooperate with the industry and government specialists.

Asserting that the problem is "far too big for any union or any labor-management body to tackle alone," Miller pledged, "we'll do our part, and we invite the industry and the government to do theirs."

Union to Organize Playboy 'Bunnies'

Maybe bunnies can live on tips but real live people can't.

That's why the Hotel & Restaurant Employes has launched a national campaign to organize waitresses dressed as "bunnies," and other employes of eight Playboy clubs.

The union, at a meeting here, said Hugh Hefner, Playboy magazine publisher and club promoter, refuses to pay wages to the "bunnies," requires them to kick back some tips, and fines them for breaking club "rules."

DETROIT'S NEWEST senior high school has been named for Philip Murray, late president of the Steelworkers and the former CIO. Completion date for the $4.5 million classroom building for 2,220 students has been set for May 1965. Murray, before his death in 1952, had served as a member of the Pittsburgh School Board.

Kingsport Strikers Vote In Labor Board Election

Kingsport, Tenn.—Kingsport Press strikers, their spirits undaunted after one year of picketing, stood in rain and cold here outside the struck plant to cast their ballots in a National Labor Relations Board representation election.

They voted in the company garage, separated from strikebreakers who balloted inside the plant in a company training room. The ballots were impounded after the polls closed and will be kept uncounted at the NLRB regional office in Atlanta, Ga., until all briefs have been filed and all challenges are disposed of by the labor board.

Almost all who voted were challenged by labor or management. Company lawyers made two attempts to delay the election, but lost both when the NLRB denied a motion for reconsideration of the election order and Judge Richmond B. Keech refused a request for a temporary injunction, filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

Members of five unions have been on strike at the company, largest U.S. producer of hard-cover books, since Mar. 11, 1963. Four of the unions petitioned the labor board for an election shortly before the close of the first strike year and the petition was granted by a three-member NLRB panel—Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and Members Boyd Leedom and John H. Fanning.

The decision related that under the National Labor Relations Act "employes engaged in an economic strike who are not entitled to reinstatement shall be eligible to vote . . . in any election conducted within 12 months" after the start of the strike.

The board said "it may thus be seen that unless the elections . . . are held before the expiration of the indicated 12-month period those strikers who have been replaced will be rendered ineligible to vote."

It added: "Therefore, in order to implement . . . the congressional intent to enfranchise replaced strikers during the first 12 months of an economic strike, we have decided to direct an election . . . without awaiting any briefs which parties may file."

The board expressed the belief that this procedure, "although a departure from that normally followed, is warranted by the circumstances and will effectuate the purposes and policies of the act."

Kingsport Press management, which has balked all union efforts for a reasonable strike settlement and the return of all strikers to work, indicated it will challenge the board's right to order an election.

Voters could ballot in separate units for the Bookbinders, Machinists, Printing Pressmen, Stereotypers, or no union.

Folding Carton Unit Wins First Contract

Charlotte, N. C.—A general wage increase of 6 cents an hour was won by Papermakers & Paperworkers Local 821 in a first contract covering employes of the Folding Carton Division here of the Weyerhaeuser Co.

Retail Clerks Picketing In Wage Rate Dispute

More than 5,000 employes of Food Fair Stores are picketing 175 company stores in Delaware, New Jersey and Pennsylvania because the firm refuses to honor an agreement covering non-food employes, the Retail Clerks said in a statement.

A temporary injunction issued Mar. 3 in the Chester County, Pa., Court of Common Pleas was dissolved two days later by U.S. District Judge Harold K. Wood, Philadelphia, pending a hearing on whether the question should be settled by the National Labor Relations Board and federal courts or by state courts.

The union told its side of the story in an ad prepared for publication in 50 newspapers, but reported it was having difficulty in getting the copy accepted by all the papers.

Asserting "the public is entitled to know," the RCIA said Food Fair Stores signed a June 1962 agreement with RCIA local unions in Wilkes-Barre, Philadelphia, Allentown, Harrisburg and Reading, Pa.; Camden, Trenton and Atlantic City, N.J., and Wilmington, Del. It said the firm agreed to pay non-food employes in its wholly owned subsidiary, the J. M. Fields Stores, rates of $1.25 per hour to start, $1.35 after six months and $1.50 after a year.

"Food Fair now refuses to honor this agreement and refuses to pay these wages," the ads reported. "The Retail Clerks Union agreed to these rates so Food Fair could compete in the discount store industry. But now, Food Fair J. M. Fields Stores are paying an average wage of $1.15 an hour."

Calling that a "sweatshop wage in 1964," the union said it considers the company guilty of a breach of contract.

"That's why we are picketing. We offered to submit the dispute to impartial and binding arbitration by the American Arbitration Association. Even though the agreement which they signed provides for arbitration, Food Fair has done everything in its power to prevent impartial arbitration," the RCIA said, asking the public not to cross the picket lines.

The union said in an additional statement that it feels the chain's tactics "are the first step in a campaign to destroy union standards in all Food Fair stores."

CWA Gains Mark Coast Strike Pact

Santa Monica, Calif.—The 141-day strike of the Communications Workers against General Telephone of California has ended with important economic gains plus surrender by the company to the final major point in the dispute—return to work of all strikers.

The settlement includes a 3.54 percent boost in wages for the 8,900-member unit, a reduction in the social security deduction from pensions, plus improvements in vacations, disability pensions and other fringe benefits.

The dispute over the return-to-work issue, in which talks had been bogged down for a week, grew out of a company contention that it would not take back any strikers who had been permanently replaced, a stand from which it finally retreated.

According to the agreement, the union and company will arbitrate all cases of discharge for alleged cause, and all members of the unit will begin to return to work immediately upon ratification.

Hughes Bars Confiscation In Bus Strike

Trenton, N. J.—Gov. Richard J. Hughes has refused to take action, under a state public utility anti-strike law, against 6,200 drivers, mechanics and utility men who walked out Mar. 9 in a contract dispute with the Public Service Coordinated Transport Co.

The Democratic governor, asked at a news conference if he would take over the struck bus system, said the state law is unconstitutional and "I cannot and will not invoke this statute." The U.S. Supreme Court, in a decision last June 10, ruled that a similar Missouri law was unconstitutional, Hughes recalled.

A union spokesman congratulated the governor on his stand. He is John J. Reinhardt of Newark, chairman of the New Jersey State Conference Board of Public Service Locals, affiliated with the striking Street & Electric Railway Employes.

At a meeting Mar. 6, employes voted 2,807-1,814 to reject a company proposal. Negotiations were scheduled to be resumed Mar. 12 on contract terms. The union seeks improvements in wages, sick pay, pensions, vacations, and a two-year contract instead of the three offered by management.

The union said it offered to consider arbitration of disputed issues but that management refused. The firm runs 2,500 buses to New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania points, serving about 1 million riders daily.

Senate Unit OK's Fringe Benefits Bill

The Senate Labor Committee has approved the House-passed Davis-Bacon fringe benefits bill by a 13-2 vote.

The bill, strongly supported by the AFL-CIO and vigorously opposed by low-wage, non-union contractors, was sponsored by a bipartisan group of 20 senators. It would include, for the first time, the value of fringe benefits in determining local area wage standards which federal contractors are required to match.

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. hailed the Senate committee action and declared:

"We are now confident of final enactment of the Davis-Bacon fringe benefits bill as soon as it can be brought up for a vote in the Senate. We hope action will not be long delayed. The bill will open up many thousands of new job opportunities for union construction workers."

Final Senate approval of the bill will be one of the objectives of the four-day legislative conference which is expected to draw 4,000 building trades delegates to Washington Mar. 23-26.

Other goals of the conference, which will be addressed by Pres. Johnson and leading congressmen and senators, include social security hospital insurance for the aged, federal housing and education programs, civil rights and a new accelerated public works program.

Hoffa Given Eight Years In Jury Case

Chattanooga, Tenn.—Teamsters Pres. James R. Hoffa was sentenced here to serve eight years in a federal prison and was fined $10,000 for jury tampering. Three co-defendants were sentenced to serve three years.

U.S. District Judge Frank Wilson rebuked Hoffa shortly after the Teamster leader said to the court: "I stand here today and state I am innocent." Wilson replied "You stand here convicted of tampering with the very soul of this nation . . . the very basis of civilization itself."

A jury convicted Hoffa on two counts of an indictment for attempting to bribe a federal jury which heard a conspiracy case against him at Nashville in 1962. The case ended in a hung jury and a mistrial.

Wilson sentenced Hoffa to serve four years and pay a $5,000 fine on each count, the sentences to run consecutively. Also sentenced were Ewing King of Teamsters Local 327, Nashville; Larry Campbell of Hoffa's home Local 299, Detroit; and Thomas E. Parks, Nashville. Two other defendants had been acquitted.

Hoffa, who had been out on $75,000 bail since his conviction, has said he will appeal.

Factory Injury Rate At Low in December

The all-manufacturing injury-frequency rate for the fourth quarter of 1963 was 3 percent higher than the previous year although it registered a seasonal drop to 10.9 disabling injuries per million man-hours from 12 per million in the third quarter.

The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics, in its preliminary report, said the October rate at 11.9 equalled that of September but was 4 percent higher than in October 1962. There was a sharp drop to 10.7 in November, followed by a further decline to 10, the year's low, in December.

Manpower Policy

PRES. JOHNSON'S manpower policy message and the Labor Dept.'s report are carefully drawn and documented analyses of the critical unemployment problems facing the nation.

In his message to Congress the President has called the nation's attention to the plaguing problem of chronic unemployment. In calling for congressional action he has reaffirmed his earlier forthrightness and courage in detailing the need for an all-out war on poverty.

The key to both of these problems is an over-all manpower policy geared to the sharp reduction of unemployment and a massive attack on the breeding grounds of poverty. The President laid such a program before Congress when he urged it to act on the "range of proposals" now before it, with more to come.

These proposals cover the by now familiar youth employment bill, strengthened education programs, aid to depressed areas, a restudy of overtime hours worked to produce more jobs, an end to racial discrimination in employment, increased and extended unemployment compensation benefits, extension of coverage of the Wage-Hour Act, and the soon-to-be-announced program for the attack on poverty.

Many of these proposals have been pending before Congress for a number of years; others are relatively new. But if there is to be a meaningful attack on the "grimly" persistent high rate of joblessness, these proposals must be translated into adopted legislation.

The President, stressing and affirming the need for congressional action, has taken an additional important step by sending Congress proposed legislation to set up a National Commission on Automation to assess automation's past effects and its probable future course.

Administratively, the President has reinforced the need to deal with the automation problem by directing his Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy to undertake a study on its own of the impact of the new technology on the economy.

The President's recognition that despite the economic progress in 1963 there has been no dent in the scope and size of unemployment is heartening because until this fact is thoroughly and completely understood in Congress and throughout the country, the attack on joblessness and poverty cannot be put into high gear.

No Time for Tight Money

THERE ARE disturbing reports that the Federal Reserve Board has under consideration an increase in interest rates to stem what some conservative members of the banking community consider the imminent threat of inflation.

A move to institute tight money and dry up credit sources could be a blow to the economy and wipe out the stimulating effects of the tax cut just enacted into law.

The nation does not face an inflationary threat or problem. The major job is to spur economic growth and take all other necessary steps to provide jobs and wipe out the persistent, chronic unemployment that has plagued the nation for the past six years. Higher interest rates will choke off any hope of mounting a real attack on joblessness.

Policy Committee Report:

Families in Poverty Pattern May Increase, Study Warns

The following is excerpted from a summary analysis of "Poverty in America," a report by the National Policy Committee on Pockets of Poverty prepared by Dr. Oscar Ornati, professor of economics at the New School for Social Research. The national committee was established in 1961 by its chairman, Pres. James C. Patton of the National Farmers Union. It includes former Pres. Truman and prominent leaders from many interested groups in the nation.

POVERTY IS no longer a condition which strikes all kinds of individuals but rather tends to characterize the great majority of individuals in certain large "poverty-linked" groups. If a family is in one of these groups, the probabilities are that it will be poor regardless of how poverty is defined.

Poverty is revealed to be the usual product of certain social, economic and geographical conditions. For a family with such "poverty-linked" characteristics, rare escapes from poverty require the unusual combination of great ability, hard work, good luck and an exceptionally prosperous economy.

The study shows that although one out of eight of the nation's total number of families had a cash income in 1960 below the extremely meager level of $2,000, the proportion rises to one out of three in the case of non-white families; families headed by a female; families 65 years of age or over; rural farm families; families with less than eight years' education, or families whose head has had at most only part time work experience.

If poverty is defined as embracing families with incomes of less than $4,500—which is only moderately above what is generally regarded as necessary to maintain standards of "minimum adequacy"—more than two out of three of the families would be defined as "poor."

Where a family has not merely one but two or more of these characteristics, the probability of poverty is overwhelming. Thus, three out of four families which have the following combinations of characteristics have total cash incomes of less than $4,500: non-white families with a female as head of the family; aged families living anywhere; Negro farm families; farm families headed by female.

Because of the rapid increase and changing composition of the population, the number of families in most of these groups already constitutes significant proportions of our society. And on the basis of current trends, their number can be expected to increase.

Thus, in 1960 9.5 percent of all American families were non-white. By 1980 this proportion is expected to increase to 11.2 percent, a gain of 18 percent. Similarly, families where the head is 25 years or younger in 1960 constituted 5.1 percent of the total number of families. By 1980 this is expected to rise to 8.2 percent, an increase of 60 percent. An even greater percentage change is expected for families with six or more children under 18. Presently they represent only 2.5 percent of the total number of families; by 1980 they are expected to increase to 4.2 percent.

THE ONLY poverty-associated group which is expected to show a significant decline is rural families. This, of course, is the expected result of the further mechanization and centralization of agriculture. Most of these migrations from the farm will thus be involuntary, and instead of providing an offset to the incidence of poverty, they will merely shift its locale from the farm to the city.

Although there is, of course, some difference in definitions, authorities appear to be in general agreement as to the existence of three levels of poverty which, in terms of a family of four, are:

- Minimum subsistence, $2,500 per year cash income.
- Minimum adequacy, $3,500 per year cash income.
- Minimum comfort, $5,500 per year cash income.

In 1960 there were 20 million individuals in families whose cash income fell below the "minimum subsistence" level; there were 46 million in families which fell below the "minimum adequacy" level and 70 million in families which fell below the "minimum comfort' level. These already represent sizable proportions of our population.

Thus, one out of every 10 Americans exists in a condition of abject poverty, below subsistence standards; almost one out of every four Americans exists below adequate standards, with only the bare essentials of life; more than one out of every three Americans lives below the level of minimum comfort.

The committee emphasized that any effective program of public policies designed to deal with the poverty problem must come to grips with underlying economic trends that fall with particular force on various of the poverty-associated groups and which, if they are permitted to continue, could make the situation in 1980 even more serious than has been projected in this report.

Morgan Says:

Pollsters' Doorbell Ringing Has Grown Into Big Business

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

DOORBELL RINGING, which used to be little more than a Hallowe'en prank, has become an important and meaningful business in this country.

Today, it appears, nobody can do anything without taking a public opinion survey first. Politicians must poll the voters before the latter go to the polls. Merchants reach out to feel the housewife's pulse before launching a new product or repackaging an old one. And pundits wouldn't dare prepare tomorrow's column before taking the latest barometric reading of the social and political atmosphere gathered by those meteorologists of the public mind, the professional pollsters.

Morgan

Recently I signed on as a helper to Oliver Quayle, an opinion surveyor who is also ABC's 1964 election analyst. Under his supervision a team of four of us spent all of a grey and muddy Sunday afternoon seeking out voters in Hanover, N. H., home of Dartmouth College, and in Lebanon, a struggling little industrial town five miles away. People were surprisingly unresentful of having their private weekend leisure invaded, interestingly unreticent about expressing their views. Only one man we approached, a senior citizen, refused to talk politics.

But while there was interest in the primary, and concern about such problems as Cuba, Vietnam and civil rights, almost nobody seemed very excited about the election except one widowed lady who worked in a hospital. She could hardly wait to get to the polls. The Republican presidential primary was of minor interest to her because she was a Democrat. She was immersed in battle for delegates to a convention to rewrite the state constitution. She imparted to an ignorant outlander the staggering news that the lower house of the state legislature has 400 members, making it one of the largest such bodies in the world.

Our sampling of 38 registered Republicans was too small, numerically and geographically, to draw major conclusions from, but the pattern fit quite snugly with the trends indicated in the larger measurements: a marked slippage in Goldwater strength, a wavering commitment to Rockefeller and a surprising thrust of write-in sentiment for Henry Cabot Lodge.

None of the handful of Democrats flushed up intended to write in Atty. Gen. Robert Kennedy's name for vice president; that drive is concentrated in the more populous southern part of the state. Democrats almost without exception gave Pres. Johnson high marks for his performance so far. Republicans rated him from "pretty good" to one excellent and more than one indicated they might vote for him in November if the GOP didn't produce a more appealing candidate.

Indeed what the survey proved was a Republican division over candidates and doubts about November. Ironically, Goldwater's stand on the issues seemed to damage him most. Conservatives found him too "radical." One Republican, a magazine dealer who had just come home from a bowling tournament, winced over Cuba as a "thorn in our side" and wanted Castro blockaded but he thought the senator was for an invasion of Cuba and that, he said, "is a little too stringent at this point." He planned to write in Richard Nixon as his preference. An insurance agent who voted for Nixon in 1960 now prefers Rockefeller but wants Washington to do anything short of war, as he put it, "to kick Castro the hell out of Cuba."

A RETIRED language professor said "Goldwater is 2,000 miles too far to the right for me on foreign policy but his notions on fiscal policy are precisely mine." He voted against John Kennedy in 1960—stressing it was a negative vote—gives Lyndon Johnson a "good" rating as of now but wants to hear more about Pennsylvania's Gov. Scranton, though he just might support Rockefeller. He thought the governor's remarriage problem "unfortunate" because it set 90 percent of the women against him. As for him it was none of his business; the professor has been married three times himself.

Unaware of the pun she was making with Mrs. Rockefeller's nickname, the wife of a Dartmouth administrative staffer said, "we would be far better off with a Happy man in the White House than an unhappy man."

Three Republicans wanted a more moderate push on civil rights, thinking the issue had been moved too fast. There was concern that the U.S. was not taking a stronger stand in foreign affairs but caution from the same people that it shouldn't be belligerent.

The Democrats may be encouraged by the lack of Republican ardor for any one candidate and the lack of criticism of LBJ, but to translate that into the support the President needs in November the Administration seems required to develop a posture of what might be called fierce moderation, which won't be easy even for such an accomplished politician as Lyndon Johnson.

Washington Reports:

Clean Air Act Seen Saving U.S. Billions in Pollution Damage

THE RECENTLY SIGNED air pollution bill gives the government stand-by enforcement authority and should, for that and other reasons, result in saving billions now lost in property and crop damage, and incalculable losses because of health hazards, according to Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.).

Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.), interviewed with Muskie on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations, said the new legislation establishes a national research and development program for air pollution prevention and control and steps up federal participation.

In recent years, half the study and enforcement of air pollution measures has been in California, although smog affects all parts of the U.S.

"We hope that states and communities will handle their own enforcement problems," said Muskie, "but the bill gives the federal government stand-by enforcement authority."

Kuchel said that air pollution causes $11 billion damage to property and crops every year, or $65 per capita.

He recalled that air pollution caused 4,000 deaths within a week in London in 1952, and 200 in New York City "a decade ago." Emphysema, bronchitis, lung cancer and other ailments are caused or aggravated by air pollution, he asserted.

YEARS AGO, said Muskie, smoke was the major problem, as in Pittsburgh, but the situation is complicated today because of pollutants from chemicals and automobiles.

Kuchel reported that the situation in Los Angeles, one of the worst in the nation, is improving, "but we have a long way to go." California has a law requiring that automobiles be fitted with a device which, it is estimated, reduces their pollutants 25 to 30 percent.

"This is a constructive beginning," commented Muskie. "The legislation just signed into law will set up a technical liaison committee of representatives of federal agencies, the automobile industry and the automobile fuel industry to work in this field. If we can lick the automobile problem, we will have made big steps in the problem of control."

Kuchel declared that with increased urbanization the situation will grow worse unless it is acted upon without further delay.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THERE WAS NO REAL winner, only a crop of losers or prospective losers, emerging from the Republican primary in New Hampshire Mar. 10. The GOP is still hunting for its candidate to run against Pres. Johnson next November.

The Goldwater disaster has to be measured against the senator's original expectation that New England was good hunting ground for him, a country filled with frugal Yankees to whom his preachments of what he labels "conservatism" would naturally appeal. A good many Yankees showed they would rather take the trouble to write in the name of Henry Cabot Lodge, friend and neighbor from nearby Boston.

The disaster can be measured, also, by the fact that the state's leading Goldwater supporter, U.S. Sen. Norris Cotton, suffered the humiliation of being turned down as a delegate to the GOP convention in July. Cotton has been the best vote-getter in the state's factionalized Republican Party, but his total this time fell behind the votes of 14 delegates favorable to Lodge.

Gov. Rockefeller gained ground on Goldwater during the primary campaign, but not enough to produce the election of any delegates favorable to him, not enough to avoid being third runner. The Oregon primary in May and the California primary June 2 may produce a showing of Rockefeller strength that will make him a powerful factor in the convention. But a year ago he was clearly the front-runner for the nomination, and that is an entirely different thing.

THE WRITE-IN VICTORY for Lodge, U.S. ambassador to Vietnam, has a thinness about it when measured against other known factors. Both Goldwater and Rockefeller attributed Lodge's showing to a favorite-son sentiment spilling over the New Hampshire border from Massachusetts. There is also the possibility that New Hampshire Republicans chose to vote against both the major declared candidates, for reasons of their own, and found Lodge's name the handiest one for that purpose.

Against the impressive Lodge showing is the undisguised animosity against him among GOP professionals, county chairmen and such, in the Republican midwestern heartland.

They showed that animosity a full 12 years ago after Lodge had played a major role in the operation that brought Gen. Eisenhower back from Europe to battle the late Sen. Taft for the presidential nomination and take it away from him in the convention. Taft intimates made no secret of the fact that the word was sent out to hardshell Republicans in Massachusetts that Lodge's defeat for re-election to the Senate would not be unwelcome. (He lost to John F. Kennedy.)

Republican professionals of the hardshell type made no secret of the fact that they did not rejoice when Richard M. Nixon dictated the selection of Lodge for the vice presidential nomination in Chicago four years ago. And they did not like the desultory style of his campaigning thereafter—a couple of speeches a day, no toil and trouble.

Mr. Lodge remains in an acutely embarrassing situation in Vietnam. He says he will stay on as ambassador but he is running—if he is running—against the President he personally represents to Saigon. This poses issues of confidence on both sides; an ambassador does not run for the presidency, generally speaking, to oust the Chief Executive of the opposite party who at his pleasure allows the envoy to continue in a diplomatic privileged sanctuary.

AS OF NOW the GOP sweepstakes still appear wide open, with none of the three top New Hampshire leaders having anything to feel encouraged about.

Mr. Nixon wasn't hurt despite the fact that he ran behind Lodge in the write-in vote; the Nixon managers in New Hampshire didn't organize as the Lodge supporters did, and the principal Nixon advocate, former Gov. Wesley Powell, is a highly controversial figure who backed Democrats in the last election.

Pennsylvania's Gov. William W. Scranton—silent and inscrutable in Harrisburg, pursuing an independent line—remains as an "available." Nothing in the New Hampshire results damaged him.

SMOG COSTS EVERY AMERICAN $65 a year, Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.), left, declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) said this did not include the effect on health, which is "incalculable."

METHODS OF ENLISTING labor's womanpower in support of trade union goals were discussed at this all-day seminar in Tucson, Ariz., conducted by Marcella S. Beatty, standing, executive director of AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries. Mrs. Beatty, during a tour of the state, held similar workshops at Flagstaff, Prescott and Phoenix and discussed auxiliary programs with local central bodies.

Women Fill Labor Dept. Key Positions

Two Labor Dept. posts were filled by Pres. Johnson as he announced the appointment of 10 women to major government jobs in keeping with his promise to end discrimination based on sex.

They were Mrs. Mary Dublin Keyserling to be director of the Women's Bureau, and Mrs. India Edwards as special assistant on youth employment to Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

Mrs. Keyserling is widely known as an economist and since 1953 has been associate director of the Conference on Economic Progress. The conference is a research organization headed by her husband, Leon H. Keyserling, who was chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under former Pres. Truman.

A 1930 graduate of Barnard College, she was secretary of the Consumers' League in 1938-41, serving also on the advisory committees of the Women's Bureau, Childrens' Bureau and Labor Standards Div. in the U.S. Labor Dept., and she did work for the New York State Civil Service Commission. She has held many U.S. government posts since then, the last being director of the Intl. Economic Analysis Div. in the Commerce Dept.

Mrs. Edwards, vice chairman of the Democratic National Committee from 1950 to 1956, is a veteran of 22 years as a reporter and editor on the Chicago Tribune.

She came to Washington with her husband, Herbert T. Edwards, in 1942 and became active in politics in the 1944 presidential campaign, working at first as a volunteer for the Democratic National Committee.

From 1957 to 1959 she was director of the Washington office of the New York State Dept. of Commerce.

Women in Government Face 'Bright' Future

"The future is terrifically bright" for women in the federal service, Esther Peterson told 275 delegates to an all-day conference on the status of women sponsored by the American Federation of Government Employes.

Mrs. Peterson, who holds the dual post of assistant secretary of labor and Pres. Johnson's special assistant on consumer affairs, spoke to the AFGE in a third capacity—as the former executive vice chairman of the President's Commission on the Status of Women.

She told the conference that Pres. Johnson has "put increasing pressure" on government agencies "to give women an equal break and to eliminate discrimination." He has pressed the Administration's equal opportunity program, Mrs. Peterson related, "not only in public but also behind the scenes."

AFGE Sec.-Treas. Esther F. Johnson, chairman of the conference, said one of the "milestones" towards equality for women in the civil service was an Attorney General's decision sharply limiting the right of federal agencies to limit jobs to men or women.

This, she said, has opened up many new job opportunities for government career women, although the civil service is not yet a "showcase" of equal opportunity.

"The median salary of men holding professional jobs in government service is four grades higher than that of women," she declared.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, who served on a committee which reported on the status of women in private employment, told the conference that his panel had found that "discrimination because of sex was still widespread."

Keenan, who is secretary of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, said that despite some breakthroughs, "the occupational structure of our economy is still largely divided into jobs labeled 'his' or 'hers.' "

These labels, he said, "must be removed" because "failure to develop and use the talents of women to their fullest is a waste the nation cannot afford."

The conference also heard:

- AFGE Pres. John F. Griner, who pledged the union's full support to elimination of sex discrimination.
- Pres. Dorothy I. Height of the National Council of Negro Women, who called for more day-care centers for the children of working mothers.
- Evelyn Harrison, top-ranking woman in the Civil Service Commission, who said government surveys have exploded widely-held "myths" about women employes, including high turnover and heavy use of sick leave.

Discrimination—based on race, ethnic and sex prejudice—was dissected for the delegates by Assistant Surgeon Gen. Murray A. Diamond.

The conference adopted a resolution commending Johnson for his "progressive action" to end discrimination against women in the federal service.

AFT Protests Desegregation 'Slow Pace'

Chicago—Mass protests against the "slow pace of desegregation" of public schools in the North as well as the South were supported in principle by the executive council of the Teachers at its session here.

The AFT council endorsed "the aims and objectives" of mass parent and student action to speed school integration and said the union "stands ready to defend the right of teachers who, in good conscience, refuse to cross picket lines which uphold this principle of integration, or who participate in related civil rights movements."

In other action, the council announced the appointment of AFT Pres. Carl J. Megel as the union's national legislative representative. He will assume the Washington post on a full-time basis after his term as president expires Sept. 1. Megel, who has headed the AFT since 1952, has announced that he will not be a candidate for re-election this year.

Federationist Says:

Consumer Winning An Effective Voice

The citizen as consumer—long an easy mark for sharp business practices—may be on the way towards winning an effective voice in shaping public policies to protect his interests, the AFL-CIO has declared.

"A Voice for the Consumer," an article in the March issue of the American Federationist, AFL-CIO monthly publication, asserts that recent actions by Pres. Johnson may spur consumers to organize and fight for their interests.

The 1963 constitutional convention of the AFL-CIO, the article, a "Labor's Economic Review" prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept of Research, observed, "called for statutory provision for a fulltime consumer counsel supported by adequate staff and appropriations and directly responsible to the President. Ultimately we favor the establishment of a fullscale Dept. of Consumers, commanding equal standing with other departments of the government."

The article traced a variety of consumer efforts to protect their interests—the cooperative movement, voluntary groups in several states and direct representation in some state governments. At the federal level, it added, the late Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) was an early champion of a Dept. of Consumers which would serve the same purpose for consumers as do the Departments of Commerce, Agriculture and Labor for other groups.

The AFL-CIO said the Johnson actions followed demands by consumer and labor groups for improvement of the Kennedy Administration machinery.

The article recalled the consumer's "bill of rights" proposed by the late Pres. Kennedy in his unprecedented consumer message to Congress early in 1962:

- The right to safety—to be protected against the marketing of goods hazardous to health or life.
- The right to be informed—to be protected against fraudulent, deceitful or grossly misleading information, advertising, labeling or other practices and to be given the facts needed to make an informed choice.
- The right to choose—to be assured, wherever possible, access to a variety of products and services at competitive prices; and, in those industries in which competition is not workable and government regulation is substituted, an assurance of satisfactory quality and service at fair prices.
- The right to be heard—to be assured that the consumer interest will receive full and sympathetic consideration in the formulation of government policy and fair and expeditious treatment in its administration of tribunals.

On the legislative side of the problem, the AFL-CIO said the Johnson consumer message "placed the new Administration squarely behind legislative measures previously endorsed by the Kennedy Administration in behalf of the consumer, including such priority items as truth in packaging, truth in lending and expanded safety legislation in the fields of foods, drugs, cosmetics, pesticides and meat and poultry inspection."

"Significantly, the message also made explicit the President's opposition to resale price-fixing proposals currently before the Congress under the label of 'quality stabilization,' " it concluded.

Rogin Urges Full-Scale Federal Aid

A full-scale program of federal aid to elementary and secondary education is needed to overcome a continued shortage of classrooms and teachers, AFL-CIO Education Dir. Lawrence Rogin said in a network radio interview.

"Unless there is this kind of federal commitment," Rogin declared, "the country cannot adequately finance education."

Rogin, who was questioned on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public service program carried by the Mutual Broadcasting System, agreed that Congress "will have to find some way of resolving the church-state issue" on aid to education.

He suggested that this could be accomplished by expanding the National Defense Education Act, which provides limited assistance to non-public schools in equipping laboratories and classrooms for specified studies.

In response to questions on other educational problems, Rogin made these points:

- Getting "dropouts" to return to school doesn't solve the problem if they return to the same type of program which discouraged them from continuing in the first place.

It should be "a program for kids who are going to work, which means it needs to have some vocational emphasis. It needs to be remedial to the extent that this is necessary for reading, writing and simple mathematics. It needs to be in the culture of the kids themselves, and not an effort to adapt them to a middle-class culture. It needs to accept them as people and not try to remake them unsuccessfully."

- "The teachers are there" to develop a more flexible school program "if they are given an opportunity and a little help and encouragement to do it."
- The problem of school desegregation in the North "is that not only are these schools segregated, but they are the worst schools in the city."
- Labor "very strongly" supports extension of free public education to two years beyond high school in the vocational and technical field as well as in academic studies.

Rogin said the two major education bills passed in the first session of Congress—college aid and vocational education expansion—were important both for what they accomplished directly and because they represent "a commitment by the federal government to take a major role in the financing of education."

Apr. 1 AFM Target For Chicago Merger

New York—The Musicians have set Apr. 1 as the target date for merger of two Chicago affiliates, Locals 10 and 208.

At a meeting here early in March, the AFM executive board was told that "substantial progress" has been made toward voluntary merger of Local 208, whose membership is largely Negro, and Local 10, already partly integrated. The AFM urged segregated locals to merge "with all possible speed."

Malice Rule Set:

Court Spells Out Limits on Libel

The U.S. Supreme Court, in a landmark freedom-of-the-press decision, has ruled that a public official cannot recover libel damages for criticism of his conduct in office, even if false, unless he can prove the statement was made with actual malice.

In a case growing out of the racial situation in the South, the high court unanimously threw out a $500,000 judgment against the New York Times and four Negro ministers awarded by an Alabama jury to L. B. Sullivan, city commissioner in charge of police in Montgomery, Ala.

Sullivan's suit was the first of a series against the Times brought in 1960 by present and former city officials of Montgomery and Alabama's governor at the time, John P. Patterson.

The suits were based on an advertisement published in the Times on Mar. 29, 1960, appealing for contributions to aid Dr. Martin Luther King, the Negro civil rights leader. Although the governor and the Montgomery officials were not named, they claimed they were libeled by paragraphs in the advertisement describing police actions against King and students.

The Times contended that the actual purpose of the suits was to discourage news coverage of the racial situation in Alabama.

The jury, however, awarded $500,000 in damages to Sullivan, the entire amount he sought, and the state courts upheld the judgment.

The case marked the Supreme Court's first decision spelling out constitutional limits on libel awards to public officials.

The opinion by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., said the Constitution "prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves the statement was made with actual malice—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not."

Sullivan is left free to seek a new trial and attempt to prove that deliberate malice lay behind publication of the advertisement, but the court made it clear that it would also throw out any new judgment based on the kind of evidence used in the first trial.

Co-defendants with the Times in the suit were four Negro ministers — Ralph D. Abernathy, Fred L. Shuttlesworth, S. S. Seay Sr. and J. F. Lowery, who were listed as signers of the advertisement although they protested their names were used without their permission.

The Rev. Mr. Shuttlesworth also won another ruling from the Supreme Court, which reversed his conviction for alleged interference with Birmingham police during the Freedom Rides in 1961.

The State Court of Appeals had found the conduct to amount to simple assault, but said he "could have been clearly convicted" of that charge and upheld the sentence of 180 days in jail and $100 fine. The State Supreme Court dismissed a petition for review on a technical point. The U.S. Supreme Court, however, bluntly overruled the state courts in a unanimous, unsigned opinion running only three lines.

Arbitration Clause Upheld Despite Strike

The Supreme Court of the United States, reversing an Iowa Supreme Court decision, has ruled that a Packinghouse Workers local did not lost its right to arbitrate grievances when some members walked off their jobs despite a no-strike clause in the contract.

The decision applied to Local 721 and a 1961 dispute with the Needham Packing Co., Sioux City, Ia. The union sued to compel the firm to arbitrate two grievances, and the court upheld its claim and returned the suit to the Iowa court for further proceedings.

In a unanimous opinion the high court said the firm's claim that the union broke the no-strike clause in the contract "did not release Needham from its duty to arbitrate the union's claim that the employes had been wrongfully discharged."

In another ruling the high court agreed to review a decision by the 2d U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, New York, that the Musicians violated the Landrum-Griffin Act when delegates to the June 1963 AFM convention used a "weighted voting" procedure in raising dues and initiation fees.

In a decision that could affect a number of unions if allowed to stand, the appeals court upheld a lower court ruling that the Landrum-Griffin Act must be interpreted literally in its requirement that dues increases must be approved by a "majority vote" of convention delegates.

Ohio AFL-CIO Supports Young

Columbus, O.—The Ohio AFL-CIO has voiced its support for Sen. Stephen M. Young in his bid for the Democratic nomination in the state's May 5 primary.

The state labor group pointed out that it "traditionally refrains from endorsing candidates in primary contests for political office," but that the current race between Young and Astronaut John Glenn for the Democratic senatorial nomination is not "an ordinary primary race."

The state AFL-CIO group cited Young's "exemplary record on behalf of legislation to advance the general welfare of all Ohio citizens" and his support of the policies of Pres. Kennedy and Pres. Johnson as the overriding reasons for its endorsement.

MEMORIAL SERVICE in honor of the late Mary Anderson, pioneer woman trade unionist who headed the Women's Bureau in the Labor Dept. for 25 years, was held in AFL-CIO headquarters conference room with scores joining in tributes to her (top photo). Speakers (lower) included AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, former Sec. of Labor Frances Perkins, Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson, who presided; Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.); Ernestine Friedmann, representing the Bryn Mawr summer schools, and Pauline Newman of the Women's Trade Union League.

DeAndrade Wins Election Contest

Pressmen's Home, Tenn.—Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade of the Pressmen has won reelection to a four-year term over a rival candidate, an election committee reported here. All other top officers were returned without a contest.

DeAndrade defeated John W. Hays of Dallas by an electoral vote of 943 to 363 in a referendum among the 114,000 members of the union. All the officers will be installed at the union's convention in Washington in September.

Winners besides DeAndrade were Sec.-Treas. Alexander J. Rohan and Vice Presidents Walter J. Turner of Los Angeles, Patrick O'Sullivan of New York, James F. Doyle of Chicago, J. Frazier Moore and Clarence G. Schroeder of Detroit. Robert H. Brown, Toronto, was elected vice president for Canada, succeeding F. W. Maxted, retiring Sept. 12 after 29 years in office.

House Kills Pay Raise For Federal Workers

tistics surveys, the late Pres. Kennedy last year submitted proposals for pay raises averaging about 3 percent. The House Post Office & Civil Service Committee modified the Administration proposals to provide higher raises in some grades, pointing out that the "comparability" pay surveys were by then nearly two years old.

In other congressional action:

- The House voted 238-142, largely on party lines, to impose a 15 percent tax on purchases by Americans of foreign stocks bought from foreigners. The Administration-requested bill is designed to check the outflow of American dollars.
- The Senate, before taking up the civil rights bill, approved legislation enabling American textile mills to buy cotton at the lower price paid by foreign purchasers and providing a new wheat subsidy program partially paid for by wheat processors. The vote was 53-35. The House Agriculture Committee promptly approved the bill on a 20-13 party-line vote.
- A bill clearing the way for expansion of the Peace Corps from 7,000 to 14,000 volunteers over the next year was approved by both houses and sent to the President.

Johnson Appoints McDonald, Beirne

Two union leaders were among six men named to the boards of visitors of the service academies by Pres. Johnson.

Pres. David J. McDonald of the Steelworkers was appointed to the board for the Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., and Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications to that for the Military Academy at West Point, N. Y.

Tribute Paid to Work Of Mary Anderson

Some of the men and women who came to love Mary Anderson during her long years as a champion of the oppressed and the underprivileged gathered in AFL-CIO headquarters and demonstrated the affection in which they hold her still-green memory.

Miss Anderson, who came to this country as a Swedish immigrant girl of 16 and rose to head of the Labor Dept.'s Women's Bureau, died early this year at the age of 91.

Her successor as chief of the Women's Bureau, Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson, presided at the memorial services and played a tape recording of an interview a few months ago during which Mrs. Peterson asked her why she had joined a union as a young girl.

"I didn't know what unions meant," was the reply, "but I was lonely and I knew that I had found some friends.

Former Sec. of Labor Frances Perkins, who headed the department for 12 of the years Miss Anderson was chief of the Women's Bureau, said her qualities included "steadfastness, fearlessness, humor and deep concern for the welfare of other people."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, expressing the regrets of Pres. George Meany at his inability to attend the service, recalled:

"Throughout her life she attacked injustice with a fervor that enlisted thousands to the struggle and inspired all who met her. We are proud she was one of us."

"She taught young unionists with whom she worked . . . that it was not always necessary to change jobs to get better working conditions, that improved working conditions could be achieved through union negotiations." said Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

"Our country is a better place in which to live because of Mary Anderson's socio-economic contributions to its history," said Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.).

Ernestine Friedmann, representing the Bryn Mawr summer schools, and Pauline Newman, of the Women's Trade Union League, reminisced about Miss Anderson's role in the fight for rights for women.

Homebuilding Cited for Effect On Economy

Las Vegas, Nev.—A recent study by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. of the impact of new homes on a community has demonstrated once more that a healthy construction industry is "vitally necessary to a healty economy," Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the department told the Associated General Contractors of America here at their 45th annual convention.

Citing a study of the building of 10,000 homes, Haggerty said construction involved 20,000 man-years of labor, generated a need for $60 million worth of materials and $15 million in expenditures by the tenants for furniture, furnishings and appliances.

Building the homes required 47 million bricks, 23 million pounds of cement, 110,000 electric switches, 12,700 bathtubs and 3,200 garbage disposal units, Haggerty told the contractors in noting the impact home construction has on industry.

Haggerty said he believes too little effort has been expended by labor or builders in telling the public of the role played by the building industry in the economy and that "if the people and legislators were better informed . . . we would have less resistance against those programs—housing, urban renewal, and public works—that are so needed in every section."

Rival Forces Organize:

Southerners to Open Filibuster In Senate Civil Rights Debate

Kuchel to summon a majority of senators to the floor within minutes. Out-of-town engagements during the long debate are subject to leadership veto.

Sen. Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.) again has his hard core of 19 Dixie supporters organized into a three-platoon system, prepared to debate 24 hours a day if necessary. Russell needs only to keep two members on the floor at any one time to block action, while supporters of the bill must be able to muster a quorum of 51 members on short notice. Both Democratic and Republican civil rights supporters have set up special machinery to keep a quorum on hand, with Democrats having a quota of 36 senators to answer each quorum call, and Republicans a quota of 15.

The opening day of the debate, on Mar. 9, indicated some of the procedural roadblocks to Senate action. In order to prevent a motion to call up the civil rights bill during the "morning hour"—when it would not be debatable—Russell asked that the Senate journal, normally approved routinely, be read in full by the clerk "slowly and clearly."

When, later in the day, a quorum was lacking, the Senate's sergeant-at-arms was dispatched to round up absent members—a most unusual procedure in the clublike atmosphere of the upper house.

"I believe it is about time for the Senate to become used to what is going to happen many times in the days and weeks ahead," Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield commented drily.

Later Mansfield, asking the Senate to take up the bill, declared it would be "inexcusable . . . to shunt it aside." It should be debated, he said, "as long as is necessary for all views to be presented and argued" and then "voted up or down."

Humphrey vigorously defended the leadership's decision to bypass the Judiciary Committee and bring the bill before the Senate. Of 121 civil rights bills referred to the committee during the past 10 years, he said, only one was reported back.

The Dixie bloc is expected, after making a legislative record, to allow a vote on Mansfield's motion to take the bill from the calendar. When that is done, Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) has said he will move to send it to the Judiciary Committee for 10 days of hearings. GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) has said he will support Morse's proposal, but Mansfield, Humphrey and Kuchel have indicated they will oppose any further delay.

At one stage in the debate, Sen. Allen J. Ellender (D-La.), a "platoon leader" of the Dixie contingent, admitted frankly that Negroes are prevented from voting in some parts of the South. The reason, he said, is because the white residents are "scared" that Negroes would be voted into office.

Working with Humphrey on the Democratic side of the rights coalition are Senators Warren G. Magnuson (Wash.), Joseph S. Clark (Pa.), Philip A. Hart (Mich.), Wayne Morse (Ore.), Paul H. Douglas (Ill.), Edward V. Long (Mo.), John O. Pastore (R.I.) and Thomas J. Dodd (Conn.). Each will be responsible for refuting attacks on a key section of the bill.

The GOP's team of experts will be Senators Kenneth B. Keating (N.Y.), Roman L. Hruska (Neb.), Jacob K. Javits (N.Y.), John Sherman Cooper (Ky.), Hugh Scott (Pa.), Norris Cotton (N.H.), and Clifford P. Case (N.J.).

Hill-Burton Aid Backed For 'Obsolete' Hospitals

A proposed five-year extension of the Hill-Burton Hospital Construction Act, with additional funds earmarked to renovate obsolete facilities, was strongly endorsed by the AFL-CIO in testimony before the House Commerce Committee.

Since 1946, the federation told the committee, the Hill-Burton program has made "an enormous contribution to the improved health of all Americans" through federal grants for hospital and nursing home construction."

The AFL-CIO noted that the "greatest impact" of the Hill-Burton program has been in rural areas and small communities, where the need was greatest when the federal program was launched.

Today, the federation said, the need is "in the cores of our big cities," where facilities have become "inadequate, obsolete, inefficient and sometimes hazardous."

Committee Chairman Oren Harris (D-Ark.) has introduced a bill generally in line with Administration proposals calling for a $1.39 billion program over the next five years. It includes a step-up in grants for public and non-profit nursing homes and special hospitals for the chronically ill. Commenting on this provision, the AFL-CIO said:

"There is hardly a family in the country that has not had the experience of trying to find a decent nursing home or chronic disease facility for an aged relative or friend—and been shocked and dismayed at the miserable inadequacy of the vast majority of facilities currently available.

"The proposed increase in the authorization for financing long-term care facilities would do much to remedy the shameful inadequacies."

The new bill deletes the "separate but equal" clause in the existing law—which has been held unconstitutional in a federal appellate court decision which the Supreme Court refused to review.

Previously hospitals built with federal aid could deny admittance to Negroes if a state program for hospital services provided comparable facilities elsewhere in the area.

Hospital Pledge Required for Aid

The government will require a guarantee of non-discrimination against physicians and patients from all hospitals receiving Hill-Burton construction grants, Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze told the House Commerce Committee.

He said no new grants had been made for segregated facilities since last November, when an appellate court held the long-standing "separate but equal" provision unconstitutional. In the wake of the Supreme Court's refusal to review the decision, Celebrezze said, application forms for federal grants have been changed to include an affirmative pledge of non-discrimination.

PENNSYLVANIA UNIONISTS gather on steps of state capitol at Harrisburg as they demonstrated organized labor's firm opposition to a bill proposed by Gov. William W. Scranton (R) to cut back unemployment insurance benefits.

Pennsylvania Unions Fight Jobless Aid Cut

Harrisburg, Pa.—More than 2,500 leaders of AFL-CIO unions from all parts of Pennsylvania gathered in the capital this week to gird for a showdown against the Scranton administration's proposed unemployment compensation revisions.

While union leaders made plans for a mass march on the capital if it becomes necessary, Senate Republicans were sending the controversial measure to the floor for debate. Their move came after a week of party caucusing during which the measure remained essentially in its original form.

Senate Vote Near

At press time, the final Senate vote was expected momentarily.

Should the measure pass the Senate and go to the House, it was expected to touch off statewide reaction on an unprecedented scale. Leading the fight is the State AFL-CIO with area coordination being handled through the 46 central labor bodies.

Speaking to the union representatives in a local theatre before they marched to the steps of the capitol to hear legislative leaders, State AFL-CIO Pres. Harry Boyer castigated the bill's provisions as "cruel and inhuman", and declared they would penalize the state's jobless to benefit a few favored industries.

The bill contains provisions which will eliminate or reduce benefits for two out of every five now eligible, cutting current benefits by an estimated $55 million yearly. It has the personal endorsement of Gov. William W. Scranton (R) who says it is necessary to close "loopholes" to attract industry and bring the fund into financial stability.

The Pennsylvania AFL-CIO has steadfastly maintained that the Governor is in error on all three counts, holding that the "loopholes" are actually tens of thousands of citizens legally entitled to benefits who have been forced into part time and seasonal work. These persons would suffer, the AFL-CIO has maintained, along with the long-term jobless, the elderly and those who receive vacation pay, severance pay and other fringe benefits.

In radio and TV debates, the AFL-CIO leaders have provided data to prove that industrial relocation is not determined by the unemployment compensation tax, and the fund's stability is threatened only by a reduction in employer taxes, provided in the bill.

During the gathering on the capitol steps, the union representatives were assured that the battle against the measure would not be waged by labor alone. A York department store owner, Albert Hydeman, Jr., declared that "merchants and small businessmen who have taken a deep look at this measure are against it." Hydeman also noted that he was critical of the businessmen-sponsors of the anonymous "Jobs for Pennsylvanians Committee," which has financed radio and TV ads supporting the bill.

Following the outdoor meeting, the union representatives met with legislators from their home areas.

Republican Hopefuls Head West For More Primary Campaigns

didate, trailed far behind with 2,810, and former Gov. Harold E. Stassen of Minnesota had 1,282.

Former Vice Pres. Nixon picked up 15,736 write-in votes with a campaign less vigorously organized by his backers than Lodge's, and there was a scattering of write-ins for Gov. Romney of Michigan and Gov. Scranton of Pennsylvania.

In the Democratic primary, 20 convention delegates were selected in uncontested voting. Pres. Johnson got 18,058 write-in votes and Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy received 14,548 write-ins for vice president.

The next direct clash of GOP candidates is scheduled in the Apr. 14 Illinois primary in which Goldwater and Mrs. Smith—but not Rockefeller—are entered.

Oregon Primary May 15

The Oregon primary May 15 will carry on its Republican ballot the names of all six GOP hopefuls seriously mentioned on a national basis—including Lodge, Nixon and Scranton as well as the declared candidates, Rockefeller, Goldwater and Mrs. Smith.

Romney removed his name by filing an affidavit that he was not and would not become a candidate. Scranton asked that his be removed but the Oregon secretary of state refused in the absence of a similar affidavit of non-candidacy. Scranton has steadfastly maintained that he is not a candidate but would not refuse a genuine draft.

The "big" primary remaining is the California battle June 2, when Goldwater and Rockefeller will again face each other head-on, with political figures of stature heading their campaign organizations. Rockefeller's manager is Sen. Thomas E. Kuchel, biggest GOP vote-getter of recent years in the state, and the Goldwater forces are led by former Sen. William F. Knowland.

Goldwater, who was believed to have a strong appeal in New Hampshire as the campaign began, acknowleged in a post-primary statement that he may have made a few "goofs" along the way and promised his supporters to fight harder. He referred to Lodge, the party's 1960 vice presidential nominee, as partly responsible for Republican defeat in that year because of sparse speech appearances and said he himself would campaign "18 or 24 hours a day."

Rockefeller congratulated Lodge and urged him, as Goldwater had, to return to this country and join "discussion of the issues." He expressed encouragement that the results showed he had gained substantially from the beginning of the campaign, when he was a 4-to-1 or 5-to-1 "underdog" in public opinion polls.

To Stay in Vietnam

George Lodge said he expected the ambassador to remain on duty in Vietnam, pointing out that he had gone out as envoy under the late Pres. Kennedy at a time of transition and had a strong sense of duty about completing his assigned task.

George Lodge also said that if the GOP convention nominated his father, the latter would respond "enthusiastically." It was uncertain, however, what write-in campaigns if any would be organized for the ambassador in primaries outside his native New England.

In another state, voters in the 2nd Congressional District of Tennessee elected Mrs. Irene Bailey Baker (R) to fill the vacancy created by the death of her husband, the late Rep. Howard Baker.

Her margin over the Democratic nominee, newspaperman Willard Yarbrough, was sharply cut beneath the normal GOP majorities in the district, which has not elected a Democrat since before the Civil War. Unofficial returns gave Mrs. Baker 40,757 votes to 31,775 for Yarbrough.

Meany Urges Broad Scope To Johnson's Poverty War

Bipartisan Group Hits Rights Foes

By David L. Perlman

A bipartisan civil rights bloc battled a southern filibuster step-by-step as it drove for the first Senate test vote—on a motion to make the House-passed bill the pending business.

Although southern senators continued to hold the floor with speeches stretching on into the evening, civil rights supporters interrupted the traditional monologues to engage in lively debate. They came prepared with sharp rebuttal evidence and counterattacked with a blast at a nationwide advertising campaign against the rights bill financed in large part by Mississippi tax funds.

With the legislative clock stopped at Mar. 9 to limit the delaying tactics southerners can use to block a vote, floor managers of the bill hoped to reach a vote on the motion to call up the measure before the three-day Easter weekend.

A second and closer test was expected on a subsequent move to send the bill to the Judiciary Committee for 10 days of hearings. The proposal has some support from northern ranks.

Ad Drive Assailed

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and New York's two Republican senators, Jacob K. Javits and Kenneth B. Keating, joined in denouncing a group calling itself the Coordinating Committee for Fundamental American Freedoms which placed full-page ads in more than 200 newspapers in an effort

Hits Conflict on Productivity:

Statistical Confusion Charged by Meany

Statistical confusion in government agencies over productivity increase figures can delay national policy decisions necessary to achieve and sustain full employment, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

The federation president wrote Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz that "the subject of rising productivity is altogether too important to the nation—and particularly to American workers—to permit statistical differences among government technicians to hide the reality."

Meany urged Wirtz to establish "a top-level committee to examine the technical differences among government agencies on the statistics of manufacturing production and productivity, with authority to make recommendations to those agencies for the purpose of reducing or eliminating such statistical differences."

His letter was touched off by a Bureau of Labor Statistics report that it would be "unwise" at this time to publish revised manufacturing productivity estimates because the Office of Business Economics of the Commerce Dept. was revising some of its statistical information.

This led in turn to newspaper stories that BLS "experts" felt their earlier estimates of the rate of productivity increase in manufacturing were too high and to headlines such as "Job Losses Overestimated in Automation, U.S. Finds."

This series of events, said Meany, is presenting the nation with "a confusing picture about the pace of rising productivity and the impact of automation."

He pointed out that the key aspects are clear: that a $30 billion increase in gross national product in 1963 was accompanied by a rise in unemployment; that the rate of

Praises 'Eloquent' Presidential Plea

By John M. Barry

A House Labor subcommittee jumped off to a fast start with hearings on the proposed Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, the anti-poverty legislation which Pres. Johnson has keyed to education and job opportunities for deprived youths and development of community action programs.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany congratulated the President for his "eloquent" message to Congress supporting the draft bill and expressed particular gratification that Johnson "is determined to strike at the causes of poverty, not merely the consequences."

"We are sure," Meany continued, "the President recognizes that the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, imaginative and vastly important though it is, cannot by itself achieve his—and the nation's—objectives."

The broad aims of the measure—to expand work and educational opportunities for young people, spur community anti-poverty efforts and help small business expand employment—are all "praiseworthy," the AFL-CIO president observed.

"But in order to create adequate economic opportunities for the 35 million Americans who now live in poverty, much more is required," he declared.

He said he was sure the President, in expressing his "total commitment" to the fight against "the nation's most dangerous domestic enemy," had in mind such pending items as:

- Extension of the accelerated public works program, which Meany noted is soon due to expire, "with the 200,000 jobs it currently provides." It should be renewed with a $2 billion appropriation, he said.
- Extension of coverage of the federal wage-hour law to millions

Rally Fights Scranton's Jobless Bill

Harrisburg, Pa.—The largest concentration of trade union members in recent state history—20,000 in number — marched through the streets of the state capital Mar. 19 to protest the Republican-sponsored bill to revise unemployment compensation. While they marched, the House of Representatives met in a showdown session that promised to out-do the protracted debate which accompanied Senate passage of the bill the previous week.

At issue were revisions that would slash total jobless pay benefits and severely tighten eligibility qualifications despite Senate amendments somewhat modifying the original proposals of Gov. William W. Scranton. Scranton, frequently mentioned as a Republican "darkhorse" presidential possibility, has thrown the full prestige of his Administration behind passage.

The bill, as passed by the Senate, would raise maximum jobless benefits by $5 a week for relatively few unemployed but shorten the dura-

Johnson Hails Labor Role In Bias Fight

President Johnson, meeting with the new Labor Advisory Council to the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, congratulated the labor movement for its role in combating racial discrimination and expressed appreciation for the support given the Administration's civil rights bill by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates.

"With your help we will enact that bill," the President said, "because it is the right thing and the responsible thing to do. This bill will provide the Federal Fair Employment Practices and other needed protection that will make opportunity more equal—but our

$7 Million Attack on King-Anderson Laid to AMA by Senior Citizens

Rising hopes for enactment of old-age social security hospital insurance in this session of Congress have triggered a "long-planned, richly-financed counterattack" by the American Medical Association, the National Council of Senior Citizens has charged.

In the current issue of its monthly publication, the NCSC said the AMA is pouring "staggering sums" into its "Operation Hometown" in an attempt to create through local newspaper advertisements, television programs and letter-writing campaigns an impression of grass-roots opposition to the hospital insurance plan.

Before the drive to prevent enactment of the labor-backed King-Anderson bill is over, the NCSC charged, the medical lobby may well have spent more than $7 million in anti-medicare propaganda. That is the minimum amount the NCSC estimates went into organized medicine's campaign against the King-Anderson bill in 1962, when the measure was defeated by two votes in the Senate.

Acting NCSC Pres. John W. Edelman said senior citizen clubs across the country have forwarded to council headquarters clippings of standard AMA newspaper advertisements beginning to appear in many states under county medical society sponsorship. These ads, he noted, have been printed in such widely separated areas as Baker County, Ore.; Louisville, Ky.; South Bend, Ind.; Hamtramck, Mich.; California, Illinois and Iowa.

Edelman also reported that the AMA has prepared a new film for use on local television stations, with local doctors reading the commentary off-camera, and is widely distributing special printed materials.

He also cited an account by Washington Scripps-Howard Col-productivity increase is sharply upward at 3.5 percent, adding:

"Public confusion, based on technical differences about the statistics of the manufacturing sector, can only serve to delay the national policy decisions required to achieve and sustain full employment. . . . For workers who have been displaced and for those threatened by displacement, automation and rapidly rising productivity are very real," with a 1.5 million drop in production and maintenance employment between 1953 and 1963.

The confusion can be ended, he said, "by a careful examination of the differing series of output and productivity figures published by various government agencies."

Besides the Labor Dept.'s BLS and the Commerce Dept.'s OBE, the Council of Economic Advisers also publishes productivity figures. The published figures of all three agencies vary widely.

ILO Seeks to Help Displaced Workers

Geneva—Experts from 12 countries, including the United States, are meeting here under the auspices of the Intl. Labor Organization to explore means of helping governments, management and labor cope with the plight of workers displaced by automation.

Leon Greenberg, an assistant commissioner of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics, is the U. S. representative at the meeting, scheduled to wind up Mar. 25.

The conference also is attempting to develop internationally valid methods of measuring the effects of automation on employment, working conditions and the occupational structure of the labor force.

Anderson Cites Failure Of Kentucky Kerr-Mills

Frankfort, Ky.—The state of Kentucky's limited success in providing health care for its needy aged through the Kerr-Mills Act program was cited by Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N.M.) as stark evidence that Kerr-Mills is not enough and that the nation needs a social security program of hospital insurance for its older citizens.

Just such a program would be provided by the King-Anderson bill, co-authored by the New Mexico senator and Rep. Cecil R. King (D-Calif.).

Anderson, addressing the Kentucky General Assembly, congratulated the state legislators on being among the first to implement the Kerr-Mills program of medical assistance to aged persons who meet a means test, under a federal-state financing system.

"I do not think I am imposing on your kindness in having me here," he added, "when I say that what you have done is simply not enough. I compliment you on what has been done and know that it is as much as you can do in the face of other demands on the state treasury."

He noted that Kentucky's program of Kerr-Mills benefits now is limited to a maximum of 10 days of hospitalization and that the legislature had rejected proposals to liberalize eligibility standards and lift the benefits ceiling to 21 days, because this would have raised the cost to $40 million a year, with the state obligated for $10 million of that amount.

Social Security Need

The solution to the dilemma of rising medical and hospitalization costs and the high incidence of illness and injury among the aged lies in the social security approach, Anderson declared.

"The plain fact," he said, "is that older people generally cannot afford the cost of reasonably complete health insurance—insurance that costs a couple about $450 a year even under the State-65 plans, which are operated on a nonprofit basis.

"Neither can they afford the $900 or $1,000 in health costs they may encounter in a year in which they are hospitalized. And the older person can expect two or three trips to the hospital after age 65. Thus, most older people are faced with the prospect that serious, and expensive, illness could wipe out their savings and force them to become dependent upon children or charity. . . .

"The chief purpose of the King-Anderson bill and similar legislation is not to provide care that people are not now receiving—although many aged are deprived of adequate care. The aim is to give the aged some protection against the dread—and the actuality—of becoming destitute or dependent as a result of the costs of major illness.

"I say this because the hope behind the original Social Security Act was—in the words of the Supreme Court—'to save men and women from the rigors of the poorhouse as well as from the haunting fear that such a lot awaits them when the journey's end is near.'"

Union House Sign Set For New York Fair

New York—The "union house" sign will be up at the New York World's Fair when the first of an expected 70 million visitors starts entering the fair's 275 restaurants, bars, night clubs, cocktail lounges and refreshment stands Apr. 22.

Some 6,000 bartenders and culinary workers, including 600 chefs from foreign lands, will be members of a specially chartered local of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes under an agreement reached by Robert Moses, head of the World's Fair Corp., and Pres. Ed. S. Miller of the union.

The agreement provides that all food and drink employes shall be members of new Local 1000 for the duration of the fair, which is scheduled to end in October 1965.

It calls for a union shop, dues checkoff, and these additional terms:

- A five-day 40-hour week for most workers with pay of $42 for waiters and waitresses, $90 for bartenders at front bars, $100 at service bars, with $60 set for unskilled workers in vending occupations.
- Kitchen workers will be on a 35-hour five-day week with wages varying but in no case less than the prevailing rate of New York locals for the comparable type of cuisine and quality of service.

Grievances will be referred to business agents at a labor center on the fairgrounds, and if not settled there, for binding arbitration by an impartial umpire—William O'Dwyer, former mayor of New York and onetime U.S. ambassador to Mexico.

Plans for the new Local 1000 were begun nearly three years ago, Miller said, during early stages of fair planning. The basic labor-management agreement will be supplemented by additional contracts to be signed by officers of the local and individual exhibitors.

Iroquois Gas Vote Won by IBEW

Buffalo—The Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has captured bargaining rights for 1,377 employes of the Iroquois Gas Corp. from District 50 of the United Mine Workers.

The UMW had been bargaining agent for the production and maintenance workers since 1942.

The IBEW's margin of victory was better than 2 to 1 in the mail referendum, conducted by the Buffalo regional office of the National Labor Relations Board. More than 97 percent of the eligibles voted. The IBEW received 896 votes and District 50, 376. There were 12 votes for no union and 35 votes were challenged.

Employed Up:

Jobless Unchanged Despite Dip in Rate

By Robert B. Cooney

The job picture in the non-farm sector showed "strong improvement" in February, the Labor Dept. said in releasing its detailed employment figures. However, the total unemployed remained unchanged at 4.5 million despite a slight dip to 5.4 percent in the jobless rate.

The report showed a rise of 80,000 to 56.9 million on non-farm payrolls although the total usually falls off by 200,000 this time of year.

In an earlier summary report, based on household surveys, the Labor Dept. reported a "substantial" job pickup which edged the seasonally adjusted jobless rate down to 5.4 percent from January's 5.6 percent.

Putting the stubborn high-level unemployment problem in longer perspective, the Labor Dept. had this to say on job gains since the 1960 downturn:

"February 1964 marks the 36th month since the trough of the latest and mildest of the four postwar recessions, the longest peacetime recovery period since the 1930s. However, since early 1962, total unemployment has not fallen significantly despite a strong uptrend in non-farm employment and general economic activity."

The detailed report said "better-than-seasonal" developments in manufacturing and construction represented the first major gains in the goods-producing industries since mid-1963. Trade and services added to the improvement, the report said.

In contract construction, jobholders increased by 50,000 to 2.7 million in the face of an expected large decline, the report said. This rise, it was explained, was in part a recovery from cutbacks forced by January snowstorms. The total stood 75,000 higher than in December, on an adjusted basis.

Factory Employment Up

Factory employment moved up by 45,000 to 17 million, although little change was expected and some 15,000 striking machinery workers were absent from their jobs, the report continued.

About 80 percent of the over-the-month rise occurred in the soft goods area, the report showed, with apparel leading the way. Compared to February a year ago, the factory sector of 17 million was up by 299,000—two-thirds of it in hard goods.

There were two sizable downturns in hard goods over the year: electrical equipment dropped by 25,000 to 1.56 million and ordnance by 6,700 to 273,000. Experts explained this was due to cutbacks in such defense work as electronics.

Trade employment fell by 118,000 over the month to 11.8 million, most of the decline occurring in the retail field. This was a smaller than usual drop, the report said.

Workweek 40.3 Hours

The factory workweek rose from 39.8 hours in January—"when there was especially bad weather in the survey week"—to 40.3 hours in February, the report said. On a seasonally adjusted basis, it added, the workweek was back to the high levels reached last fall. Overtime hours remained at 2.7 in February.

Average hourly earnings of factory production workers also remained at $2.51 in February. But the rebound in hours, the report added, boosted weekly earnings from $99.90 in January to $101.15 in February.

Compared to 1963, the total non-farm employment of 56.9 million in February was up by 1.6 million. All industry divisions, except mining and the federal government, contributed to the rise, the report showed.

Major Jobless Areas Show Rise in February

The total of major job centers suffering "substantial unemployment" continued to rise in February with the addition of the Paterson-Clifton-Passaic, N. J., and Lorain-Elyria, O., areas, the Labor Dept. has reported.

Six other areas were reclassified, all in the direction of higher unemployment, the department added.

The February survey of 150 major job centers showed 41 with 6 percent or more unemployed. This group totaled 39 in January, 38 in December and had rested at a 1963 low of 37 from August through November.

In the Paterson-Clifton-Passaic area, the Labor Dept. said, the increase in unemployment resulted from both recent and over-the-year reductions in manufacturing, especially aircraft components, instruments, primary metals and apparel.

Lorain-Elyria has shown higher unemployment because of cutbacks in steel, stone-clay-glass, transportation equipment and electrical machinery, the report said.

Both areas had been in the 3-to-6 percent jobless category prior to February.

Three areas—South Bend, Ind., and Altoona and Wilkes-Barre-Hazleton, Pa.—were reclassified into the 9-to-12 percent jobless category with a worsening of their job situations.

The report said South Bend reported further declines in automotive and missiles employment as well as seasonal layoffs in rubber, trade and construction. In the Altoona and Wilkes-Barre-Hazleton areas, cutbacks in construction and other seasonal job losses added to unemployment, the report added.

Three other areas—Grand Rapids and Saginaw, Mich., and Greensboro-High Point, N. C.—were hit by seasonal unemployment and were shifted from the 1.5 to 2.9 percent jobless grouping to the 3-to-5.9 percent category.

The list of smaller areas with "substantial unemployment" moved upward to 156 in February, the department said, as five areas were added and two were removed. This group has been totaling in the 170s for most of 1963 and had dropped to 153 in December and January.

Rail Spokesman Thunders:

'Massive Retaliation' Threat Hurled at Operating Unions

Railroad management served notice on rail unions and the public that a strike against one railroad in the long-smouldering work rules dispute would be met by a massive retaliation policy which would force a nationwide rail shutdown.

Management's chief negotiator, J. E. Wolfe, made this threat at a Mar. 16 press conference. Wolfe said he had "unimpeachable advice" that operating unions intended to strike the Southern Pacific and Louisville & Nashville railroads on Mar. 18. Rail union officials told puzzled newsmen that they had set no strike date and had merely renewed a request that the two railroads meet with the unions in an attempt to negotiate separate settlements.

Still unresolved after more than four years of off-and-on negotiations are:

- Management demands for the right to combine road and yard service assignments, a revised pay scale which would require employes to work longer hours for the same base pay, and the right to combine seniority districts and eliminate crew change terminals.
- Union demands for holiday pay—which most operating employes do not receive—and for night shift differentials, uniform overtime pay, and compensation for away-from-home expenses.

Not involved in the dispute is the controversy over use of locomotive firemen. Congress last August ordered that issue handled through arbitration and a union challenge to the arbitration award is pending in court.

The operating unions—the Engineers, Firemen, Conductors, Switchmen and Trainmen—have charged that the railroads have dragged their feet on national bargaining in the belief that Congress would again step if a nationwide strike threatened. No direct negotiations have been held since last December.

First the Trainmen and then the other operating unions proposed an effort to resolve the disputes with individual railroads in the hope that more flexible bargaining could be achieved.

Wolfe, speaking for the national management negotiating committee, denounced this as "guerilla warfare" tactics "with the full economic power of the national unions brought to bear on a single company."

"We are not going to permit these unions to crucify a single railroad," he thundered at his news conference. A strike against one company, he avowed, would be considered "a strike against all."

If the unions struck because of the refusal of individual railroads to bargain, Wolfe said, the industry would first seek a court order barring a strike. If that were denied, he said, all railroads would post notices unilaterally imposing management's original work rules demands—thus forcing a nationwide strike.

Along with this ultimatum, Wolfe made public a letter to Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz urging the Administration to "move promptly to prevent the unions from turning private disputes into public disaster."

Wirtz told newsmen that "in my judgment, there is no reason or justification for a national crisis on the railroads." And Chairman Francis O'Neill, Jr., of the National Mediation Board commented, "There is no strike threat now."

In a later development, the Southern Pacific obtained a temporary restraining order from a California state judge barring any strike pending a Mar. 27 hearing. Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen termed the court action "amazing" since union members of the railroad had neither requested nor been granted strike authority.

The unions contend that the obligation to bargain exists under the Railway Labor Act, while management insists that once issues have been referred to national negotiations they cannot be sent back to lower levels without mutual consent.

New Emergency Board

Meanwhile, in a parallel dispute, Pres. Johnson named a Presidential Emergency Board to make recommendations on wage and job security issues affecting 11 non-operating unions. The board will have 30 days to report and both parties are obligated to bargain for at least an additional 30 days thereafter.

Still continuing, with no signs of an imminent settlement, was the 14-month strike against the Florida East Coast Railway.

Three railroaders were arrested on charges of placing dynamite sticks on an FEC trestle by FBI agents who said they had been under surveillance for nearly a week. A series of dynamitings on the struck railroad has been denounced by union leaders as damaging to the strikers' cause.

JOHN DEWEY AWARD of the United Federation of Teachers, New York Local 2 of the American Federation of Teachers, is presented to the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, right, by Pres. Charles Cogen before 2,600 guests at annual UFT conference. Citation described King as "eloquent spokesman for millions," a "dreamer and doer" and "educator in the profoundest sense" of the word. The clergyman has been one of the top leaders in Negro demonstrations for full civil rights.

Teachers Give King John Dewey Award

New York—The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, champion of civil rights for all citizens, received the annual John Dewey Award of the United Federation of Teachers before a capacity audience of 2,600 at the union's spring conference here.

A citation accompanying the award called him "the eloquent spokesman for millions in the great social crisis of our time, dreamer and doer, educator in the profoundest sense of the word."

Accepting the award presented by UFT Pres. Charles Cogen, the southern clergyman said it honored not only him but also the "hundreds of thousands of people who have been engaged in the civil rights struggle" in many cities.

King, relating the conference theme—"Educational Countdown: New Directions for Teacher Action"—to the civil rights struggle, observed that "education has been the battlefield of the struggle" and "education is the road to equality and citizenship."

"Education for all Americans has been inadequate; education has been pauperized so that the past has presented a bill to the present for adequate education for both white and Negro," he added.

Joining in the tribute to King were Pres. Harry Van Arsdale of the New York City AFL-CIO; Intl. Pres. Carl Megel of the Teachers, Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers, Organizational Dir. Nicholas Zonarich of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., Rep. William Fitts Ryan (D-N. Y.), members of the New York Board of Education, the state Senate and Assembly, and others.

Panel Sessions Held

The conference featured panel discussions of school segregation, the role of the union in politics, and other subjects.

The union, which is Local 2 of the Teachers, recently ratified a two-year contract with the Board of Education providing regular monthly consultation with the superintendent of schools on matters of educational policy, and provisions for salary and classroom improvements. The contract is the only one of the kind in the country, the union said.

Social Workers' Strike Brings Major Gains

New York—A thousand social workers, on strike for the first time in nearly 20 years against six welfare agencies, ratified a new two-year contract at a meeting here but then returned to the picket lines on an issue involving protection of supervisors.

The strikers, their major objectives won, turned their picket signs around and painted in the words 'No Reprisals.' The picketing ended on the 21st day when the employers agreed not to penalize agency officials exempted from the contract, who had refused to go through the picket lines.

For most members of the Community & Social Agency Employes, Local 1707 of the State, County & Municipal Employes, it was their first strike. Their solidarity won major gains in wages and working conditions at 45 locations of agencies supported in part by the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies.

The new contract provides wage increases of $3.50 a week the first year and $3 the second year for clerical, maintenance and food service workers with three years of service or less, $4 and $3 for those with longer service.

Homemakers will get raises and increments of $5 to $9.90 a week over the two-year period. Child care workers won raises of $500 to $700 a year.

The pact gives caseworkers, senior caseworkers and supervising caseworkers annual increases ranging from $800 to $1,100 a year, with supervisors raised to a top of $10,120 after seven years of service—the first time the $10,000 "barrier" has been broken by the local, according to union Rep. Stephen Remsen.

Wage scales for most of the "professionals" will start at $6,100 and go to the new $10,120 top, based on length of service and other factors.

Other contract improvements include a provision for regular labor-management meetings to avoid future "crisis" bargaining; maintenance of membership and a dues checkoff for everyone in the bargaining unit; upgrading of specified clerical positions; health and welfare plan improvements, with Blue Cross benefit coverage increased from the present 21 days to 120, and, for those who retire, health and welfare benefits fully paid by the employer.

The contract is with non-profit agencies in the fields of children's care, family counseling, adoptions, unwed mother services and others. The union negotiated for two months and struck Feb. 20 when members rejected a "take-it-or-leave-it" offer.

NBC to Broadcast Murray Life Story

The National Broadcasting Co. radio network will broadcast a half-hour program Apr. 5 on the life of Philip Murray, late president of the former CIO. Time set is 12:30 p.m. EST.

This is an entirely different program from the television production on Murray which was aired last Nov. 17. The radio presentation is entitled "To Live with Dignity." The script is by Allan Chase.

The program, like previous radio and TV productions on Samuel Gompers and William Green, is incorporated into the regular Eternal Light series. It was created through the joint efforts of the George Meany Foundation and the Herbert H. Lehman Institute of the Jewish Theological Seminary.

The exact broadcast time for each area should be checked by calling the local NBC radio outlet.

FTC Charges Filed Over 'Bunny' Ads

Charges of "false and misleading" advertising by Playboy Intl. to recruit nightclub waitresses it calls "bunnies" have been lodged by the Hotel & Restaurant Employes with the Federal Trade Commission.

The charges were filed at the commission's Bureau of Deceptive Practices by union officers headed by Sec.-Treas. Robert L. Diefenbach, with Michael J. Vitale, chief of the bureau's general practices division, and Robert J. Hughes, an FTC attorney.

The union representatives presented "help wanted" ads displaying what the union called "deceptive" offers of "fabulous" earnings and glamorous careers. They said that the club promoter has advertised that club waitresses dressed in "bunny" costumes may earn more than $200 a week.

The facts are, the unionists said, that waitresses in New York and Detroit Playboy clubs collect as little as $44 a week and are subject to fines for breaking "club" rules. Further they said, in some cities they are not paid wages and are not protected by federal wage and hour laws.

At a union conference in Washington, Pres. Ed. S. Miller charged that the Playboy Club in Detroit enforces a "kickback" of tips in violation of a state law forbidding the practice. In New York City, the union has petitioned for a National Labor Relations Board election covering all employes.

The union, said Miller, is "not keeping tabs on people's morals" but will "challenge the immorality" of false promises to "lure women into jobs where they're paid no wages, subjected to the "kickback" on tips and "enjoy none of the conventional protections" of other working people.

Strikes in January Below 1963 Level

Strike idleness in January was less than half that in January 1963, with the number of strikes starting during the month and the number of workers involved in them also fewer than a year earlier, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics said in a preliminary report.

About 210 work stoppages—some 60 percent in manufacturing industries—affecting 60,000 workers were reported as beginning during the month. In addition, 160 stoppages involving 40,000 workers continued from December.

Strike-caused idleness during the month was placed at 1,010,000 man-days or one-tenth of 1 percent of estimated working time. The rate in January 1963 was 23 one-hundredths of 1 percent.

NEW LABOR ADVISORY COUNCIL to the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity meets at the White House with the committee's chairman, Pres. Johnson, and with other committee officials and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. At the President's right is Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, vice chairman of the committee, and at Meany's right is Hobart Taylor, executive vice chairman. Standing, third from left, is AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and, fifth from left, Iron Workers Pres. John H. Lyons Jr., chairman of the advisory council.

task will not be finished when it is passed."

Earlier, the hour-long White House meeting of the Advisory Council had been addressed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, who is vice chairman of the committee, and Hobart Taylor, executive vice chairman. Also taking part in the meeting were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, who is a member of the President's committee and heads one of its subcommittees, and AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman and members of his staff.

Among the unfinished tasks in the drive for equality of opportunity is the need to establish a full employment economy, Johnson told the group. He cited the recently enacted tax cut, expansion of the Manpower Development & Training Act and the proposed anti-poverty legislation as examples of measures aimed at reaching that objective.

"Our goal," he said, "is not to reach equality in jobs by spreading unemployment, or to replace men who are now working with those who are unemployed. We must provide more jobs for all. We must provide enough jobs for all. I want you to know my complete commitment to that goal."

Johnson, who has himself headed the President's Committee since it was first established three years ago, noted that labor's efforts to wipe out discrimination in its own ranks are evidenced by the programs of fair practices signed with the committee by AFL-CIO unions representing 12.5 million workers.

He urged the new advisory council to help win similar pledges from remaining unions and predicted it would contribute to "a closer, more effective and fruitful relationship between the President's Committee and the AFL-CIO."

Chairman of the 16-member advisory council is Pres. John H. Lyons, Jr., of the Iron Workers. Other members are Pres. Hunter P. Wharton, Operating Engineers; Vice Pres. Milton P. Webster, Sleeping Car Porters; Pres. Max Greenberg, Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union; Pres. Eddie R. Stahl, Aluminum Workers; Pres. Howard Coughlin, Office Employes; Pres. William Pollock, Textile Workers Union of America; Pres. Daniel E. Conway, American Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

Also, Pres. C. W. Sickles, Asbestos Workers; Pres. William J. Pachler, Utility Workers; Pres. Russell K. Berg, Boiler Makers; Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade, Printing Pressmen; Pres. John E. Mara, Boot & Shoe Workers; Pres. Eugene E. Frazier, Transport Service Employes; Pres. George Burdon, Rubber Workers; Sec.-Treas. William E. Fredenberger, Firemen & Oilers.

Ban on Superseniority Applied in Erie Case

The Supreme Court's ruling against superseniority for strikebreakers in the Erie Resistor Corp. case has been spelled out by the 3d U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Philadelphia, which granted the petition of the National Labor Relations Board for an enforcement order.

The ruling signaled the end of a five-year fight by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers against a company attempt to give 20 years of seniority to replacements hired during a 1959 strike of IUE Local 613 at the Erie, Pa., plant, now called Erie Technological Products, Inc.

The 3d Circuit Court upheld the ruling of the NLRB in its entirety. The case now goes back to the labor board for hearings on the number of workers entitled to reinstatement and the amount of lost pay the firm must give them.

The circuit court held that the strike, which started as an economic strike Apr. 1, 1959, was converted to an unfair practice strike on May 29 that year, as the NLRB found. The latter date was the one on which the strikers, rejecting the proposed superseniority plan, voted to continue their strike.

The court said in its decision that an employer who pursues a course of conduct later determined to be an unfair labor practice "does so at his peril." Noting that "the equities in this case seem to favor the employes," the appellate judges said "it would be inequitable to require them to absorb pay losses ascribable to the unfair labor practice of the company."

The same court in an earlier action had refused to uphold the NLRB but was reversed by the high court and heard reargument last October.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion written by Justice Byron R. White, said superseniority "by its very terms operates to discriminate between strikers and non-strikers" and "its destructive impact upon the strike and union activity cannot be doubted."

Shortly after the strike ended on June 25, 1959, the union filed the unfair practice charges that later were upheld by the NLRB and the Supreme Court.

ILGWU Asks 10% Raise in Cloaks-Suits

New York—The Ladies' Garment Workers, successful in winning contract settlements with almost 1,500 dressmaking firms in the metropolitan area, has turned its attention to the cloak and suit industry with a proposal for a 10 percent wage hike for the industry's 40,000 workers.

Short strikes against 145 dressmaking shops were ended when holdout employers accepted the terms of an industrywide settlement achieved in February, the union said. The agreement gave 80,000 workers in eight eastern states a package of wage and fringe benefits averaging 8 percent.

Contracts with three employer groups in the coat and suit industry have a May 31 expiration date. The union's Cloak Joint Board has asked the employers, who sell $600 million worth of women's coats and suits a year, for three-year contracts providing a wage boost and these other benefits:

Increases in wage minimums for all week and piece workers, and modification of craft classifications; a second week's vacation to be paid directly by the employers; and an increase of 1 percent in the health and welfare fund to finance major improvements.

The ILGWU also has asked for Columbus Day as a paid holiday; payment for guaranteed holidays irrespective of the day on which the holiday falls; and other improvements.

Convention Moved By Utah AFL-CIO

Salt Lake City—Site of the Utah AFL-CIO convention has been changed from Ogden, where it was originally scheduled, to Steelworkers Hall, Orem, Aug. 3-5.

AFL-CIO Urges Budget Boosts:

Larger Funds Asked For Labor, H-E-W

Congress has been urged by the AFL-CIO to vote increased appropriations needed to carry out new programs and handle expanded workloads in the labor, education, health and welfare fields.

"Too often," AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Kenneth A. Meiklejohn testified at a House hearing, "Congress authorizes programs urgently needed to deal with some pressing public problem—only to have these programs subsequently stultified and hamstrung through the denial of sufficient appropriations."

He asked an Appropriations subcommittee, headed by Rep. John E. Fogarty (D-R.I.), to approve Administration requests for higher budgets for the Labor Dept., the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the National Labor Relations Board and the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service—and in some cases to go above Administration figures.

A proposed $2.79 million increase in the NLRB budget to a total of $25.25 million is fully justified by the agency's increased workload, the AFL-CIO said. Despite improved procedures, "it is once again taking longer for cases to get from the stages of complaint to hearing, from hearing to trial examiner's decision, and from trial examiner's decision to board decision."

A "modest" $413,000 increase requested to allow the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service to add additional mediators is the "very least" that should be approved, the AFL-CIO said.

Commenting on the Labor Dept. budget request, the AFL-CIO emphasized these areas:

Manpower Development and Training—The requested $411 million to carry out the expanded training program approved by Congress has labor's "wholehearted support" and will provide training assistance for 275,000 workers during the next fiscal year.

Area Redevelopment — The requested $9 million for training aspects should be boosted to the full $14.5 million authorized by Congress.

Labor Statistics — A requested $2.1 million increase would bring about improvement in employment and unemployment data and allow further studies on the reasons people enter and leave the labor force. Meiklejohn urged Congress to direct the BLS to undertake additional studies, including a survey of annual earnings of hourly-paid workers, and to appropriate the money needed to do the job.

Women's Bureau — "A substantially more generous appropriation" was urged "in view of an obviously increasing workload" and the need to provide "adequate back-up services" to endeavors to advance the status of women.

Wage-Hour Enforcement—Noting that the equal-pay-for-women law becomes effective this year, Meiklejohn said the proposed increase of 27 investigators "certainly is not enough . . . we propose an increase of at least 100 investigators." In addition, the "serious problem" of employers who pay workers less than the minimum wage or fail to pay them for overtime work "is mounting," he said.

He urged the subcommittee to approve needed funds for apprentice training programs, trade expansion guidance, and full appropriations authorized for administration and improvement of the federal-state employment service.

In testimony dealing with the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare budget, Meiklejohn emphasized that the department's programs "affect the life of nearly every man, woman and child in the nation."

He urged the committee to "make certain" that the programs will function effectively "by approving the full budget requests where they are adequate and by appropriating additional funds where necessary."

"It is no more possible to separate the Dept. of Labor or the Dept. of Health, Education and Welfare from the war on poverty than it would be to separate the Army, the Navy or the Air Force from the defense effort," he declared.

Sanchez of Puerto Rico Wins ILGWU Office

Atlantic City, N. J.—Alberto E. Sanchez, organization director of the Ladies' Garment Workers in Puerto Rico since 1956 and secretary-treasurer of the Puerto Rico AFL-CIO, was elected an ILGWU vice president at a meeting of the union's executive board here.

He is a veteran of trade union activity with a record of accomplishment in New York, New Jersey and Colorado as well as in Puerto Rico, where he directed the growth of the ILGWU from nothing to more than 10,000 members. He is regarded as one of the "founding fathers" of the island commonwealth by virtue of service in the Constitutent Assembly which established it and by membership on the commission which drew up the Bill of Rights.

"Spanish-speaking members of the ILGWU are playing an increasingly important role as their numbers increase," said ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky in announcing Sanchez's election. "Hundreds now serve as shop stewards, on shop committees as members of local executive boards, and as organizers and business agents. In Alberto Sanchez a devoted and tested leader has developed in their ranks."

Alberto E. Sanchez

Sanchez, who is 56, teaches at the University of Puerto Rico Labor Relations Institute and recently was named to the Governor's Commission on Medical Care, charged with investigating every aspect of the problem. His son, Dr. Alberto E. Sanchez, a member of the first class to be graduated from the UPR Medical School, is a plastic surgeon.

AMA Opens King-Anderson Counterattack

umnists George Clifford and Tom Kelly of a sophisticated letter-writing promotion by the AMA. According to Clifford and Kelly, the AMA drive attempts to avoid the impression of an organized campaign by shunning identically worded messages to House and Senate members.

Everybody Signs Up

"The current AMA practice," the two columnists reported, "is to have everyone in a doctor's office—nurses, technicians, receptionists—sign an individually worded letter, written on non-uniform stationery. The letter then seems to represent the spontaneous feelings of a number of people who have no particular connection with each other."

The AMA put its "Operation Hometown" into high gear, Edelman said, just as the House Ways & Means Committee prepared for executive sessions to discuss the King-Anderson bill. The committee now is expected to begin its closed-door consideration of the measure starting early in April.

Edelman further charged widespread falsification in a number of the ads sponsored by AMA affiliates in an attempt to "frighten" workers into the belief that enactment of the medicare program would drastically cut their take-home pay.

Much of the advertising, he said, states that enactment of the King-Anderson bill would entail a 23 percent increase in the payroll tax of $100-a-week workers.

"The fact is," he observed, "that social security taxes of the average worker would rise only 25 cents per week or less than 7 percent. The maximum increase anyone would pay would be 16 percent—and this would also entitle the payee to increased social security pensions."

To use the maximum example, employes now paying the limit in social security contributions are taxed on their first $4,800-a-year of earnings, the total annual tax amounting to $174. Under the King-Anderson bill, the earnings base would be lifted to $5.200 a year and the annual tax would go up by $27.50.

Of this increase, $17.68—or less than 10 percent of the present tax—would go toward old-age hospital insurance, and the rest—$9.82—would finance higher retirement benefits. Since social retirement benefits are based on a proportion of earnings, the maximum monthly benefit for a $100-a-week worker would go from the present $127 to $134, and the maximum benefit for families of such workers would rise from $254 to $268.

Protections Spelled Out

The King-Anderson bill would give persons over 65 three options. They could choose hospitalization protection for up to 45 days in each illness without additional cost, for up to 90 days with a $10-a-day charge for the first nine days, or for up to 180 days with a flat charge of 2.5 times the average cost for a single day.

In addition they would be eligible for up to 180 days of skilled nursing home care after hospitalization, up to 240 home health visits a year, and various outpatient hospital services.

"The National Council of Senior Citizens does not contest the right of the AMA to persuade others to its point of view," said Edelman. "However, when the AMA uses lies in public advertising programs surely the public has a right to ask that the AMA fight its battles with clean hands."

EXAMPLES OF ADVERTISEMENTS being placed in hometown newspapers by local affiliates of the American Medical Association are shown here as the medical lobby pumped millions of dollars into its drive to prevent enactment of the King-Anderson bill to provide hospital insurance for the aged under the social security system. The National Council of Senior Citizens declared that the ad campaign, involving "staggering sums," was triggered by rising expectations for passage of King-Anderson bill this year.

ICFTU Protests Bombing of Guiana Unionists

The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions has registered a strong protest to the British Guiana government of Prime Minister Cheddi Jagan over a bombing which resulted in the deaths of two sugar workers and injuries to six others.

"We are gravely disturbed by the violence on sugar estates directed against the Man Power Citizens' Association, the recognized free trade union in the British Guiana sugar industry," ICFTU Gen. Sec. Omer Becu told Jagan in a telegram.

"We appeal to you on behalf of the international free trade union movement to undertake all necessary measures to restore order and safeguard democratic trade union rights."

The ICFTU official cited reports by Pres. Richard Ishmael of the British Guiana Trades Union Council, who also heads the MPCA, that the bombing was preceded by weeks of coercion, arson, intimidation and threats in a campaign to force MPCA members into a splinter union, the Guiana Agricultural Workers' Union, run by Jagan's Peoples' Progressive Party.

The Trades Union Council, with the MPCA in the vanguard, won an 80-day general strike last year protesting the Jagan government's attempt to impose controls over trade unions through a proposed law which would permit the government to determine union representation rights.

Since the strike, the PPP's splinter union has undertaken a campaign of intimidation, according to Ishmael, who has registered protests with Jagan himself, Duncan Sandys, British secretary of state for colonial affairs, and United Nations Sec. Gen. U Thant.

Poverty Is Non-Partisan

THE ONE-FIFTH of America that lives in poverty has no single political identification or partisanship. The young and the old, the minority groups, the inhabitants of city and rural slums, the disabled and the deficient inhabit all sections of the country. They live in states and congressional districts that are represented in Congress by Democrats and Republicans alike.

It is difficult, therefore, to understand the initial reactions of many Republican members of the House to the President's specific proposals for a war on poverty. There is seemingly developing a highly partisan, party-line approach to a problem that is non-partisan.

The national scope of poverty has been amply documented by the mass media. The nation's leading mass circulation magazines and newspapers, television and radio have produced excellent reports on the why and how of poverty. The 35 million Americans living in poverty have for the past few months been in full focus, with the national spotlight on the grim problem of America's have-nots.

The President's forthrightness and courage in challenging the nation to face up to this problem and help fashion solutions was not dictated by political considerations or partisan advantage. The Republicans in the House ought to treat his program in this light.

ONE OF THE Republican complaints in the special House Education & Labor subcommittee holding hearings on the proposed legislation is that the poverty program would duplicate legislative proposals presently before Congress. The simple fact is that the youth opportunities bill and the domestic peace corps measure adopted by the Senate and dead-ended in the House are to some extent the victims of the conservative coalition in which the Republicans play a major role.

The President's program contains elements of both of these measures. But the charge of duplication misses the point. The problem is to secure passage of legislation that will begin to attack the causes and effects of poverty. The President's program provides an opportunity for quick adoption, in the context of an over-all approach of measures that are now bogged down in the legislative machinery.

THERE ARE VALID criticisms that can be leveled against the President's proposals—essentially that major emphasis must be given to measures that will have a wider and deeper impact on the economic aspects of poverty: extension of the accelerated public works program, expanded coverage of the minimum wage law and an increase in the wage floor to $2 an hour, enactment of old-age social security hospital insurance, broadening of the food-stamp program, stepped-up housing and urban renewal, enactment of federal standards for unemployment compensation.

The President noted many of these in his poverty message and called for enactment of legislation in these areas as part of the war on poverty. But they are not in the proposed anti-poverty bills sent to the Hill and will have to be acted on independently.

The President's program and the separate legislation he called for in his message together can provide the weapons for an all-out, far-ranging assault on poverty, an assault in the national interest that should not be impeded by narrow partisanship.

'Put in All the Parts'

Dr. Esselstyn Says:

Group Medical Practice Offers Benefits to Patient, Physician

The following is excerpted from remarks made to the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its February meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., by Dr. Caldwell B. Esselstyn, chairman of the board of the Group Health Association of America.

GROUP PRACTICE can best be described as the formation of a team of physicians with separate skills but common philosophies, who pool these skills for the benefit of the patient and who organize themselves so as to have a mutual responsibility both to their patients and to each other.

There are many different types of groups—for instance, the group which is limited to diagnostic services, or the group which is limited to a single purpose, such as a group of pediatricians or anesthetists, or obstetricians.

As there are non-profit hospitals and proprietary hospitals, and non-profit nursing homes and proprietary nursing homes, so there are non-profit group practices and proprietary group practices run for profit. I am talking about the non-profit group practice in which doctors are paid on a salary or other fixed income arrangement and not on a piecework basis, and in which administration is in the hands of consumers or functions in the interest of the consumer.

If group practice is to grow, it must be dependent on the fact that people like this kind of practice and that doctors find this a satisfactory way of life. Surveys indicate that once employes have experienced high-quality medical care as provided by a medical group, they appreciate its value. We know this because where workers have a choice betwen indemnity type programs and a group practice plan under dual choice, there is a slow but consistent trend toward the group practice plan. The advantages of the group practice plan to the consumer are:

1 He knows he has a good doctor. His choice of physician is from among doctors whose qualifications have been reviewed by other doctors. In contrast, how do people choose their doctors from among solo practitioners? This is usually by asking a friend, neighbor or corner drug store pharmacist for a reference.

2 The personal physician and various medical specialists are under one roof. If referral of the patient to a specialist is required or deemed advisable, the specialist is down the hall—not blocks away.

3 Group practice plans, when associated with prepayment, allow the member assurance that he can budget the cost of his professional care. When the member becomes sick or needs a physical examinaton, he simply goes to his doctor. There are no claims, no deductibles and no co-insurance. He receives his benefits in professional services.

To the conscientious medically-oriented physician there are also advantages in group practice. I am in total disagreement with our friends in the American Medical Association who say that competition is necessary in order to provide high quality medical care.

Within the framework of a group it is possible to have time off for continuing educational activity. The time has come when high-quality medical care can no longer be provided by the partially-trained physician, and a continuing educational program is necessary.

IN GROUP PRACTICE the business of medicine is turned over to business administrators, and physicians can devote their energies to the one thing they have been trained to do: practice medicine. Close proximity of specialists for consultation is an advantage to the physician as it is to the consumer.

I would also like to make another important distinction concerning methods of remuneration. Although we speak of Blue Cross-Blue Shield and commercial plans as representing health insurance, actually they are more accurately described as sickness insurance. Certainly, no subscriber can obtain any benefits from these plans as long as he is well.

If the only opportunity which physicians have to support their families is to wait until somebody falls apart, it is unrealistic to feel that their driving force in life is going to be an interest in preventive medicine.

However, in the comprehensive group practice plans, payment is made by the subscriber on an annual premium basis. This immediately reverses the interest of the physician; now, for the first time, he is provided with a financial interest and responsibility in maintaining the health of the individual. Under this type of practice the expansion of public health is no longer resisted for fear of encroachment. It is welcomed and encouraged.

Morgan Says:

Ruby Trial Shows Civilization Hasn't Progressed Very Far

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

AS HUMANITY CAREENS through the 20th Century, through the awesome Age of Science which has provided travel faster than the speed of sound, instant communication with remote corners of the world by television satellite, and a fabulous material well-being unmatched, statistically, by any previous golden age of history, mocking circumstances emerge every now and then to remind us that we haven't really carried civilization very far from the primeval slime.

Morgan

We can, and may, push a button guaranteed to wreak instant destruction over so much of the planet that we would have to start the process of evolution all over again—if there were enough survivors from nuclear holocaust to organize the job. And we can betray our perversity, our human cussedness in many other ways that are a little less grandoise in dimension and thus should be somewhat easier to grasp—though the grasp too often fails to be an understanding one.

Last Nov. 24, a Sunday, a strip-tease night club operator named Jack Ruby shot and mortally wounded a young man named Lee Oswald in a corridor of the city jail in Dallas, Tex., while millions, thanks to the marvels of modern communication, watched on their TV sets. Last Saturday afternoon Ruby was found guilty of murder with malice and condemned to death in the electric chair. Again the nation could watch the drama of the verdict unfold on TV.

The question is what this episode, begun just before Thanksgiving and climaxed just before St. Patrick's Day, contributed to civilization and the quality of justice in an open society. The answer must be shockingly little.

With the city of Dallas and the nation at large still reeling from the blow of Pres. Kennedy's assassination, it would have been impossible for Ruby's trial to have been shielded from heavy emotional pressure. Feverish with guilt and shame over the cruel fact that a President had been murdered within their gates, driven to a hypersensitive defensiveness against careless accusations that they somehow were collectively responsible, citizens of Dallas wanted somehow an atonement and they would not have been human if they had not had such feelings.

In such an atmosphere, however, Ruby and his crime seemed to become almost incidental to the larger trial of Dallas itself and the strenuous efforts of the city to win its own acquittal. Injected into this atmosphere was the disconcerting casualness with which Judge Joe B. Brown presided over the case. This reporter was initiated into this informality after having obtained the double credentials necessary to enter the courtroom and submitting to a double frisking by two uniformed officers checking for concealed weapons.

There in his black robe, a cigar clenched between his teeth, was Judge Brown, walking back and forth between the defense and prosecution tables and chatting amiably with opposing counsel about a document he held in his hand. Presently he moved into his chambers, peeked back around the door, gestured to a bailiff who then proclaimed the court in session as the judge scrambled into his seat behind a massive wooden bench. Almost as an afterthought, it seemed, he told the sheriff to bring in the jury.

THE WHOLE courtroom had an aura of almost comic unreality about it beginning with a portrait of an unblindfolded Goddess of Justice on the wall holding a pair of tilted scales. There was the flamboyance of the handsome, sartorially splendid chief defense counsel, Melvin Belli of San Francisco, and his self-damaging unconcealed big-city manner of contempt for the cow-town traditions of justice as he saw them in Dallas. There was the mean, predatory manner by which Assistant Prosecuting Atty. William Alexander attempted to discredit expert testimony about Ruby's mental and emotional condition and his impassioned implied warning to the jury to cleanse the good name of Dallas, so tainted first by the murder of a President and then the murder of his alleged assassin.

Then, finally, came the jury's verdict so swiftly that it raised the question of when it had made up its mind. (One juror, the defense charged later, had told his boss he would vote for the death penalty if he were selected for the jury, and presumably appeals courts will scrutinize this allegation.)

The issue in the aftermath is not the verdict but the sentence which, under Texas law, is set by the jury, not the judge. If the jury, consciously or unconsciously, was impelled to demonstrate that Dallas was indeed a city of law and order, a reversion to the primitive law of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth was a questionable way to go about it.

Capital punishment is basically a demonstration of society's inability to cope with itself and the illustration was rarely if ever more clear than in the case of Jack Ruby. He was a killer but killing him gains nothing but an avoidance of the issue of why he was a misfit and what responsibility society had for him—an avoidance that many communities besides Dallas would be tempted to take.

Washington Reports:

'Employment Consciousness' Held Needed to Meet Job Crisis

A "FULL EMPLOYMENT consciousness" is needed in the United States and accelerated public works, extension of low-cost public housing, slum clearance and other programs fit into this need, Under Sec. of Labor John Henning declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

One of the reasons Western Europe has no unemployment, Henning asserted, is the fact that its economic and fiscal policies "are directed in a very sensitive way to the concept that full employment is essential for a healthy and prosperous society."

Henning said that "adequate manpower training programs" are needed to prepare workers "for the demands of this age of automation." The Manpower Development & Training Act of 1962 was directed toward this end, he declared, "but we have only begun."

"We need more development in this area," he said. "We need more concentration on the advance of our employment services. We need a better listing of unfilled jobs cataloged by industry. We need an advance warning system so that communities may be prepared for sharp technological change.

"Certainly, we must never again have in this country the tragedy of South Bend, where some 9,000 workers were displaced without one moment's advance notice because of a geographical shift in industrial production. . . . We need unity of labor, management and government in providing for a civilized transition between the old order and the new."

IN SPEAKING of the effect of automation, Henning said that "between 1947 and 1962, production increased 20 percent, but the U.S. had 1 million fewer production workers in 1962 than it had in 1947."

He cited figures to show that more than 2 million workers a year are being displaced by technological advances in the '60s, "which means the economy in the 1960s must provide 22 million jobs to care for those displaced."

He pointed out that those most affected by unemployment are the unskilled—largely the Negro and the teen-ager.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

FOR THE EMBATTLED southern senators repeating tired cliches about the sacred "rights" of the "sovereign" 50 states, these words may be recommended:

"The protection and advancement of the individual rights of American citizens should be the primary aim of all authorities. . . . The sad truth is that the states have allowed their own prominence to be lowered, their own effectiveness to be impaired, their own stature to be tarnished by their failure to serve that fundamental purpose. . . .

"The world has grown too small and the times too perilous for the nation to be divisible into 50 different concepts of our central rights of American citizenship."

The words come from a former governor of Florida, LeRoy Collins, and they are part of a remarkably comprehensive pamphlet, The Mazes of Modern Government published by the the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions.

The study is useful because of its unusual degree of balance. Thus it presents Adm. Hyman G. Rickover warning that the federal bureaucracy "often becomes extraordinarily resistent to public criticism and unresponsive to public demand." He points out that "among advanced democracies we alone have no professional career civil service," offering careers at the top to first-rate professionals who are free of "political meddling with technical problems."

Newton N. Minow, former Federal Communications Commission chairman, writes that sometimes elected officials and political appointees "find that they are only nominally in charge of a bureaucracy so firmly entrenched that it is all but impossible to do more than slightly deflect the previously prescribed line of march."

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, a liberal Democrat, warns that Congress itself "is so overworked that the whole process gets choked up and we act like victims of paralysis, attempting somehow to meet just the more immediate problems with too little time and too little staff."

There should be a permanent joint committee on congressional organization to review the legislative institutions, he believes, and a Congressional Institute bringing together leading scholars to serve as a "pool of thought, expertise and knowledge."

THESE ARE COMMENTS on the federal government, executive and legislative, by men well qualified to speak. But let it be observed that they warn, also, against the rampant anti-federalism preached by fearmongers.

"It is a dangerous state of affairs when citizens are indoctrinated to regard their own government as though it were [an] alien power," writes Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman.

The federal government is the only institution that can tax corporate and individual wealth and income uniformly, and "it is ludicrous" to suggest the dismantling of the system because of a theory that the states "should" take on more responsibility, he declares.

Humphrey speaks of the "hopeless tangles of city governments, suburban councils, county governments and state authorities" struggling to deal with increasingly serious problems and joins in Freeman's attack on anti-federalism.

U.S. Appeals Court Judge Thurgood Marshall points out that the federal courts were moved to create the present "impressive structure of protections" of accused citizens in all criminal courts, federal and state, after state courts had upheld "state-imposed and state-fostered laws and regulations" that, for practical purposes, denied protection and limited Negroes in political, social and economic opportunity.

And Collins, writing as a former member of an Eisenhower commission on federal-state relations, remarks:

"Notwithstanding all the return-to-states-rights talk, there were no substantial federal functions the states really wanted back.

"The reason was simple: New functions undertaken were, by and large, serving important needs of national scope. There was widespread unwillingnes or inability by the states to provide such services.

"The states needed all their revenue for other purposes. . . ."

THE U.S. PEOPLE and Congress must regain the "full employment consciousness" that was set forth in the Employment Act of 1946, Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning (left) declared in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People. Harry W. Flannery is the interviewer.

How to Buy:

Junkets for Appliance Dealers Raise Prices for the Consumer

By Sidney Margolius

THE PUBLIC PAYS millions of dollars extra in prices of appliances and household equipment for the dealer junkets and trips sponsored by many large manufacturers.

Junketing has become a standard practice. General Electric, Gibson, other big manufacturers fly merchants or take them on cruises to such exotic places as Rome and other cities in Europe, Hawaii, Rio de Janeiro, Bermuda and Acapulco.

These trips are rewards for dealers who meet certain sales targets. But you the bill when you buy an air conditioner, or other appliance the manufacturer happens to want dealers to push.

The junkets have become so widespread and obviously expensive that even some of the dealers themselves are beginning to protest. One large air-conditioner manufacturer, Fedders, has announced it will let dealers take the cost of such trips in lower appliance prices if they prefer.

In any case, the cost is substantial. One leading manufacturer has hired a ship to take its bigger dealers and their wives on a 10-day cruise at a cost estimated at $2,400 per couple.

Not all merchants want such trips or condone the practice. The president of a leading appliance chain told us that he has instructed his staff to refuse such trips and insist on reduced prices instead. Similarly, the National Retail Merchants Association has declared most of its members oppose such awards and prefer that the expense of the junkets be used to reduce costs.

Manufacturers sometimes award trips for sales employes who successfully push their brands, as well as to dealers. An even more widespread practice involving salespeople is the use of the "spiffs" or "push money" paid by manufacturers. These often are used to induce salespeople to push the sale of certain brands of mattresses as well as household appliances.

Then the potential harm to consumers is doubled. Not only must you pay the cost of the manufacturer-sponsored trips or cash "spiffs" in the price of the merchandise, but you may be subjected to heavy pressure to buy a particular brand.

THIS DOESN'T MEAN you never should believe a salesman's advice about what to buy. Many experienced retail salesmen do offer valuable guidance. But this is to say you need to be on your guard if you find the salesman or dealer noticeably is pressing you to buy a particular model.

In the mattress business especially, "spiffs" or PMs notoriously are used for pushing the highest priced models.

But what can you do about the dealer junkets? Your only defense is comparison shopping. Sometimes, for example, you can find a difference of $10 to $30 in the price of a large appliance. There have been instances in which it has been possible to save $10 just by walking across the street to a competing store.

It is obvious that the practice of giving expensive junkets on advertised brands helps make the private brands of the larger retailers relatively better comparative values, since they do not include this cost. Many of the private brands as well as to dealers. An even more under their own brand names are made by some of the manufacturers most active in providing junkets.

The most ironic and potentially harmful prospect is that if Congress passes the so-called "quality stabilization" bill enabling manufacturers to fix prices, even retailers who prefer to sell for less rather than accept trips or other awards would have to sell at the same prices as the others.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Nothing Like a Supermarket For a Course in People Watching

By Jane Goodsell

PEOPLE-WATCHING at the supermarket is a rewarding hobby. By observing shoppers' behavior in Frozen Foods or Cleaning Supplies, you'll learn a lot about human nature, and you might even pick up an idea or two for dinner. The only problem is to keep your own wits about you, which is no cinch.

C'mon, let's go to the market, and I'll give you a lesson. You'll soon discover that supermarkets tend to fall into types, many of which not only overlap but crash into each other's carts in the aisles.

The Queen Bee: She has an abiding faith in her natural superiority to the rest of the human race and blithely disregards rules made for ordinary people. If coffee on special for 59 cents a pound is limited to one to a customer, she unhesitatingly dumps six cans into her shopping cart.

She parks her cart, bulging to the gunwales, in the express line designated for customers having six purchases or less. When the clerk is ready to ring up her total, she suddenly remembers that she forgot a melon. Trilling gaily that she'll only be a minute, she strolls off to the fruit department where she thoughtfully selects a cantaloupe, while the man next in line behind her at the checkstand awaits her return to pay for his loaf of bread.

The Brute: Destructive types inevitably reveal their true selves in the supermarket. Where else have they such an ideal opportunity to indulge in mayhem? Keep your eyes open in Fresh Produce for shoppers who tear corn husks, squash strawberries, bruise tomatoes, maim peaches and mangle grapes. Watch them in Frozen Foods, too.

The Social Butterfly: To her the supermarket is a cocktail party minus cocktails. Smiling gaily, she waves and shrieks her way around the store, blocking the aisles as she soliloquizes on her sinus condition or the latest PTA crisis.

The Crosspatch: The strategic place to test a shopper's disposition is in Fresh Produce, specifically vegetables. A vengeful, spiteful shopper is irresistibly drawn to nasty root vegetables like parsnips, turnips and rutabagas. By serving these horrid tubers to her family, she is wreaking vengeance upon them and the world.

The Born Follower: She'll buy anything stacked in a pyramid in the aisles or placed near the checkout stand. If she sees another shopper stocking up on canned soup, she follows suit.

The Cynic: She's fully alerted to all the tricks the supermarket is up to, and she's not having any wool pulled over her eyes, no sirree! She knows for a fact that they hide all the low-profit bargains out of reach on the top shelves or out of sight on the floor. She'd no more buy an eye-level item than she'd purchase a box of strawberries without inspecting the bottom layer for mildew. To protect herself from succumbing to the eye-level temptations, she moves through the store alternating between a low Neanderthal crouch and a neck-craning tippytoe stretch.

Pamphlet on Gambling Says:

Don't Be a Sucker—You Never Can Win

FIFTY BILLION DOLLARS, it has been estimated, is gambled each year in the United States—double the money spent each year on medical care by the entire nation. The big question is: Can you beat the odds?

The answer is "no," according to Gordon H. Cole and Sidney Margolius, writing in When You Gamble—You Risk More Than Your Money, a new Public Affairs Pamphlet. Cole is editor of the Machinist; Margolius is an expert on consumer problems.

"Gambling in the United States actually has doubled in recent years," the authors state. "All the evidence indicates that the crime syndicates and hoodlum organizations are turning to control of gambling and loan-sharking as safer sources of incomes than selling dope or women."

But if you can't beat the odds, and if gambling so often leads to personal tragedies, why do people gamble? The authors believe that what starts as a seemingly innocent pastime can "lead to debts and then to compulsive gambling, and become as truly difficult for the addicts to shake off as alcohol or dope habits."

Medical experts and gamblers themselves understand that compulsive gambling is not wicked or immoral but a symptom of sickness and self-destructiveness. Included in the pamphlet is a questionnaire devised by Gamblers Anonymous to help compulsive gamblers see the signs of their addiction.

WHEN YOU GAMBLE gives brief descriptions of various kinds of gambling, including the odds and the pitfalls—racing, betting on sports events, the numbers game, bingo, slot machines, sweepstakes and lotteries, dice and card games.

"Depending on the type of gambling, and how it is operated," Cole and Margolius stress, "the margin the professional operator has against you ranges from 15 to 60 percent."

The pamphlet includes a summary of the arguments for and against legalized gambling. A typical argument offered in favor of legalized gambling is that "there would be no profit for the gangsters, no need for 'protection,' and the proceeds could be used to finance public schools, government functions, and charities."

The opposing point of view is that such proceeds are an undependable source of income for vital public services and that legalized gambling unduly tempts low-income people to risk their limited funds in the hope of escaping the toils of poverty.

When You Gamble—You Risk More Than Your Money is available from Public Affairs Committee, 381 Park Avenue South, New York, N. Y.

In Federal Buildings:

Wage, Benefit Floor Asked for Cleaners

Legislation establishing wage and benefit standards for government service contracts—including contracts for cleaning federal buildings—is "important, urgent and long overdue," the AFL-CIO declared.

Legislative Dir. Kenneth A. Meiklejohn urged a House Labor subcommittee to approve a bill which would outlaw "poverty wages" being paid by building service contractors who slash wages to underbid competitors.

The Davis-Bacon Act protects local labor standards on federal construction contracts and the Walsh-Healey Act sets minimum standards for manufacturing contracts, Meiklejohn pointed out. But there is no law, he emphasized, which requires service contractors to pay fair wages and observe decent conditions.

He urged the subcommittee to combine portions of two bills introduced by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) to establish a requirement that service contractors doing at least $2,000 in government business pay prevailing wage rates determined by the Secretary of Labor and match fringe benefits paid to federal employes.

The O'Hara bills would cover such service workers as janitors, custodial workers, cleaners, maintenance workers, laundry and dry cleaning workers and pest exterminators, Meiklejohn noted. In addition, he said, employes of concessionaires on federal property should be covered.

Without corrective legislation, the AFL-CIO spokesman declared, federal funds can be "and are being spent all too frequently" to pay "poverty wages."

Earlier in the hearings, before a subcommittee headed by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N. J.), Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes had testified that most fair employers have stopped bidding on federal service contracts because "they cannot compete with the non-union contractor who pays a much lower wage and generally does not pay any fringe benefits."

He cited several examples, including a pay rate of $1.35 an hour for janitors at the Internal Revenue building in San Francisco, where the prevailing union rate is $2.38. In Chicago, watchmen at O'Hare Field have been paid $1.15 to $1.25 an hour, while the union rate is $1.82 plus extensive fringe benefits, he said.

In Washington, Sullivan reported, union members have been fired as a result of change of contractors for cleaning buildings and wages as low as $1 an hour have been imposed.

Meiklejohn told the committee that legislation should include both a requirement for overtime pay for employes of government contractors and a guarantee that the wage rate shall at least equal the federal minimum wage.

Stand by U. S. Labor Heartens Africans

Africans in South Africa have been "greatly encouraged" by the AFL-CIO resolution urging the United States to take the initiative in imposing an embargo on that country, according to Nana Nelson Mahomo, foreign representative of the Pan-Africanist Congress.

"And it has called on all people interested in freedom in South Africa to give urgently needed financial and material assistance to the resistance movement," he added.

Mahomo was born in a small town in the Transvaal in 1930 and as an outstanding student, was one of the few Africans allowed to attend Capetown University, which is now restricted to whites. Because he became involved in nationalist political activities and the African trade union movement, he was not allowed to take his bar examinations. In a Pan-Africanist Congress assembly he organized the Task Force, the backbone of the movement. He fled after the Sharpeville Massacre on Mar. 21, 1960.

Any embargo movement will be fruitless, he said on the AFL-CIO public service radio program As We See It, aired on the American Broadcasting Co. network, unless the U.S. and Great Britain support an oil embargo.

The South African government, Mahomo said, is imposing increasing restrictions on Africans, who outnumber whites by five to one. Africans are barred from some jobs and, in others, can work only in restricted areas, he said, despite wide unemployment.

"Various surveys conducted by impartial commissions," he continued, "have come out with the statements that the average wage is far below the 'bread level.' The figure given was 23 pounds, a basic wage which would keep a family of three. But the average wage of Africans in South Africa is only 19 pounds.

He said that anyone who "faintly shows" signs of opposing government policies "is immediately under observation." If the government thinks a suspect has information it requires, he said, it can detain him for indefinite periods of 90 days.

Job Restoration Upheld by Court

St. Louis—The 8th U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals has upheld a 1963 National Labor Relations Board ruling that a volunteer organizer for the Brick & Clay Workers was fired for union activities and must be restored to his job with lost earnings.

The union supporter is Earl F. Docekal, who was fired Mar. 5, 1962, after getting 150 fellow-workers to join the union at the A. P. Green Fire Brick Co., Mexico, Mo.

The firm said Docekal, a lift operator, was discharged for turning in "doctored" time slips but the court upheld a trial examiner and the NLRB which found that the true reason for the firing was the company's "desire to rid itself of an active union adherent."

The union lost two elections at the plant by close margins but after Docekal was fired, won a third vote, 349-295, and now has bargaining rights, said Pres. William L. Griffith of the Brick & Clay Workers.

The Green firm said it has no alternative now but to comply with the court order.

TRADE UNION officials representing the AFL-CIO and its affiliates were guests of the Navy recently to observe the nuclear submarine Woodrow Wilson successfully fire its first Polaris missile. In the top photo, the A-2 Polaris, fired by the submerged submarine, streaks toward its target area 1,500 miles distant. Viewing the shot from the deck of the USS Observation Island are, from the left, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, Pres. Richard F. Walsh of the Theatrical Stage Employes and Pres. Edward J. Pipe Firms Accused of Bid-Rigging

Los Angeles—A federal grand jury here has indicted six companies, including U.S. Steel Corp., on charges of rigging bids and dividing up the market on sales of steel and concrete water pipe in 10 western states.

In five indictments, the grand jury charged that company executives had met periodically between 1954 and 1962 to decide which firm would submit the low bid. Federal and municipal agencies were among the victims of the alleged conspiracy, the jury charged.

U.S. Steel is involved in four other pending criminal price-fixing cases, resulting from indictments during the past two years.

Also named in the Los Angeles indictments were Kaiser Steel Corp., United States Industries, Inc., American Pipe & Construction Co., Smith-Scott, Inc., and the United Concrete Pipe Co., along with eight officers or former officers of the companies.

CLOSE COOPERATION under the AFL-CIO-Red Cross disaster understanding kept suffering at a minimum when the worst floods in 18 years swept the Ohio River Valley. At Red Cross headquarters in Louisville, Ky., are four union volunteers—Russell Carty of Steelworkers Local 1693, Sec. Norma Minyard and Pres. Robert Schneiders of Communications Workers Local 3310, and Lola Brafford of CWA Local 3350.

UNION RESCUE party helped Mr. and Mrs. Edgar Shepard to safety when Ohio River floods hit Louisville, Ky., and the AFL-CIO-Red Cross disaster understanding went into action. Here Pres. Gene Land of the Greater Louisville AFL-CIO assists Mrs. Shepard while Shepard, a retired union member, looks on, and Charles Clark, co-chairman of the central body's Community Services Committee and a Red Cross chapter board member, prepares to shove off.

Joint Action with Red Cross:

Union Members Aid Victims of Floods

Union members went into action quickly under the terms of the AFL-CIO-Red Cross disaster understanding when the worst floods since 1945 devastated parts of the East.

Teams of trade unionists delivered emergency food supplies, volunteered as aides in Red Cross shelters, staffed switchboards and helped rescue men, women and children trapped in their homes when high water laid waste sections of the Ohio River Valley.

More than 99 counties in the valley were affected by the flood waters and more than 100,000 persons received Red Cross aid in one form or another.

About 220 Red Cross disaster workers were pressed into service to provide emergency help and will stay on the job for several weeks to help families obtain rehabilitation grants as they return to their damaged homes. Local disaster advisory committees, which determine the level of assistance, include AFL-CIO members.

The close cooperation between labor and the Red Cross in Louisville, Ky., was typical of the joint action taken from one end of the Ohio Valley to the other.

Even before the flood hit the city, the Central Labor Council's Disaster Committee went into action and speedily lined up 10 union halls for use as Red Cross disaster shelters.

Members of the Communications Workers under the direction of Sec. Norma Minyard of Local 3310, co-chairman of the Disaster Committee, provided 24-hour service on Red Cross switchboards.

In Harrisburg, Dir. Charles Ferguson of Pennsylvania State AFL-CIO Community Services Activities quickly mobilized union support when the Susquehanna River went over its banks in the worst flood in 18 years.

All local full-time CSA staff representatives, who are trained as Red Cross disaster volunteers, went into action under a standing plan. Local central body presidents in flood-threatened areas were directed to get in touch with local Red Cross chapters for implementation of the disaster understanding, and members of the State AFL-CIO Community Services Committee worked as volunteers in areas not covered by staff representatives.

Court Upsets Guiana Ouster Of Guildsman

Georgetown, British Guiana—A U. S. trade unionist has won an appeal against an expulsion order by the government of leftist-Prime Minister Cheddi Jagan labeling him a "prohibited immigrant."

Magistrate Frank Vieira ruled in favor of Newspaper Guildsman Gene Meakins of Denver, Colo., on appeal from the police order seeking to oust him from the country. The magistrate's ruling came on a technicality and upheld the argument of Meakins' attorneys that the expulsion order was invalid since it was issued by an immigration officer who was illegally appointed under the terms of the law.

There was still a possibility that police and immigration authorities would turn to other courses of action in an effort to force Meakins from the country.

Meakins himself said he considered the ruling "fair and reasonable" and that he wanted to remain in British Guiana and "do the job the Trades Union Council brought me here to do."

He, his wife and their two children came here last Sept. 23 on a three-month visa on assignment from the AFL-CIO and the Inter-American Federation of Working Newspapermen's Organizations in response to a request for public relations assistance by the Guiana labor movement.

A former officer and negotiator for the Guild's national Wire Service Local, Meakins is on leave of absence from the Denver bureau of United Press Intl. while helping the TUC with a daily radio program of union news and education, advising the country's largest union—the Man-Power Citizens Association—in the publication of the only free trade union paper here, and assisting the Printers' Industrial Union in preparations for contract negotiations.

The Jagan government's attempt to oust him was characterized by TUC Pres. Richard Ishmael, who also heads the MPCA, as "a deliberate attack on the free trade union movement."

Keenan to Attend Convention of CLC

Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has been named by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as a fraternal delegate to the biennial convention of the Canadian Labor Congress, to be held Apr. 20-24 in the Queen Elizabeth Hotel, Montreal.

Liberals Force Issues In Senate Rights Battle

to create an anti-civil rights "whip-lash" in the North.

The committee's chairman is arch-conservative William Loeb, publisher of a New Hampshire newspaper. Its secretary is John C. Satterfield of Yazoo City, Miss., former president of the American Bar Association and a prominent segregationist spokesman.

Humphrey told the Senate that reports filed under the federal lobbying act showed that during the last six months of 1963, the committee had received $131,000 in contributions, of which $120,000 had come from a tax-supported agency of the State of Mississippi.

When Mississippi Sen. John Stennis (D) told Humphrey that the American people were getting the truth "for the first time" and claimed that the civil rights forces "haven't got the votes" to pass the bill, Humphrey retorted:

"There is only one way to find out. Let the Senate vote on it . . . I am willing to go to a test on this bill, title by title."

Occasionally the debate wandered to the technical issue before the Senate, whether the bill should be brought directly to the floor without going through the Judiciary Committee.

'Lynching' Refuted

Sen. Russell Long (D - La.) charged this procedure would amount to "legislative lynching" of the South, and Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) read the record to rebut him.

House and Senate committees which have considered various phases of the bill have held 70 days of hearings, he said. They have heard 275 witnesses, received 152 additional statements, and compiled 5,792 pages of printed record.

"It seems to me that this bill has almost been talked to death in committee," Clark said.

Meanwhile the bipartisan steering committee continued to perfect its machinery for producing a quorum of 51 senators on short notice, issuing a daily newsletter with ammunition for the debate, encouragement for senators when quorum calls were answered promptly and chidings when—as during one dinner hour—it took more than an hour to round up absent members.

Southern attacks on the "anonymous" and "mysterious" operations of the civil rights command post, headed by Humphrey and GOP Whip Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.), drew counterfire from the liberal coalition.

'Finally Organized'

"The thing that burns," Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N.J.) retorted, "is the fact that for the first time in a long history of efforts to place this kind of effective legislation on the federal statute books in the field of civil rights, we are finally organized in a way which is in some sense comparable to the way in which the opposition has always operated."

State Veto on Water Assailed by Labor

Federal water resources programs in the 17 western states should remain free of a states' rights "veto," the AFL-CIO declared in a statement to a Senate Interior subcommittee.

The subcommittee is considering a bill which would expand the authority of the states and curtail that of the federal government in dealing with water rights related to federal lands, including national parks and forests, grazing districts and wildlife refuges.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said the effect of the bill "would be to allow the federal government to continue to spend large amounts of money to carry out new, complex and costly reclamation projects—but, at the same time, to subject the federal government to the veto of state laws."

Biemiller included in his testimony a letter from the California State AFL-CIO opposing the bill "as potentially very dangerous to the future development of water resources in the West on a federally coordinated basis."

Also filing a statement in opposition to the bill was Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Clayman noted that a similar measure had been proposed by the Eisenhower Administration in 1958 and said the IUD "is happy to learn that the executive agencies of the Johnson Administration are opposed" to the present bill.

He charged it would lead to "the invasion" of national forests, preserves and recreational areas by allowing private acquisition of water rights under state laws. Thus, he added, "the U.S. would be left with the land but not the water."

Local's Scholarship Program Expanded

Buena Park, Calif.—Retail Clerks Local 324 will enlarge its college scholarship program to 21 awards with a total value of $7,500 for the next academic year, Sec.-Treas. Arthur Z. Berland has announced.

For each of the past two years the union has awarded 14 scholarships totaling $5,000. The program is being expanded, Berland said, "because the members believe this is one of the most important investments we can make in the future of our community and our country."

FDA Consolidates Consumer Programs

Consolidation of the Food & Drug Administration's consumer education activities into a new Div. of Consumer Education has been announced by Commissioner George P. Larrick.

The division, to which essential new programs will be added, will be headed by James L. Trawick, deputy director of the FDA's Div. of Public Information for the past six years and a veteran of 24 years' service with the FDA.

Mary E. Cunningham, former special assistant to the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare for consumer protection, will head a consumer information branch within the division, and Mrs. Carla Williams, formerly director of the consumer program in the Office of the Commissioner of Food & Drugs, will direct a consumer consultant branch.

Second Try at Pay Increases Urged on House by Johnson

Pres. Johnson has asked the House to "reconsider and approve" pay raise legislation for nearly 2 million federal employes, even if they don't want to vote themselves a pay raise at this time.

The President, in a letter to Speaker John W. McCormack (D-Mass.), said denial of salary increases would break faith with rank-and-file federal employes and make it harder for the government to "attract and hold competent people" in top executive jobs.

Johnson's message came less than a week after the House had dealt a surprise 222-184 defeat to a bill providing pay raises averaging about 6 percent for most postal workers and 4.3 percent for other federal employes. The bill foundered in a sharp controversy over a provision for $10,000-a-year raises for members of Congress, which many members considered politically risky in an election year.

The AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, which had already launched a renewed pay drive, hailed Johnson's appeal. Postal union officers told the AFL-CIO News they received "dozens of calls" from congressmen explaining they had voted against the bill because of the congressional pay raise but pledging to support increases for federal employes.

Johnson told the House it is "false economy to offer salaries that will attract the mediocre but repel the talented." He added:

"If congressmen feel they should postpone increasing their salaries until next year, even though they are most deserving of an increase in pay, there is no reason to postpone equitable and just action for others who serve the government and the nation."

The President noted pointedly that Congress "just a year and a half ago" enacted salary reform legislation to gear federal pay scales to comparable jobs in private industry on the basis of annual wage surveys. Failure to pass a pay bill this year, Johnson said, would "undercut the principle and the promise of comparable pay."

Rep. James H. Morrison (D-La.), sponsor of the defeated bill, reintroduced it omitting the raise for members of Congress. He said, however, that he would not be surprised if the bill were amended to provide congressional raises which would not go into effect until the next Congress, in 1965.

Dirksen Backs Raise for Congress

Although House Republicans led the drive against the omnibus pay bill, Senate GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) said he would move to add congressional raises to the bill in the Senate if the House failed to include them.

Congressional pay raises even higher than the $10,000 figure rejected by the House were urged last year by a presidential commission which included AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and business and industry leaders.

Trade Act Enforcement Assailed by McDonald

Steelworkers Pres. David J. McDonald has accused the U.S. Tariff Commission of a "miserable performance" in interpreting the adjustment provisions of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 so rigidly that U.S. workers are denied allowances provided under the law.

The commission has so interpreted the act "as to thwart its clear intent," McDonald charged in a statement issued after he and Roger Blough, chairman of U.S. Steel Corp., met with Pres. Johnson to discuss trade problems.

McDonald noted that most U.S. workers gain from free international trade, but to protect those who lose their jobs under the impact of increased imports, Congress "wisely and generously" provided readjustment allowances in the Trade Expansion Act.

"Obviously something is wrong," he declared, when in the year and one-half since the act became law the Tariff Commission has not found a single worker entitled to these readjustment allowances even though $20 billion of imports have entered the country in that period.

The USWA leader also protested "cumbersome" procedures in the Treasury Dept. and "confusion and contradiction" in the Tariff Commission in enforcement of the Anti-Dumping Act, designed to protect American industry from injury through the sale of imports at lower prices than in the countries of production.

Ultimately, he said, the dumping problem must be solved internationally, either through the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade or the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development.

Meanwhile, "what we need is realistic and efficient implementation of the law against dumping now on the statute books," McDonald declared.

Wage-Hour Extension, Overtime Hike Pushed

AFL-CIO unions continued to press for higher overtime rates and extension of wage-hour coverage to additional groups of workers in testimony before two House Labor subcommittees.

A panel on extension of coverage, headed by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), received testimony from the Woodworkers and the Clothing Workers. Spokesmen for the Communications Workers and Retail Clerks appeared at overtime pay hearings conducted by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.).

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne cited conditions in the telephone industry to illustrate his contention that "present overtime premiums do not discourage overtime work."

He told the subcommittee that the number of telephones in the Bell System has increased 39 percent since 1956, but the number of employes has dropped nearly 12 percent while net operating revenue has more than doubled.

During the same period, Beirne said, overtime in the plant department has doubled. The amount worked, he said, is the equivalent of 32,000 jobs.

Answering arguments raised by some business witnesses that much overtime is caused by a shortage of skilled workers, Beirne commented:

"The telephone industry has traditionally trained its own workers. The only formal requirement for employment is a high school education. There are many unemployed men who would meet this industry's requirements. I think this may be true of many other industries as well."

Beirne asked for a uniform across-the-board policy of doubletime for overtime work under the Fair Labor Standards Act. He opposed the tripartite industry boards proposed by the Administration. If the legislation should provide for wage boards, he said, they should function as appeals boards. with the burden of proof for allowing less than doubletime rates resting on industry management.

In other testimony:

- IWA Pres. A. F. Hartung said exclusion from the Fair Labor Standards Act of woods workers in crews of 12 or fewer employes has resulted in "horrible" and "unbelievable" exploitation.

He charged that employers in the industry deliberately subcontract work to marginal operators to take advantage of lower wage rates and lack of fringe benefits.

- Charles B. Lipsen, legislative director of the Retail Clerks, urged doubletime rates for overtime work in all industries and expressed "dismay" that the Administration's overtime bill excludes retail employes and other groups brought under the wage-hour law in 1961.

He said the concept of separate conditions in different industries, based on recommendations of tripartite boards, is a "piecemeal" approach "bound to lead to inequities."

- Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, in a statement, strongly urged further extension of wage-hour coverage to laundry and cleaning workers, noting that only 2.9 percent of the industry is presently protected.

While union members in these industries have advanced their conditions, Potofsky said, "the vast majority of the workers" are not protected by either union contracts or federal or state legislation.

'Fantastically Irresponsible' Job Plan Charged to Big California Growers

Sacramento, Calif.—A turning point in the farm labor problem loomed in California as organized labor charged big growers with promoting a "fantastically irresponsible" plan to lure 40,000 families from the nation's depressed areas to replace departing Mexican nationals.

Thomas L. Pitts, secretary-treasurer of the California AFL-CIO, leveled the charge at a federal-state conference called to develop a domestic farm labor force.

Pitts said the recent announcement by the Council of California Growers that it would not seek extension of Public Law 78, due to expire in December, was an "opening gimmick" in a campaign "aimed minimally at the bracero program's permanent renewal." Some 187,000 Mexicans were imported for growers last year.

It is the "clear duty of public employment agencies to utilize the union hiring hall as a central dispatching point on a referral basis," he said, in the same way the government has channeled Mexican nationals through employer associations. He also urged government encouragement of farm worker unionization and collective bargaining."

Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning, who was co-chairman of the conference with Gov. Edmund G. Brown, noted the growers' announcement that they would not seek extension of the Mexican import program before its expiration Dec. 31. He said the growers would have the "proper cooperation" of the federal-state employment service in recruiting American farm workers.

"It was agreed," Henning explained, "that before any interstate methods were pursued, local and in-state sources would first be thoroughly explored."

In calling for a program to develop a stable farm labor force, Henning alluded to published reports that growers wanted the government to help them recruit the nation's unemployed.

"At the heart of any such action program would be an agreed commitment to the principle that effective intrastate recruiting is both feasible and practical," he said.

A first step to prove this, Henning said, was agreement in February under which the California State Employment Service will recruit 350 domestic workers for a major grower, Carl Joseph Maggio, Inc.

Henning noted that the Maggio agreement assures the domestic worker the same working conditions and transportation benefits provided Mexicans under the binational pact and, most important, guarantees them a minimum of 150 hours of work each month for an entire year.

The California Dept. of Employment will be "the ultimate coordinating agency" for all the public and private efforts in matching the state's unemployed farm labor openings, Henning said.

Pitts said the impending expiration of the bracero program gives the state a "golden opportunity" to solve its biggest and "most notorious socio-economic dilemma." But, he added, agribusiness—the 4.9 percent of growers who hire 61 percent of the farm labor force—is trying to "stampede" federal and state agencies into a costly recruiting program.

Reports Cited

Since the growers' announcement on P.L. 78, Pitts declared, the public has been deluged with stories to the effect that 1,000 workers were enroute from Texas to a Los Angeles farm labor association; that growers were creating machinery to lure Puerto Rican, Pennsylvanian and West Virginian jobless families to California; that they wanted government help in the recruiting and, finally, that they were interested in using convict labor.

These stories, said Pitts, seem designed "to make us yearn for the good old bracero days even before they have taken their absence."

He said the government must not only flatly refuse to recruit the nation's unemployed in this "potential 'Grapes of Wrath' situation" but should enforce existing safeguards and help bring about collective bargaining for farm workers.

22 Weeks Of Picketing Wins Strike

Woburn, Mass.—After a 22-week strike and an intensive "don't buy" campaign, 120 members of the Furniture Workers have gone back to work at the Slumberland Products Co. with the first union contract ever signed by the firm, a leading New England bedding maker.

The two-year agreement, announced by UFWA Pres. Morris Pizer, provides across-the-board and job classification pay increases, strong union security provisions, and improved working conditions. Other gains include additional paid holidays and vacation days, improved group insurance, jury duty pay and a dues deduction clause.

Both parties agreed to drop all pending charges in the courts and the National Labor Relations Board. The firm had hired strikebreakers, a 24-hour special police guard and a law firm specializing in anti-labor relations. The strikers held firm against threats that the plant would close, and against picket-line arrests.

Pizer expressed thanks for "outstanding support" of the union by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and the Massachusetts AFL-CIO.

of workers now excluded and an increase in the minimum wage to $2 an hour.

- Prompt enactment of old-age social security hospital insurance.
- Broadening of the food-stamp program.
- Establishment of federal standards for the unemployment compensation system, "which no longer approaches its stated purpose of tiding over the jobless."
- "Stepped-up housing and urban renewal programs, plus aid to mass transit . . . to stem the deterioration of metropolitan centers.
- Interim measures to supplement the proposed study of automation and assist its victims.

'. . . Does Not Stand Alone'

In his message, Johnson suggested that the proposed Economic Opportunity Act "is the foundation of our war on poverty, but it does not stand alone."

Citing many of the pending programs mentioned by Meany, the President asked Congress for "immediate action" on all of them.

"What you are being asked to consider," he said "is not a simple or an easy program. But poverty is not a simple or an easy enemy. It cannot be driven from the land by a single attack on a single front. Were this so we would have conquered poverty long ago."

Because he does not intend the drive against poverty to become a "series of uncoordinated and unrelated efforts," Johnson said, his bill proposes the creation of a new Office of Economic Opportunity under the President.

He announced his intention to appoint Sargent Shriver, now director of the Peace Corps, to the $22,500-a-year post as his personal "chief of staff" in the war on poverty, to assume direct responsibility for proposed new programs and to work with and through existing government agencies.

Key Elements Listed

Key elements in the draft legislation would be a Job Corps offering training and work experience on conservation and other projects for 100,000 male youths between the ages of 16 and 21; work training programs for 200,000 other young men and women living at home, and federal aid to create part-time jobs for 140,000 youths who would not otherwise be able to go to college.

The measure also would provide federal help to communities developing their own programs to attack the sources of poverty, direct grants to help low-income rural families advance themselves, guaranteed loans to enable small business to expand their employment, and 3,000 to 5,000 Volunteers for America—a version of the proposed domestic Peace Corps—to work directly under Shriver on special anti-poverty assignments at federal, state and local levels.

Shriver was the Administration's lead-off witness as a special panel of the House Labor Committee opened hearings on the draft bill. The Administration measure was introduced in the House by Rep. Phil M. Landrum (D-Ga.) and in the Senate by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), who said it offers the nation an "enormous" return for a modest investment.

Shriver told the House group, headed by Labor Committee Chairman Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.), that the nation has both "the know-how and the resources to eliminate grinding poverty."

"Every dollar will be used to help the poor; there will be no leakage," he said, declaring he is not interested in creating a "big new bureaucracy."

First-Year Cost $962.5 Million

The President set the total first-year cost of the program at $962.5 million—about 1 percent of the total budget—and said "every dollar" already is included in that budget.

A major portion, $190 million, would finance the proposed Job Corps with the aim of enrolling 40,000 young people the first year and up to 100,000 later. About half the youths would be assigned to camps on facilities leased from other government departments for work on conservation projects, but with emphasis on basic education. The other half would be assigned to residential centers providing both basic education and job training.

Johnson said the Job Corps, a refinement of the Youth Corps proposed earlier, is "comparable in innovation to the land grant colleges." A government spokesman said it would be headed by a "distinguished educator."

$150 Million for Work Training

About $150 million would be allotted to work-training projects administered by the Dept. of Labor to put some 200,000 young men and women to work in their home areas on projects developed by state and local governments and non-profit agencies. This would include work in hospitals, libraries, playgrounds, settlement houses, etc. The federal government would provide up to 90 percent of the funds for the first two years and up to 75 percent thereafter.

This would also be the federal share, totalling $72.5 million in the first year, of the program to underwrite parttime jobs for youths from low-income families attempting to work their way through college.

The biggest item in the anti-poverty program, $315 million in the first year, seeks to spur cities and towns into developing their own anti-poverty programs, with special emphasis on educational services, job and family counseling and health projects. The federal government would pay 90 percent of the costs for the first two years and up to 75 percent thereafter.

Other details of the program include:

- $50 million to provide direct loans of up to $1,500 to low-income rural families where such aid is likely to help them permanently lift their income levels, and to aid non-profit corporations acquire land for development into family farms.
- $25 million for a program of guaranteed loans to businesses expanding their job rosters, the loans to equal $10,000 for each new job created.
- Liberalization of the Small Business Administration's loan program, with no additional funding authority needed.
- $150 million to cover experimental projects by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare designed to encourage state programs of job training for unemployed fathers or other members of families receiving aid to dependent children.
- $10 million for administration of the Office of Economic Opportunity and financing of the Volunteers for America.

EMPTY SEATS IN THE STATE SENATE face members of the Ladies' Garment Workers and other unions in the Pennsylvania state capitol galleries protesting the Scranton Administration's jobless compensation bill. Republican senators were in caucus during this period in an all-night session in which all 26 GOP members voted for the proposal.

tion of benefits, raise the tax base but reduce the minimum corporation tax rate. By Scranton's own estimate of the effect of his proposal, benefits paid out would drop by a net of $35 million a year.

The State AFL-CIO also sponsored full-page advertisements in the two Harrisburg newspapers to publicize a Philadelphia Inquirer story of Mar. 17 which detailed a secret meeting between four members of Scranton's cabinet and representatives of Westinghouse Corp., U.S. Steel and Bethlehem Steel.

Business 'Pressure'

The report quoted Administration officials as instructing the industrial representatives that it was their duty to "put into line" those Republican state representatives who were still opposed to the bill.

The State AFL-CIO noted in its ad that the last revision in the state unemployment compensation law had resulted in $25 million in tax credits for the three named corporations and a total of $80 million to various state employers.

The House battle climaxes an intensive five-week struggle which began Feb. 11 when Scranton called the legislature into special session to make a personal appeal for the bill, which had languished in committee since last July.

Workers in Gallery

Republicans slated the House showdown to capitalize on momentum they believed was achieved by Senate passage on Mar. 14 after an all-night session. The Senate vote was 27-20. A constitutional majority of 26 votes was needed for passage, which came from 26 Republicans and one Democrat.

During the bill's final hours before Senate passage, hundreds of AFL-CIO Garment Workers and Steelworkers were on hand in the gallery, where they entertained one another and Senate opponents of the bill with song parodies during periods of recess while Republicans met in caucus.

The mass gathering of union members focused attention on the House after weeks of community efforts throughout the state, where central labor bodies and local unions had held rallies, distributed handbills at unemployment offices, supermarkets and factory gates, gathered petitions and appeared on radio and TV. Local union delegations also visited their legislators.

The rally in Harrisburg followed by 10 days a meeting of 2,500 union representatives in the capital, where plans were laid for the mass gathering should the bill survive the Senate.

At the time the AFL-CIO News went to press there was uncertainty as to the ability of the Republicans to muster the necessary 106 votes from their 108-member House delegation. All 98 Democrats were expected to oppose the bill and 12 Republicans from economically hard-hit areas—where joblessness had held at high levels for several years—have said they would not vote for the bill in the form it passed the Senate.

Veteran newsmen, however, reported that never before had pressures on Republican legislators been so intense.

Senate Unit Approves 'Truth-in-Lending' Bill

A Senate Banking subcommittee has voted 5-4 approval of a "truth-in-lending" bill it had bottled up for more than four years.

The bill, sponsored by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), would require disclosure of all interest and finance charges in clear, simple terms. It has Administration support and strong backing from labor and consumer groups.

Douglas, who presided over subcommittee hearings which have filled 3,954 pages of testimony since 1960, urged Banking Committee Chairman A. Willis Robertson (D-Va.) to schedule an executive session of the full committee to act on the measure. Robertson cast the only Democratic vote against the bill in the subcommittee showdown.

Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) provided the swing vote to dislodge the bill after the subcommittee agreed to an amendment which would permit revolving credit charges, used by many department stores, to be stated in terms of a monthly interest rate. The original bill would have required all charges to be expressed in terms of true annual interest rates.

The bill also required lenders and sellers to disclose in writing the total amount of cost to be financed, including a specific list of "extra" charges in connection with the financing.

Hearings in Washington and in cities throughout the nation uncovered widespread misrepresentation of interest rates and "carrying" charges.

Douglas summed up the intent of the legislation in these words:

"The purpose of this bill is to require that the American consumer be given the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth about the interest rates and finance charges he is asked to pay when he borrows money or buys an article on the installment plan."

The bill has 18 co-sponsors in the Senate, including Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.).

Meany Hails Fight On Scranton Bill

Harrisburg — Pennsylvania union members, rallying here to fight a legislative threat to the state's unemployment insurance program, won praise from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany for not having "succumbed to the lure of higher maximums for a very few unemployed at the price of either reduced benefits or no benefits at all for many thousands of jobless."

In a telegram read to the rally, Meany told State AFL-CIO Pres. Harry Boyer that the "harmful" Scranton bill "is clear proof" of the need for federal unemployment compensation standards to eliminate "callous merchandising in human suffering."

Labor Political Action Key To More Liberal Congress

Significant Gains Seen By Reuther

By John M. Barry

Atlantic City, N. J.—The Auto Workers' 19th constitutional convention here drafted the broad outlines of the union's 1964 contract proposals to the auto industry, giving heavy emphasis to improved working conditions, higher wages and such job-creating measures as early retirement.

UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, in his keynote address, had told the 2,400 delegates that formation of the collective bargaining program was "the major work of this convention."

"It is a year of great opportunity," he declared. "We go to the bargaining table under the most favorable economic circumstances that we have ever enjoyed in a major set of negotiations, and I am confident that 1964 will be the most significant, historic collective bargaining effort that this union has ever made."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a speech on the convention's closing day, congratulated the UAW for a "splendid program . . . for this organization and for its membership," and declared his firm opposition to the so-called bargaining guidelines set forth by the President's Council of Economic Advisers based on overall productivity gains. (See story below.)

The delegates responded by hammering out a program keyed to these overall objectives:

- "Civilizing and humanizing working conditions in the plants [so that] our members can enjoy

PRES. LYNDON B. JOHNSON spelled out goals of his Administration in his first appearances before union gatherings since he took office last November. At right, the President is congratulated by Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. after finishing his talk in Washington to the department's 9th legislative conference; at left, Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers pins a guest badge on Johnson at the UAW convention in Atlantic City.

In Speeches to Union Gatherings:

Fight Pledged by Johnson On Rights, Medicare, Poverty

Pres. Johnson pledged all-out efforts by his Administration to win passage of civil rights, medicare and anti-poverty legislation as he addressed his first two major union audiences since he succeeded to office.

The president told the Auto Workers' 19th Constitutional Convention in Atlantic City that "we are going to pass a civil rights bill if it takes all summer" and we "are going to pass a medical assistance bill for the aged."

He predicted a day later before the 9th National Legislative Conference of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. in Washington, that Congress this year would make a "solemn national commitment: to abolish poverty in these United States of America."

Johnson also chose the Building Trades conference to set forth his foreign policy credo in the strongest terms he has yet used, declaring that general war has become "impossible" in the nuclear age and that the United States, as "the most powerful nation in the world, can afford to be patient" in its relations with other countries.

The 4,000 craftsmen delegates and members of their families interrupted Johnson repeatedly with applause and cheers as he emphasized these objectives:

- An economic growth rate that is "better than 6 percent—about double the rate of the last decade."
- Achievement of such job-creating measures as the housing bill, a faster pace in constructing homes, schools, hospitals, industrial facilities.

Medicare Stressed

"We are not going to sit idly by and let older folks fight high medical expenses in their late years all alone. We are gong to join them; we are going to help them; we are going to assist them," he said, adding:

"And that is why we are going to pass a medical assistance bill, if not this week, if not this month, if not this year, the earliest possible date."

The minimum wage law, he declared, should be extended to millions not now covered. Unemployment insurance should be strengthened. The Manpower Development & Training Act, he said, will provide training opportunities for 125,000 Americans this year, twice as many next year. The Economic Opportunity Act, submitted to Congress to launch Johnson's "war on poverty," will offer education and training opportunities to more than 500,000 young people and adults each year, he noted.

Meany Asks Trades' Aid Back Home

By Eugene A. Kelly

The men and women of labor have the power to "change the political picture" of the nation by adding 20 to 25 more "liberals and progressives" to Congress through political action at the precinct level, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told delegates to the 9th national legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Four thousand delegates from 18 unions with 3.5 million members were rallied to action by Meany at a conference called to launch the department's 12-point legislative program. The delegates were addressed also by Pres. Johnson, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty, House Speaker John W. McCormack, federation Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, and others before moving to Capitol Hill to seek support of their legislative goals.

Meany, reminding the delegates that legislative action has been a major labor activity since the 1880s, said he is "quite sure" the AFL-CIO and its affiliates will support the President's "war on poverty" because "when you look at the record as a whole, we have been engaged in a war on poverty all the days of our existence."

Noting that the delegates comprise "possibly the most politically powerful group ever to come here because you represent people at the community level," he added:

"Remember that you can make

Meany Says 'Guidelines' Threat to Free Unions

Atlantic City, N. J.—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany came out flatly against the concept of government wage-price "guidelines" as he addressed delegates to the Auto Workers' convention here.

Meany, who spoke in the final day of the convention, said that extension of the guideline theory—that wage increases should generally be limited to the average productivity gain for the entire economy—could lead to "the end of free collective bargaining."

"I don't propose that labor at any time agree to going down this road," he declared.

The AFL-CIO president also:

- Expressed labor's "full and complete" backing for Pres. Johnson's anti-poverty measures, but said that since they are directed primarily toward youth opportunities they represent only a "temporary" approach and the key weapon in the war on poverty must be the creation of more jobs.
- Strongly criticized a speech

Civil Rights Bill Clears First Senate Hurdles

By David L. Perlman

The civil rights bill passed its first procedural hurdle as the Senate, after nearly three weeks of debate, voted formally to take up the House-passed measure.

Only a hard-core band of 17 southerners voted against taking up the bill, while 67 senators—41 Democrats and 26 Republicans—voted for consideration.

The Senate then defeated, 50-34, a motion by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) to send the bill to the Judiciary Committee for 10 days of hearings.

Morse had argued that this bow to normal Senate procedure would make it easier to pass a bill. He was supported by Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen. But the bulk of civil rights supporters voted their agreement with Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.), who said it would be "unconscionable" to further delay action.

Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.)

STATE TROOPERS in legislature (shown in background) arouse the anger of Democratic legislators, including State Rep. James Musto, at microphone, who demands that they be removed from Pennsylvania House of Representatives. The police were removed and debate proceeded on the unemployment compensation bill, though Democrats couldn't learn who called out troops.

Social Security Funds In Actuarial Balance

Trustees of the Social Security Trust Funds have reported to Congress that the system is in good financial shape—"in actuarial balance."

Future income, based on automatic increases in the social security tax rate, will be sufficient to meet obligations to all present and future beneficiaries, the trustees said. Treasury Sec. C. Douglas Dillon is managing trustee of the fund. Serving with him are Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

The trustees' 24th annual report was hailed by AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank. He said "it contains facts and figures that inspire confidence for the millions of workers who look to social security for protection. . . . It should be read by every member of Congress."

Cruikshank noted that the report "shows clearly" why there is no "cause for alarm" at the fact that payments from the Old Age & Survivors Insurance Fund have exceeded payments into the fund in five of the last six years.

Based on projected income and outgo in the years ahead, the present $19 billion fund will build up rapidly, reaching a total of $120 billion in 1980 if no further changes are made in the law, the trustees said. Even if benefits and the taxable wage base are amended periodically in line with changes in average earnings, the fund would build up to $89 billion, the report declared.

Cruikshank compared the present temporary annual "deficit" in the fund to the situation of a family which receives a paycheck once a week and therefore operates at a "deficit" six days out of seven.

The separately-maintained Disability Insurance Trust Fund needs some minor changes to come into closer actuarial balance, the trustees said. They recommended that this be done through "a small reallocation" of social security income between the two trust funds. No increase in the payroll tax would be necessary, the report indicated.

During the 1963 fiscal year, the report said, the OASI trust fund took in $13.8 billion and paid out $14.5 billion, including payments to the railroad retirement program. The total number of persons receiving OASI benefits rose 7 percent during the year to 17.2 million.

Ex-President Of AFGE Dies at 72

Cincinnati, O.—James A. Campbell, president emeritus of the Government Employes, died here of cancer at the age of 72.

He served as president of the union from 1951 to 1962, a period during which it more than doubled in membership and won recognition as collective bargaining representative of significant groups of federal workers.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler expressed "deep sorrow" in a telegram to his widow, Mrs. Elva Campbell.

They declared that his "many years of service in public life and his untiring efforts in behalf of the working people have left a monument to his memory that will never be forgotten."

During a long government career, Campbell had served with the Veterans Administration, Social Security Administration and Civil Service Commission. He was one of the founding members of the AFGE when it was formed in the early 1930s after the National Federation of Federal Employes withdrew from the former AFL and he lived to see the new union far outdistance its predecessor in membership.

He served on several advisory committees to the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee and the Civil Service Commission.

Housing Authority Revived by City

Indianapolis — The Indianapolis City Council has amended an ordinance that had made it impossible for the city to run a public housing program and Mayor John J. Barton (D) promptly named a five-man Indianapolis Housing Authority.

The ordinance was changed and the housing authority reactivated on motion of City Councilman Max Brydenthal, vice president of Auto Workers Local 23 and legislative representative of the Marion County AFL-CIO. The vote was 8 to 1.

The new housing authority is headed by Robert Efroymson, a manufacturer, and includes Pres. Edward T. Windham of the county AFL-CIO. Other members are Bruce Savage, who was commissioner of the Public Housing Administration in Washington under the Eisenhower Administration; Edward H. Hughes III, attorney for the old housing authority, and Dr. Joseph T. Taylor, director of program development for Flanner House and its self-help housing program.

Democrats Bolt Vote:

Jobless Aid Cut by $35 Million As GOP Passes Scranton Bill

Harrisburg, Pa.—In a tumultuous session which saw state troopers in the Pennsylvania House of Representatives and the doors to the galleries locked and guarded, final passage came for Gov. William W. Scranton's unemployment compensation bill after Democratic legislators had walked off the floor charging "police state" tactics and a "gag" on debate.

Passed by a minimum constitutional margin on Mar. 20, the measure will cut unemployment compensation to the state's jobless by a net of $35 million annually, affecting 90,000 workers.

The Pennsylvania AFL-CIO, which had led a mass rally and march of 20,000 union members to the Capital steps the previous day, pledged to continue the fight by "all the democratic processes available," including a possible legal challenge to certain aspects of the law.

Final vote in the House was 106 to 14, with one Democrat joining 105 Republicans. Two Republicans voted against the measure while the remainder of the 98-member Democratic delegation stood in the rear of the chamber in protest.

The Democratic walkout and the narrow victory for the measure climaxed a day-evening session which had resumed after several Republican delays to round up still-missing votes.

As representatives took their seats they found armed state troopers stationed in the chamber with Capital police and plainclothesmen standing by. All entrances to the visitors galleries had been locked and were guarded by police.

Democrats immediately protested the troopers' presence and threatened to leave if they were not removed. After 20 minutes of desk-thumping and shouted protests, the troopers were ordered outside the chamber, where they remained. Veteran legislators could not recall any previous occasion where they had been in the legislative chambers.

'Mystery' Order to Troopers

Rep. James Musto (D), who demanded to know the authority for ordering troopers "to stand over us in our deliberations," was told that neither House Speaker W. Stuart Helm nor Atty.-Gen. Walter E. Alessandroni had ordered them. He said he was unable to learn if the order had come from the governor's office.

Prior to the appearance of the police there had been no demonstrations or disorders, and legislators on both sides of the aisle had praised the union visitors for their "excellent decorum" at the rally and in the galleries.

The bill's final vote came after debate had been shut off by Republican action despite Democratic claims of an understanding that there would be unlimited debate. Minority Leader Anthony J. Petrosky (D) castigated Speaker Helm for "not conducting the House in a constitutional manner."

"We shall therefore absent ourselves from the House," he declared.

While Democrats filed to the rear the vote was taken. Petrosky then sought the floor again, stating that the vote was "illegally constituted" and "destroyed democratic processes" of the legislature.

Before debate was curtailed, the bill was strongly criticized by Rep. Herbert Fineman (D), who termed it "replete with tricks and gimmicks."

'Springboard' for Scranton

The bill, he declared was a "springboard" for Gov. Scranton's presidential ambitions because it would establish a "strong conservative image to appeal to the industrialists who control the party's war chest."

Fineman said the bill's tax tables were "distorted deliberately to favor a few large corporations."

As passed by the House and Senate, the measure will eliminate entirely or drastically cut unemployment compensation for two out of every five now eligible.

Many Penalized

The measure will penalize seasonal workers, low-paid and intermittent workers, mothers who return to work after childbirth, those on social security or private pensions and those receiving severance pay. It requires that the burden of proof of job-seeking be on the unemployed.

It also curtails the former overall 30-week maximum payment period and sharply restricts those jobless for more than a year in qualifying for further benefits.

The weekly maximum benefit will be raised from $40 to $45 for a few jobless, but the duration of benefits is shortened.

On the employer side, the tax base was raised from $3,000 to $3,600 annually, but the minimum corporation tax rate was cut from 2 percent to 1 percent.

Iushewitz Quits Group, Hits Lag on Pay Floor

New York—Labor's representative on the Governor's Committee on the Minimum Wage has resigned to protest sidetracking of proposals to raise the state's wage floor to $1.50 an hour.

Sec. Morris Iushewitz of the New York City Central Labor Council expressed a "deep sense of disappointment" at the lack of action in a letter of resignation to Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller.

He told the governor, a candidate for the Republican presidential nomination, the disappointment is shared by the entire executive board of the city central labor body, and added:

"It is our considered opinion that the time for further extended study has long since passed and that the urgency of the situation demands positive action."

Iushewitz said that when he accepted membership on the governor's committee in February, it was his "distinct impression" that it would prepare an immediate report on the $1.50 minimum wage in time for action in the current session of the legislature. Instead, he said, the first meeting and the governor's "charge" to the group "made it obvious that there would be no action for at least a year."

New York city adopted a $1.50 minimum wage in 1962, but it was invalidated by the courts on the ground that state law preempts the field. New York state has a $1.15 minimum wage, which will rise to $1.25 next October.

INTO THE STREETS of Harrisburg, Pa., pour 20,000 trade unionists for march around the state Capitol after rally in opposition to the Scranton Administration's unemployment compensation revision bill. The marchers, representing unions from all parts of the state, arrived by chartered busses and special trains for the one-day demonstration.

Shopcraft Board Named:

Court Orders Bar 2 Railroad Strikes

It was the lawyers' round in the long-stalled railroad work rules negotiations.

Rail operating unions, which have sought to get talks going with individual railroads after a breakdown of national negotiations, met with flat refusals to bargain from both the Louisville & Nashville and the Southern Pacific railroads.

On the L&N, four operating unions called a strike in an effort to force management to sit down at the bargaining table. Instead the railroad obtained a temporary restraining order in federal court at Louisville, pending a hearing Mar. 30.

SP Unions Enjoined

Earlier the Southern Pacific had obtained a similar restraining order barring a strike even though the unions had not called a walkout against that railroad.

At the national level, the railroads have warned that they will force a nationwide shutdown if any railroad is struck by putting into effect unilaterally a series of work rules which the unions contend would wreck seniority rights, cut pay and abolish craft lines. The unions are asking for improved working conditions including overtime, holiday pay, expenses away from home and a night shift differential.

Congress last August ordered arbitration of part of the work rules dispute, involving engine crews and the use of locomotive firemen, but said other issues should be resolved through direct negotiations.

It is these other issues, which the railroads call "secondary" but the unions insist are of major importance, which are involved in the current phase of the dispute.

In another development, Pres. Johnson named an Emergency Board under the Railway Labor Act to investigate and report in a rules dispute between the railroads and six shopcraft unions bargaining through the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept. The unions are seeking job stabilization guarantees.

Judge Clears Hatters Of Anti-Trust Charges

Dallas, Tex.—U.S. District Court Judge Sarah T. Hughes has cleared the Hatters of all charges growing out of a $2 million lawsuit brought against the union by nine non-union Dallas headwear manufacturers.

Pres. Alex Rose of the Hatters said in New York that the ruling "asserts once and for all our right to run a union label campaign in all areas of the industry." He said also:

"It is our union's purpose to raise the living and working conditions of all the workers in our industry who are the victims of substandard wages. We are gratified that the court has now restated legal approval of union label campaigns among consumers which will help us to eliminate the remnants of poverty in our industry."

A jury had found the union not guilty of unlawful secondary boycott activities but awarded damages of $13,089 to the manufacturers on an anti-trust law charge. Judge Hughes nullified the finding and ruled, as a matter of law, that there was no anti-trust violation.

The judge emphasized, Rose noted, that the union's leaflet distribution at retail stores was "lawful economic conduct" and that an agreement between the retailers and the Hatters that the retailers would not buy millinery from the non-union manufacturers was not a law violation.

Counsel for the union here were David Richards and Charles J. Morris of Dallas and Isadore Katz of New York City.

Automation Studies Set By Advisers

Techniques used by local labor and management groups to adjust to the impact of automation and technological change will be examined by the President's Committee on Labor-Management Policy at three regional seminars.

The sessions were announced by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges, alternating chairmen of the committee, following a request by Pres. Johnson for further study of the problems of automation.

The committee set up the seminars—time and place to be announced later—at a meeting in which the labor, management and public members expressed their concern for the labor displacement caused by automation and other forms of economic change.

The committee's further study would be concerned, it said, with adjustment practices in private industry which have been used to facilitate change and ease displacement and which can be possibly used in other situations. The committee said it will continue to consider other aspects of automation while the local sessions are being conducted.

URW to Seek Boosts In Pensions, Welfare

Cleveland, O.—The Rubber Workers will seek "substantial increases" in pension and welfare benefits from major rubber firms with more than 40,000 employes as negotiations open here Mar. 31, Pres. George Burdon announced.

Union negotiating teams from plants of Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., Goodyear Tire and General Tire began drafting proposals Mar. 23 in the same hotel where contract talks will be held. Earlier the URW had served reopening notices as a result of action taken by a majority of locals representing a majority of members in each chain.

Guidelines adopted at a URW pension and insurance conference last December will form the basis for specific proposals to be made when separate talks start.

Five-year Firestone and Goodyear agreements expire Apr. 30, and the General Tire agreement runs out May 1. In each case a 60-day cancellation notice is required, if agreement is not reached, to bring the effective expiration date to June 30.

A reopening notice also has been served on Seiberling Rubber Co. on behalf of Local 18, but place and starting date of talks have not been announced. Welfare agreements with the B. F. Goodrich Co. and the U.S. Rubber Co. expire in the summer and reopening notices will be served later.

22 Plants Involved

The URW-Firestone talks involve 17,000 workers in eight plants. Talks with Goodyear affect 21,000 in 12 locations, and at General Tire, 3,300 in two plants.

Some 200 delegates from URW locals approved general goals for welfare and pension negotiations at the winter conference after considering suggested improvements.

Subjects up for discussion included increased benefits in all types of contract-covered insurance plans; increasing allowances for surgical fees to meet actual charges of medical men; a company-paid prescription drug program; early retirement on pension; nursing home care and hospital-insurance coverage for retirees and surviving spouses.

Two-Year Pact Ends Jersey Bus Walkout

Newark, N. J.—Nearly 6,200 drivers, mechanics and utility men are back at work for the Public Service Coordinated Transport Co. after voting acceptance of the third management offer to end their 16-day strike. The vote was 3,679 in favor, 839 opposed.

Key to the settlement, worked out at a pre-dawn bargaining session called by Democratic Gov. Richard J. Hughes, was a two-year contract term instead of the three-years insisted on by management of the firm, which carries 1 million riders daily on 2,500 busses between points in New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

Under the settlement, members of the Street & Electric Railway Employes who work for the utility will get an increase in the former $2.75 hourly base rate, plus a 3-cent cost of living increase, to new base rates of $2.86 the first year and $2.96 in the second year of the contract, with the cost of living factor continued in the second year.

Vacations will go to three weeks after eight years, four weeks after 18 years. Holidays will be increased from seven to eight a year in 1965. Other improvements:

Sick benefits will be raised from $50 a week to $65 for 26 weeks and employes will get these benefits up to 39 weeks after 10 years of service, up to 52 weeks after 20 years.

Insurance benefits go from a top of $4,000 to $5,000. Under existing Blue Cross-Blue Shield and extended coverage plans, management increased its contribution from 80 percent of cost to 85 percent.

New York Assembly Votes Apprentice Bill

Albany, N. Y.—The New York State Assembly has passed a bill to make it "an unlawful discriminatory practice" to select persons for an apprenticeship program on any basis "other than their qualifications."

The bill was adopted on a 135 to 10 vote and sent to the State Senate after the New York State AFL-CIO withdrew its objection to the measure. New York already has a statute barring discrimination in apprenticeship programs on the basis of race, color, creed or national origin.

Building Crafts Set 12-Point Program

PRESIDENTS of 18 building trades unions and 4,000 delegates to the 9th national legislative conference of Building & Construction Trades Dept. heard AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany tell them ultimate success for labor's legislative goals depends on their activity at the community level in the AFL-CIO COPE register-and-vote drive.

Johnson Tells Labor He'll Fight For Rights, Health, Poverty Bills

Prices and wages must be arrived at "freely" but "responsibly," he said. He added: "You are builders—and I ask your help in building the kind of America . . . that we can build together. I ask your help in redeeming the futures of the poor and the disadvantaged and those who have suffered from discrimination."

Speaking on domestic front problems to 12,000 delegates and visitors at the UAW convention, the President declared that as long as he is in office the terms of the national war on poverty will be "unconditional surrender."

Economic Gains Seen

He noted that the need to create more jobs in the 60s is a key aspect of the drive to wipe out poverty and said the recently enacted tax cut "is the largest economic stride" taken in this century.

Referring to negotiations coming up this year between the UAW and the auto industry, Johnson repeated the appeal to both sides of the bargaining table made by the late Pres. Kennedy before the 1962 UAW convention.

He congratulated the UAW on its position that progress is achieved "with the community and not at the expense of the community" and said both business and labor have the responsibility of avoiding revival of a "price-wage spiral" that, he said, might "choke off our needed and speedy economic expansion."

There may be "legitimate disagreements" over the length of the statutory workweek and overtime premiums, the President said, but there can be no disagreement over the desirability of "facing squarely up" at the bargaining table to issues of worktime and leisure.

Past reductions in the workweek, longer vacations and more holidays are "a tribute" to labor and its leadership, Johnson observed, adding:

"We will rightfully expect to purchase with our rising productivity not only more goods but also more time—more time to spend with our families, more time to spend in recreation and relaxation, in study and thought, and rest."

Johnson turned to the subject of foreign affairs as he reached the end of his text on domestic issues at the Building Trades conference.

"There may have been a time," he observed, "when a Commander-in-Chief would order soldiers to march the very moment a disturbance occurred . . . but the world as it was and the world as it is are not the same any more. Once—once upon a time—even large-scale wars could be waged without risking the end of civilization. But what was once upon a time is no longer so. . . ."

Citing the devastation that nuclear warfare could bring to the United States and its adversaries—"taking half of our land, half of our population in an hour"—the President declared:

"The people of the world, I think, prefer reasoned agreement to ready attack . . . We must offer the outstretched arm that tries to help instead of an arm-length sword that tries to kill."

The President made an obvious reference to criticism by Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) that he should have sent in marines when Cuban Premier Fidel Castro shut off fresh water supplies to the U.S. base at Guantanamo Bay. That problem, Johnson said without mentioning Goldwater by name, was solved not by "a battalion of marines bayonetting in to turn on the water," but by "a single admiral" sent in to shut it off.

"The people of this country have more blessed hopes than bitter victories," Johnson said. "The people of this country and the world expect more from their leaders than just a show of brute force. And so our hope and our purpose is to employ reasoned agreement instead of ready aggression, to preserve our honor without a world in ruins, to substitute if we can understanding for retaliation."

Johnson Presents Award to Mason

A distinguished service award for work on behalf of the handicapped was presented by Pres. Johnson to Legislative Dir. Walter J. Mason of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Johnson, calling Mason to the platform at the BCTD legislative conference in Washington, described his own role in the ceremony as a great honor "to me as President and as a human being." Mason has been a labor representative on the executive committee of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped since 1947.

The citation lauded him for helping produce the AFL-CIO film "They Have What It Takes," and articles, exhibits and a handbook on employment of the handicapped.

Chicken Soup Should Have —Guess What?

The Meat Cutters have the quixotic idea that there ought to be chicken in chicken soup.

This stand was taken at an Agriculture Dept. hearing at which the union maintained that "when the consumer buys food labeled as chicken or turkey soup, he should be able to expect a standard minimum of meat in the soup."

The union doesn't want a lot of chicken in chicken soup or turkey in turkey soup. Just 2 percent on a ready-to-serve basis. Anything less, it maintained, should not be labeled chicken soup or turkey soup. Some dehydrated soups, it protested, contain only a fraction of 1 percent of meat by the time they get on the table.

"We believe the present poultry inspection practice concerning soups confuses the consumer," the union claimed. "It is a mockery of consumer labeling. The chicken or turkey name is on the package, but there may or may not be any poultry meat visible at all when the soup is ready to be eaten. The consumer should not have to turn to a microscope to find the poultry meat."

4,000 Delegates Open Legislative Drive

your most important political contribution at home in the registration drive now going on."

Meany observed that a 10 percent increase in voter registration by union members and their families would "help move America forward" by helping elect those who "believe as we do" in helping the "great mass of the people" get more purchasing power.

Sec. 14b Under Attack

He reminded the delegates that Sec. 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act "invites the states to go as far as they like" in enacting so-called "right-to-work" laws and that "no other section of federal law sets up federal standards and invites the states to undermine them."

This section will "remain in the law until we take steps to change the political picture," Meany asserted, adding:

"We need 20 to 25 more votes of liberals and progressives who see eye to eye with us. We do not have enough votes now, but we could have next January."

The outlook for electing liberal congressmen is "better than in many years," the federation head said. He told the building tradesmen, "You know the facts, the voting records, and you can bring about a change. But the job must be done on Nov. 3, 1964. Then we will see a different Congress and a different situation come January 1965."

Haggerty said in his keynote talk that the department's legislative program is "calculated to strengthen our entire country and all its people, rather than to serve any special narrow interest."

Noting that Johnson had endorsed a bill to amend the Davis-Bacon Act to provide for fringe benefits as part of the prevailing wage on federal construction work, Haggerty said the measure would mean "jobs for many thousands of union construction craftsmen, jobs that are badly needed in an industry where unemployment still runs as high as 20 percent" in some areas. The bill awaits final Senate action.

Appeals from Home

During the legislative process, Haggerty noted, there are times when members of Congress can be persuaded to act favorably "only by direct appeals for support from the voters in their home districts.

"If your response to our requests for the future is as solid and effective as it has been, we will get the job done," he declared.

Observing that "as construction goes, so goes the nation," Haggerty asserted "if enough work can be provided to keep our building trades busy, the whole nation will prosper."

The BCTD legislative program aims at passage of three Taft-Hartley Act amendments involving on-site picketing, labor-management trade promotion funds, and repeal of Sec. 14b. It also calls for renewal of the accelerated public works program, a shorter workweek, mass transit funds, exemption of construction from the Small Business Act, area redevelopment, hospital care for the aged under social security, civil rights, federal aid to education, federal standards for unemployment compensation, and adequate funds for housing and community development.

McCormack paid tribute to the late Pres. Kennedy and to Johnson, Kennedy's successor, and urged labor to work harder than ever to stem the "forces of reaction trying to dominate" America. All the forces of progress must unite next fall, he said, "to elect progressive members of the Congress and a progressive president."

Wirtz lauded the delegates for being here "on the people's business, making democracy work." The Administration, he says, supports many of labor's objectives and urged, "We've got to move toward a stronger unemployment compensation program" and for relief of the unemployed.

Biemiller noted that labor helped elect Kennedy and Johnson in 1960 but lost 21 "tried and true friends" in the House, and since then suffered an additional net loss of four others.

'Illogical Quirk' of T-H

Labor is spending "thousands and thousands of dollars in one state after another" trying to protect itself against the "illogical quirk" of the T-H Act on the so-called "work" laws, Biemiller noted.

Reminding the delegates of the Senate civil rights filibuster, he said:

"We are faced with a sitdown strike. You have a group of senators who decided they are going to stay there and not let anything happen" on the civil rights bill, the Davis-Bacon fringe benefits bill, and other legislation sought by labor.

"If you and I tried this" at a union meeting, he said, "I hate to think how this same group would be up screaming."

Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), long-time member of the Plumbers, expressed hope for the passage of bills providing social security hospital care, civil rights for all and the President's "war on poverty" measures.

The one thing not needed, he said, is more restrictive labor legislation. "Settle your problems yourselves," he urged, and keep them out of "Congressional hospital."

Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) called for a reappraisal of U.S. foreign policy and the "exportation of economic freedom" overseas.

New York Collects Unpaid $1,298,944

Albany, N. Y.—The New York State Dept. of Labor in 1963 collected a record total of $1,298,944 in unpaid earnings under state minimum wage laws due 30,865 employes of 8,216 establishments.

Labor-United Fund Agreement Reached

Council Bluffs, Ia.—The interests of organized labor will be "carefully considered" before contracts are awarded for major construction or repairs under a statement of policy adopted by directors of the Council Bluffs United Fund after conferences with state union leaders and Frank Emig, AFL-CIO Community Service Activities representative.

The policy also included a pledge of "special consideration" to bidders on construction or repair projects who have supported the United Fund and are located in the Omaha-Council Bluffs area. In addition the board agreed to elect as one of its members a representative of the Building Trades Council from a list of three candidates to be nominated by the council itself.

UAW Drafts 1964 Bargaining Program

'Significant' Advances Foreseen by Reuther

a greater measure of respect and dignity on the job.

- "Creating new job opportunities for younger workers, for older workers still too young to retire, and for members of minority groups.
- "Protecting our members against the impact of automation and plant relocation.
- "Improving job security, health security, income security, old age security and raising our members' living standards toward levels consistent with the possibilities of our potentially affluent society."

Jobs Key To Other Problems

Reuther described the need for full employment in both the United States and Canada as the "key" to other problems confronting UAW members.

"The rich are getting richer and the poor are getting poorer, relatively," he declared. "The bottom 20 percent of American families are getting less than 5 percent of the national income. The top 20 percent are getting more than 50 percent . . . in the period 1953 to 1963 . . . wages and salaries went up 59 percent. Dividends went up 94 percent. Interest payments, which go mostly to the bankers and the coupon clippers, went up 142 percent . . . profits are at an all-time high. . . ."

The UAW president, insisting that the auto industry can well afford to grant the union's contract proposals without raising prices on its products, cited General Motors' 1963 profits after taxes of nearly $1.6 billion, or the equivalent of $3.80 for "every hour worked by every GM hourly wage worker in the U.S."

He also called attention to the nearly $5 million he said Henry Ford II had drawn in 1962 from the Ford Motor Co. in salaries, bonuses and dividends.

"If you make $5 million a year and you're trying to get another million that's sound economics and . . . non-inflationary," he observed with heavy sarcasm. "But if you are a wage-earner getting $6,000, $7,000 or $8,000 and you want another thousand, that's dangerous, inflationary and downright subversive."

Discussing areas of legislative concern to the union, Reuther congratulated Pres. Johnson, a principal convention speaker, for declaring "unconditional war on human poverty" and described the 50 million Americans now living at or below the edge of poverty as the "have-not" people of the nation.

He warned that passage of the civil rights bill now before the Senate would not solve all the problems of discrimination but said it would provide "new tools."

Companies Warned

The lack of a social security program of health care for the aged is another "national deficit," he observed, and served notice on the auto companies that if they do not "join us in Washington" to help correct it, the same problem will confront them in the form of "a 1964 collective bargaining demand."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, in addressing the delegates, dealt at length with solution of unemployment problems as "one basic answer" to poverty and declared that "there is no excuse for poverty in a land rich beyond measure in resources, in people, ideas and ideals."

Another speaker, T. C. Douglas, leader of Canada's New Democratic Party, warned that the human problems confronting western civilization from the onrush of automation rank second only to the threat of thermonuclear war.

Dir. Al Barkan of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education told the delegates that labor's legislative program depends on the election next November of additional liberal House members and senators as well as a friendly President.

Other highlights of the convention included the presentation of UAW's Solidarity Award to Brewery Workers Pres. Karl Feller.

One of four Social Justice Awards went posthumously to the late Pres. John F. Kennedy and was accepted by his brother, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, Also receiving Social Justice Awards were Arne Geijer, head of the Swedish labor movement and president of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions; Carl Sandburg, poet and humanist; and Pres. A. Philip Randolph of the Sleeping Car Porters.

The high priority placed by the delegates on correction of poor plant conditions in this year's auto negotiations was evident in extensive debate over this section on the collective bargaining program.

Specific Steps Listed

Among specific items in this area, the convention called for steps to curb speedups, reasonable rest periods or "coffee breaks" from the "grinding monotony of production work," an end to infringements on privacy through management surveillance of workers and union representatives by means of closed-circuit television and other electronic devices, and legal, legislative and bargaining efforts to assure UAW members the moral right to refuse to work on parts produced under substandard conditions.

The convention gave top position to early retirement programs as a means of opening up jobs.

It said the current annual improvement factor of 2.5 percent under most UAW contracts is "obsolete and inadequate."

It called for revision of the factor "to reflect the worker's full equity in the fruits of technological progress," modernization of cost-of-living wage adjustments, and wage parity between Auto Workers in the United States and Canada.

At a news conference Reuther said that the productivity or man-hour output of Auto Workers had risen 4.9 percent a year, on the average, since 1947 and that this would be given serious consideration in preparing specific proposals to the employers.

In other highlights, the collective bargaining resolution called for:

- Increased pension benefits and regular cost-of-living adjustments for Auto Workers already retired.
- Extra pay at vacation time, similar to that already provided by the auto companies to employes of their overseas plants.
- Full company payment for life, sickness and accident insurance and comprehensive improvements in these group plans.
- Greater protections in adjusting to technological change.
- Income security through the payment of salaries rather than hourly wages to production workers, improved supplementary unemployment benefits, and parity with white collar workers in fringe benefits and separation pay.
- Special attention to the jobs and wage problems faced by workers in small plants and the parts industry.
- Full support of technical, office and professional employes through UAW bargaining.

AUTO WORKERS CONVENTION in Atlantic City hears UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther declare in his keynote speech that 1964 contract negotiations with the auto industry will see the "most significant" collective bargaining effort in union's history. Reuther called on the delegates to "pioneer new concepts" in bargaining.

Meany Warns on 'Guidelines' As Threat to Free Bargaining

by Sen. J. William Fulbright (D-Ark.) suggesting that we "should accept the ideas of [Cuban Premier Fidel] Castro as a permanent way of life. . . ."

Recalling that the western democracies "got tired" and accepted Hitler as a fact of life in 1938, Meany declared: "We all know the result of that . . . we can't afford to get tired, and we can't afford to forget that eternal vigilance is always going to be the price of liberty."

Meany opened his speech with a review of what the labor movement has been doing since the merger of the former AFL and CIO and "what we face." The merger, itself, he said, "is working well," and the internal disputes plan established by the 1961 AFL-CIO convention has succeeded in reducing such disputes to "an absolute minimum."

More to Be Done

The labor movement's organization efforts since the merger have drawn the cooperation of individual unions and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., he noted, but said "very frankly . . . we are not moving as fast as we had hoped . . . and there's still a great deal to be done."

In the area of civil rights, labor likewise is dissatisfied, Meany observed, but some progress has been made in cooperation with the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity by the removal of racial bars from some union constitutions, through union civil rights committees and through AFL-CIO task forces working at community levels.

It is not enough to write non-discrimination clauses into contracts, he said, adding:

"You must follow up," because despite the existence of contract clauses and pledges, "we still have some cases of discrimination in fact."

The AFL-CIO president also reviewed the federation's efforts in the fields of community services, international affairs and political education. He noted that the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education had borrowed the services of the UAW's Roy Reuther to head the 1964 drive to assure that union members and their families are registered to vote.

On the question of government guidelines for union and management negotiators, Meany recalled that a Cabinet member some years ago had suggested that the government has "a responsibility to assert the public interest in collective bargaining."

"At that time I challenged that statement," he said, "and I challenge it now. . . . I believe in free collective bargaining. It is quite obvious that if you are going to have guidelines on the question of wages, the question of prices, the question of the rate of production, then eventually you will have to go a little further.

"What about the wages of management? What about the dividends to stockholders . . . the question of the advisability of large reserves for some purpose that is determined only by management?

"If we go down this road far enough, it leads to the end of free collective bargaining. . . . I don't propose that labor at any time agree to go down this road."

He said he had no worries about the Auto Workers matching the companies in responsibility at the bargaining table and declared:

"In the final analysis, there's no substitute for a strong union in every area of activity in a democratic society. This will provide the guidelines. This will provide the responsibility."

In response to questions at a news conference, Meany said he would suggest to the AFL-CIO Executive Council at a later date a formal position opposing the concept of government bargaining guidelines. He said he did not regard Johnson's remarks to the UAW convention on labor-management responsibility as an attempt to intervene in this year's auto industry's negotiations.

"There's nothing wrong with the President making statements that he would like to see a fair settlement," he said, "because all of us would like to see a fair settlement."

Regarding the war on poverty, he commended efforts to keep young people in school and help better equip them for jobs but he said this represents "almost a temporary gain insofar as they relate to the total labor force. . . . Eventually they do come into the labor force and then, of course, each year a new class of people is coming in."

"No matter what other important things are done to help the poor, such as vocational training or improving literacy," he said, "there's no way in which these people can permanently break out of the bonds of poverty unless they have jobs at decent wages. This is the real key.

"We need jobs for those who are now unemployed, jobs for those who are being displaced by automation, and jobs for the millions of young people entering the labor force," he declared.

Marine Unions, Officials Discuss Grain Shipping

The presidents of three AFL-CIO maritime unions met in Washington with Cabinet members and shipping industry leaders to discuss plans for guaranteeing that at least 50 percent of all grains sold to Soviet bloc countries be sent in American ships.

The meeting, attended also by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, grew out of the agreement last month ending the maritime unions' boycott of U.S. wheat shipments to the Soviet Union. The agreement contained provisions of top-level meetings to resolve the problems growing out of grain shipments and use of American vessels.

Attending the sessions were Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers, Pres. Joseph Curran of the National Maritime Union and Pres. Thomas W. Gleason of the Intl. Longshoremen's Association.

Representing the government were Sec. of State Dean Rusk, Sec. of Commerce Luther H. Hodges and Sec. of Agriculture Orville L. Freeman. Assistant Labor Sec. James J. Reynolds represented Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

Leaders of the American Maritime Association, the Pacific American Steamship Association, the American Merchant Marine Institute and the American Shipping Lines were also present.

A Nation's Conscience

THE UNITED STATES Senate—described as the "greatest deliberative body in the world"—is being victimized by a small group of men who are physically attempting to block the concepts of democracy from becoming an operating reality.

The Southern filibusterers are in effect staging a legislative sitdown strike, adamantly refusing a decisive vote on the House-passed civil rights bill and thereby blocking action on other legislation that the nation needs to deal with its domestic and foreign problems.

Outside the bitter band of southerners in the Senate there is a broad consensus in favor of the civil rights measure. The President has repeatedly spoken out strongly; the House has voted by a decisive bipartisan margin; church, labor, civil rights and other groups are clearly on record. Yet the sitdown strike continues.

The filibusterers are trotting out all the ancient and discredited arguments; they are offering demagogic and tongue-in-cheek alternatives and solutions. They are essentially stalling for time, hoping against hope that some miracle will do away with the bill, do away with the coalition of forces dedicated to a final victory for equal rights for all men. But there will be no miracle, no out for these men.

The civil rights forces are more closely organized and unified than ever before in the history of civil rights legislative struggles. And they have the wide-based public support that is needed for final victory.

There is neither reason, grace nor gallantry in the filibusterers' narrow and mean struggle to deny to their fellow men their rights under the law, both constitutional and moral. There is only the bitterness of a lost cause and the sour flavor of ultimate defeat.

Those in the Senate who are waging the physically-taxing fight to secure finally a real civil rights bill deserve the plaudits and the support of the nation. In their dedication to do battle for right and justice lies the conscience of the nation.

Scranton's 'Reform'

PENNSYLVANIA Gov. William W. Scranton and his business-industry allies have had their way in severely weakening the state's unemployment compensation law and "reforming" about 100,000 workers out of the jobless pay system.

Scranton's widely advertised "reform" bill will come back to haunt him both in the state and on the national level. By disqualifying the 100,000 workers from drawing unemployment benefits, the Scranton law further injures the state's economy. Instead of attacking the unemployment that has scarred the state, the law attacks the unemployed.

Nationally, Scranton may have improved his potential as a Republican presidential candidate with those business and industry groups which applaud attacks on the unemployment compensation system. But in terms of the millions of Americans who mark ballots on Election Day, an assault on the basic structure of the unemployment compensation program is the hallmark of a throwback conservative with a greater concern for profit-stuffed corporations than the fate of the unemployed.

Sit-Down Strike

Education Chief Says:

New Concept of Schools Needed To Bring Hope to Slum Children

The following is excerpted from an article by Francis Keppel, U.S. Commissioner of Education, which appeared in the Washington Post on Mar. 22.

THE ROLE of education in the slums has often been overlooked in the past. That is no longer true. There is perhaps no other institution in the country of which more is expected and where so much needs to be accomplished. But before the schools of the slums can meet these rising expectations, before they can serve effectively in the attack on poverty, some thoroughgoing alterations are required.

These call for bold approaches not merely by the educational community but by the community at large—a new public awareness of the problems and difficulties in these schools and a determination to resolve them. The first of these problems is priority—or, rather, a lack of priority—for the schools of the slums.

Usually these schools are substandard, and substandard schools are precisely the wrong schools for the children of poverty. These students, deprived in every other aspect of their lives, require more, not less, of educational opportunity if they are to succeed; the most qualified, not the least qualified, of teachers; the least crowded, not the most crowded, of classrooms; the most imaginative, not the least imaginative, of educational efforts.

For too many years, however, education in the slums has been directed to maintenance efforts, to the maintenance of schools which exist in form but not in substance—where teachers seem to teach and children seem to attend, but where the link between teaching and learning is frail and tenuous.

The second problem is that we have failed to make the indispensable extra effort to reach and teach these children. Far too often, they are regarded as not merely difficult to teach, but as virtually unteachable.

There are difficulties, to be sure. Usually they come to school from families of low educational attainment; their homes lack books and other incentives to learning; they lack the middle-class values and cultural endowments of their teachers.

The overriding difficulty, however, is the persistence in teaching methods that have not worked and will not work. A vast number of these children will reject traditional texts and curricula even with good teachers and good buildings.

As a basic change, we need new primers and readers for them which—at the least—recognize their existence in our society. When textbooks reflect only white middle-class life, complete with commodious split-level homes, how can we expect to reach poor white, Negro or Puerto Rican children? Instead, we need textbooks written in terms of their own environments, their own lives and aspirations.

Above all, we need teachers who are trained and gifted in teaching these children. All too frequently, teaching our deprived children has seemed a personal deprivation to the teachers sent to their classrooms.

Unfamiliar with the home and community life of their students, they are often frustrated by youngsters who are troublesome, as well as troubled.

The successful teacher of these children needs warmth and insight. These qualities must be in her at the outset. But they will be lost or blunted if those in charge of our schools fail to recognize and stimulate these qualities. We must bring to these teachers a new prestige and status within their profession and within the community.

THE THIRD PROBLEM that confounds our schools of the slums is their isolation from the communities they are intended to serve. This is the gravest weakness of all.

These are the schools where the iron gates slam shut at 3:30 when classes are over for the day. The bolts are drawn; the lights are turned off; the fortress is secure; the school is protected from the neighborhood.

Teachers come into these fortress schools from the outside world to teach, and, when school is over, they leave again for the outside world. Some of these schools even refuse to list their telephone numbers in order to avoid the distraction of parents calling.

Yet it is in these schools, as nowhere else in the slums, that we could create not a fortress amid the poor but a true command post against poverty.

The agents of education and social welfare must learn to work together. Moreover, they must seek to develop widespread citizen participation, perhaps by generating community councils on poverty. The slum school could provide a focus for action, a center for community service.

With the community's effort behind it, the bleak fortress school of today could become the lighthouse school of tomorrow, bringing to our neighborhoods of poverty a new beacon of possibility, promise and hope.

Morgan Says:

Measure of Kennedy Emerges In Study of President's Powers

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

FOUR MONTHS, almost to the day, after Pres. Kennedy's assassination, one of his closest advisers, McGeorge Bundy, has written in the April issue of that important journal, Foreign Affairs, a penetrating appraisal of the powers of the presidency as they relate to the constant and overriding problem of preserving world peace.

Morgan

The article is worth reading for the exposition of presidential responsibility as Bundy saw John F. Kennedy exercise it, first-hand. But something else emerges, too—an intimate measure of the man and the office, which strikes me as a valuable yardstick for the voter to have in a presidential election year. Bundy was the President's assistant for national security affairs, which means he was in on the discussions and decisions taken on every international problem important enough to reach the White House. Though the operation of the job has changed some to conform with the approaches and style of the new President, Bundy occupies the same position under Pres. Lyndon Johnson.

He notes in the article that Johnson's central concern, too, is the pursuit of peace and, in something of a scholarly mouthful, adds that ". . . the effective transfer from one administration to the next has reflected the fact that loyalty to Pres. Kennedy and loyalty to Pres. Johnson are not merely naturally compatible but logically necessary as a part of a larger loyalty to their common purpose"—peace.

In the vast and booby-trapped field of disarmament and/or arms control Bundy makes some important points:

● "Military men in all countries find it hard to approve any arms control proposal which is not either safely improbable or clearly unbalanced in their own favor."

● The present nuclear balance is tilted somewhat in our favor, but this does not permit any lack of respect for the strength of the Soviet Union and, given that precarious stand-off, "no safer balance appears possible at present."

● The arms race itself is now a threat to national security and in the U.S. only a strong Commander-in-Chief with a strong Secretary of Defense is in a position to press steadily for recognition of that fact.

● ". . . The lesson of the test-ban is that no step at all can be taken in this field unless the President himself works for it. A President indifferent to arms control, or easily discouraged by Soviet intransigence or irresponsibility, or inclined to a narrow military view of the arms race, would be a guarantee against agreed limitation of armaments."

Obviously implying the hope that Pres. Johnson grasps that lesson as firmly as Mr. Kennedy did, Bundy then takes his measure of the fallen President which I mentioned earlier:

". . . As we remember John Kennedy, let us separate the essential from the complementary. The youth, the grace and the wit were wonderful, but they were not the center. There lay courage, vision, humanity and strength, tested on the path to the office and tempered by the office itself. It is these qualities, applied to the greatest issues, that belong not only to the man but to the job.

". . . This kind of President and this kind of presidency reflect the general will of Americans.

Temperate use of strength, respect for honest difference, sympathy for those in need and a readiness to go our share of the distance—these qualities . . . described in phrases borrowed from our new President, are qualities of the American people.

"They have their opposites in our character, too, but these are what we honor; these we expect of our Presidents.

"In the terrible shock of Pres. Kennedy's death there were many—perhaps too many—who saw the foul deeds of a few days in Dallas, and not the dead President himself, as the embodiment of the real America. They were wrong.

"As a man, as a President, as a servant of the peace, he was what we are, and his achievement belongs to us all. Strengthened by his service, the presidency continues, and so does the quest for peace."

WHETHER YOU AGREE fully with Bundy's measure, I suggest that he has touched the noble qualities of the man and the ennobling qualities of the office which we should hold up as standards as we are plunged into the caterwauling of another presidential campaign.

What have we remembered, what have we forgotten since Nov. 22? I don't know. But I have a stubborn suspicion, born, I confess, of some hope, that the country has sobered and matured a little since then. We are a little more aware, surely, of the awful risks and crushing burdens of the presidency. And we are apt to scrutinize more closely than we have in a long time the leadership qualities of all candidates of either party bidding for the highest office.

We will also expect, will we not, the greatest care to be exercised in the selection of vice presidential candidates.

Washington Reports:

British Writer Urges Appeal To Idealism on Foreign Aid

FOREIGN AID, now considered disinteresting by many people and Congress, can gain new life if the United States and other governments change the stress from arguments of selfish advantage, Barbara Ward, an editor of the Economist of London, declared in an address carried on the AFL-CIO public service program, Washington Reports to the People, heard on 700 radio stations.

Miss Ward's talk, to the Society for Intl. Development, was made as Pres. Johnson asked Congress to provide $3.4 billion for foreign aid in the fiscal year beginning July 1.

The U.S. stresses "making the undeveloped nations into future good customers, the defense of U.S. interests, the free way of life, or stopping the Communists" in a "hard sell."

As a result, she asserted, "the exciting appeal of foreign aid is missed—the transformation of the life of two-thirds of the human race so that they have a margin of choice, some opportunity."

"This is," she said, "truly as exciting as going to the moon, especially when we think of making deserts bloom, as we shall with desalinization of salt water."

Miss Ward urged an "appeal to what is deepest in us, our moral obligations, our sense of human destiny. . . . Science has set us free to choose whether people starve or not."

SHE ADMITTED that foreign aid cannot operate without what she called "some vicious cycles." She gave as an example the urbanization now taking place faster than industrialization.

"You have a situation in Latin America, for instance," she said, "where 45 to 50 percent of the people are urbanized in a society in which industrialization is below 30 percent. In other words, there is a disproportion between urban and economic growth, and an expansion of absolutely intolerable cities with shanty towns, favellas."

Education, she said, can also move at a faster pace than the opportunities in a nation so that unrest develops among young people unable to make full use of their new knowledge.

Miss Ward recommended cooperation among nations that provide foreign aid to eliminate duplication. She said this is especially important on the lower levels of aid.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

REVERTING TO A SUBJECT discussed last week—the problem of inter-governmental relations—expert opinions are available. Sec. of Agriculture Orville Freeman pointed out, for example, that because ours is a "national economy," there are certain limitations on what separate states can do about it.

A former governor of Minnesota—a governor, indeed, who was beaten for reelection largely because he tried to modernize and improve the state's tax structure, Freeman warned:

"No single state can afford to step far beyond its neighbors in taxing corporations without being subjected to the blackmail of tax competition."

We see the truth of this in many aspects of our life.

Gov. Scranton of Pennsylvania has just executed a so-called "reform" of the state unemployment compensation system partly for the expressed reason that a change would remove competitive burdens in attracting new industry.

Other states authorize, if they do not encourage, extravagant bids by local communities to industries that are trying to run away from historic locations. "Come to us," they advertise. "We'll supply you with a low-cost plant. With us, you won't be bothered by anything. You'll get low taxes."

There can be competition of all kinds between rival industrial states for new corporation investment—by slashing the benefits of workers in accident compensation, by slashing their jobless insurance benefits, by restricting the rolls, by cutting taxes generally.

Who suffers? First the workers, of course—those left behind by a "runaway" or those losing workmen's compensation or jobless insurance benefits. But others may suffer, too.

The southern governors pointed out, at a recent regional conference, that one of the reasons their states lagged in almost every category—school expenditures, mental health care, purchasing power, per capita income—was that they often had welcomed or been possessed of the wrong kind of industry, the low-wage industry that never gives its workers enough to become full members of an affluent society.

They needed stable industry that paid a living wage, they said, to build up the South—to raise the income of its people so they can support good schools and public services.

The business of slashing such services in order to "attract industry"—the senseless competition between rival states that depends on taking services out of the hides of workers—is spreading too rapidly in other areas, however, to be viewed with a sense of security.

Now in Pennsylvania, now in Michigan where workmen's compensation changes are being considered—the inflammation can run anywhere. And that is why, in the long run, the whole country would be better off with minimum federal standards established for such things as unemployment compensation.

REP. FRANK THOMPSON (D-N. J.) commented on the President's poverty message, that "no single yardstick" can really measure what poverty is. It may be poverty of spirit that is worst of all, but it is a matter of legitimate concern, he added, that one-fifth of all our families "must make do on incomes of less than $3,000 a year."

The plain fact is that there is "inherited poverty" in this country—a fact which the late Pres. Kennedy pointed out most eloquently in one of his last addresses, to scholars and students at Amherst College. There are children born in poverty of circumstances who have a less than even chance of getting out, and it may go on for generation after generation. Thompson continued:

"It used to be quite fashionable to castigate the poor as sinners who had somehow brought God's wrath upon themselves by their evil ways. More recently, we have heard it said that the poor are poor because they are lazy and therefore do not deserve consideration. This kind of nonsense is, of course, the ultimate in self-deception. It not only enables one to ignore a problem, but to do so virtuously . . .

"Very few people enjoy living amid squalor. Very few parents enjoy seeing their children go hungry. Very few husbands enjoy seeing the look of reproach in the eyes of their wives. And very few wives enjoy the look of fear and defeat in the eyes of their husbands."

FOREIGN AID is a moral responsibility, Barbara Ward, an editor of the London Economist, declared in an address heard on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

April Holds a Chance to Fill Out Wardrobes at Clearance Prices

By Sidney Margolius

APRIL IS A MONTH of important clothing clearances and a money-saving opportunity to fill in family wardrobe needs, especially of dresses and children's wear. You can expect widespread sales this year because of the early Easter.

April also is the last month before manufacturers must stop producing the traditional VHF television sets under federal law, and must produce only all-channel receivers. The new sets will be equipped to receive both the 12 Very High Frequency channels before and also all 70 Ultra High Frequency channels.

The general significance of this new law is that eventually you will be able to receive more TV programs, especially more educational broadcasts, but also more commercially-sponsored programs. Already in some cities a few UHF channels are in operation, such as the municipally-operated Channel 31 in New York and several channels in Los Angeles, Boston and a number of other areas. Other cities such as Chicago and Los Angeles are expected soon to have municipal TV stations broadcasting educational programs in the UHF band.

For the entire country, there now are 29 educational stations operating in the UHF band, and about 100 commercially-operated UHF stations.

This does not mean that in most parts of the country you need to rush out and buy a UHF set. In fact, in most areas there are no stations operating in the UHF band, and the big television networks, broadcasting in VHF themselves, are not eager to encourage additional UHF competition. Even when UHF broadcasting does come to your area you won't need to buy a new set. You can have your present VHF receiver converted for perhaps $30-$40.

What the advent of UHF sets means is that if you are in the market for a TV set, you will have the choice of buying one of the remaining VHF sets still in the dealers' stocks which would have to be converted if UHF does come to your area and you want to receive it; paying $10 to $30 more for a new UHF receiver, or repairing your old set or buying a used one meanwhile, until UHF does arrive locally.

Aside from the possibilities of using a rehabilitated old set meanwhile, the most suitable choice seems to be to buy a UHF set if you are going to buy a new one at all, even though lower-priced VHF sets still will be available for some months. We do want to make it clear that you don't have to do anything about your present set if there is no UHF channel in your area, or if you aren't especially eager to receive whatever UHF stations already are broadcasting locally. When UHF does become available locally, and you want to receive it, you then can convert any present sets.

EVENTUALLY the availability of these additional programs will be a boon to your family. Both the set manufacturers and the large broadcasters resisted the federal law requiring that new sets manufactured after Apr. 30 must be the all-channel type. You may recall that the large broadcasters also once resisted FM radio broadcasting. They want to monopolize the public's air waves as much as they can.

But the existence of more UHF receivers in homes will encourage more broadcasters to offer additional programs in this band. This means that people in smaller cities and in fringe areas will be able to get better reception than they now get tuning in on broadcasts from the nearest big city.

Moreover, programs should improve as the result of additional stations and thus more competition for viewers. Most cities now have only two or three TV stations, some have only one and some none at all. Only nine of the very largest have four or more according to the Federal Communications Commission. Most present TV broadcasting is on a take-it-or-leave-it basis.

In buying any TV set, it's worth taking time to examine the quality of manufacture and reception of the various models. Such details as the care and quality of the masking around the screen, and the trim and handles, are important not only for themselves but because they are an indication of the overall care with which the manufacturer has produced the set.

In observing the picture, look for clarity, steadiness and clear detail. A moderate-quality set usually will provide good contrast of black and white but cannot be adjusted to get softness in between as a good set can. The lower-grade set sometimes gives a picture with almost a silhouette effect.

Listen to the sound too, not only for its own sake, but because the quality of sound reception is another indication of the quality of the entire set.

Food Buying Calendar: In meats, beef is still reasonable. Beef recently has been selling at its lowest prices in seven years. Also reasonable this month are broilers and eggs. This is the flush month for eggs, and supplies are especially large this year. In canned goods, look for specials on these currently good values: corn, peas, snap beans, tomato juice and tuna fish.

Survey Finds Optimism:

Buying Plans Rising To Seven-Year High

CONSUMER CONFIDENCE gained new strength during the past two or three months, raising to a seven year peak, the University of Michigan's Survey Research Center reported.

Optimistic attitudes are almost as widespread among consumers as during the boom of 1955-56, SRC economists reveal in the center's latest quarterly survey of consumer attitudes and inclinations to buy.

The current high level of the Index of Consumer Sentiment (up from 96.9 in November 1963 to 99 in January-February 1964), together with rising personal incomes, points to continued strength in consumer demand, the report states.

For the group with incomes of $7,500 or more the rise of the index above the level of a year ago is, if anything, more pronounced than for the population as a whole, it was pointed out.

A positive factor is seen in the tax cut, which was expected by only 31 percent of the people as recently as November, and by 59 percent shortly before the passage of the tax bill.

"There remained in January a significant minority to whom the passage of the tax bill must have come as an agreeable surprise," the report said.

Intentions to buy automobiles were more frequent in the group which was counting on tax reduction than among other families.

Thus, it appears that the tax cut may generate new interest in car buying among people who in January had no active plans to buy, the report states.

By contrast, plans to buy durable household goods showed no consistent difference between those who did and did not expect a tax cut—"probably because the amount of advance deliberation associated with such purchase is much lower." In January 1964 plans to buy major appliances were about as frequent as a year ago.

The SRC economists cite three factors in the growing optimism about the business outlook, which is reflected in the index upturn:

1. There was in January more awareness of good news than has been characteristic of previous prolonged periods of prosperity.

2. Uncertainty following the assassination of Pres. Kennedy has now been dispelled. Two-thirds of people at every income level believe that the change in the presidency will have no effect on economic conditions; and some even feel it will have a favorable effect.

3. Opinions about the relation of the cold war to business conditions reflected the easing of international tensions.

"One discordant note must be added, however," the report continued. "The existence of unemployment in the midst of prosperity is generally recognized, and there seems to be some skepticism about our ability to deal with this problem."

Meany Tells Wall St.:

Enrichment of Rich Helps Communists

New York—A private enterprise economy "in which the rich keep getting richer is inviting a Communist takeover," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a Wall St. audience here.

The federation president addressed a luncheon meeting of the Bond Club of New York at the Bankers Club, devoting the major part of his speech to labor's activities in the international field.

He argued that development and assistance to trade unionism in Latin America "can help stop Castroism and strengthen free societies" in Latin America. Citing the formation of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, Meany pointed out that its 10 branches had already trained more than 3,600 trade union officials so that they could do a better job in Latin America.

He said:

"We are spending 23 percent of our income, $2.5 million from the AFL-CIO itself, outside the United States to help workers in every part of the world. We are doing this because of enlightened self-interest. We are interested in preserving a society where we can have trade unions."

In his opening remarks, Meany said that he had often been attacked by Moscow radio and the Soviet press as "an agent of Wall St." Looking out at his audience, comprising representatives of the biggest banking and brokerage houses in the country, he added with a grin:

"I guess I have the credentials to be here."

His address was in part a historical review of American labor's early and continuing interest in foreign affairs and its consistent rejection of isolationism. He pointed out that within only a few months after Adolf Hitler took power in Germany in January 1933, American labor had undertaken a boycott of German goods and established a "labor chest" to help trade union victims of the Nazi terror.

"We undertook this program," he said, "because we saw in Hitler and in Nazism a threat to the American way of life."

He then turned to the threat of communism and American labor's role in aiding European trade unionism to resist Communist subversion, particularly in France and Italy. Working with trade unions overseas, Meany said:

"We don't try to influence the character of these labor movements, we want to encourage the development of a free society, and we want these societies to remain free to make changes in the future. There may be instances where a mixture of government and private enterprise is desirable, but that's up to the people in those countries.

"The American labor movement is not interested in government ownership of the means of production. We know that no other system has produced more results for the little people than the American system."

LABOR ATTACHES and representatives from 16 countries attended the first of a planned series of meetings with union leaders at AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington to discuss federation policies on international affairs and related questions. Pres. George Meany spoke to the group at the day-long session and answered queries along with Dir. Jay Lovestone of the Dept. of Intl. Affairs, and members of the department's staff. Mrs. Maida Springer briefed the group on developments in Africa and Andrew C. McLellan discussed the Panama situation.

'Bare Bones' $3.4 Billion Sought From Congress for Foreign Aid

Pres. Johnson asked Congress for a "realistic" $3.4 billion foreign aid spending bill to "enlarge the strength of the Free World" and safeguard "the vital interests of the United States."

The Administration's asking figure—which in recent years has been cut by Congress—was described by Foreign Aid Dir. David E. Bell as a "bare bones" estimate which might have to be increased if world conditions worsen.

While Bell was testifying before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Sec. of State Dean Rusk told the House Banking Committee that the $3.4 billion figure would "clearly be inadequate" unless the House reconsidered its recent defeat of legislation authorizing an additional $312 million U.S. contribution to the Intl. Development Association.

Convention Hailed Program

The AFL-CIO, at its convention last November, hailed the past accomplishments of the foreign aid program and stressed that the need "has not diminished . . . in view of the continuing Communist threat."

The convention, which met at a time when the aid program was being slashed by Congress, warned that "without American assistance many countries will not be strong enough to resist Communist subversion and aggression or to continue successfully their fight against poverty, disease and ignorance."

Johnson's foreign aid request was $1.1 billion less than the amount requested last year by the Kennedy Administration. It is about $400 million more than Congress appropriated in new money and approximately the same amount that was actually available for spending this year, including carryover funds.

The President told Congress that the alternative to the foreign aid program, which takes "less than 4 cents out of every tax dollar," would be a much greater increase in the military budget, "which already takes more than 50 cents out of every tax dollar."

He pointed out that more than 80 percent of the foreign aid money will be spent in the United States. Of the funds requested, Johnson said, $2.4 billion would be used for economic assistance and $1 billion for military aid.

'Rock-Bottom Program'

House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Thomas E. Morgan said the Administration request was a "rock bottom" program and warned of the danger of cutting it. However, Rep. Otto E. Passman (D-La.), chief House critic of foreign aid and chairman of the powerful Appropriations subcommittee which handles the money bill, said he was certain there was "plenty of fat" which could be cut from the program.

Johnson and Bell asked Congress for authority to disregard civil service rules in cutting back the staff of the Agency for Intl. Development, which administers the aid program. The request came under sharp attack from the Government Employes local at AID.

Public Works Renewal Held Vital to Economy

The accelerated public works program has brought jobs, hope and lasting improvements to many communities and should be continued, the Communications Workers declared.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne said in a statement filed with the Senate Public Works Committee that a survey undertaken by the union shows the program has been an economic stimulus in "areas where there is a desperate need for work."

Urging a renewal of the federal program, now about to expire through lack of further funds, Beirne stressed that the recent tax cut cannot by itself create the millions of jobs needed to reduce unemployment, absorb new entrants into the labor force and make up for jobs which will be eliminated by automation.

"The tax cut must be supplemented by increasing federal outlays for public works . . . especially in those areas where the tax cut will have the least effect," he said.

The CWA statement noted that "public works projects are so diversified that nearly every craft and type of labor is utilized. . . . These newly employed workers increase the volume of business for retailers who deal with them; more jobs are created at retail stores, warehouses and in companies that produce consumer goods."

Beirne told the committee:

"The United States can afford tax reduction and increased public works expenditures. . . . The nation cannot afford the increasing waste and social danger of rising unemployment and inadequate public services for a growing population."

Banks Ouster Hit As Denial of Rights

Montreal, Que.—The ouster of Pres. Hal C. Banks of the Seafarers Intl. Union of Canada by government trustees has deprived him "of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice in determining his rights and obligations," SIU Pres. Paul Hall declared.

Banks' ouster by the three-man trusteeship came on the eve of his trial on a charge of conspiracy to commit assault. Minister of Labor Allan J. MacEachen said he was deposed "because his presence was not in the interests of the union itself, the shipping industry or the public generally."

The AFL-CIO strongly opposed the action last summer of the Canadian government in establishing the trusteeship, which affects five maritime unions in Canada.

High Court Upholds Delivery Gate Pickets

A union's right to picket a "neutral" plant entrance during a strike has been upheld by the Supreme Court in an 8 to 0 decision.

Justice Byron White, for the court, said that "we think Congress intended to preserve the right to picket during a strike a gate reserved for employes of neutral delivery men furnishing day-to-day service essential to the employer's regular operations."

The court's ruling overturned a lower court decision that the Steelworkers, in picketing a spur track of the New York Central Railroad leading to the Carrier Corp. plant at Syracuse, N. Y., in 1960, engaged in an illegal secondary boycott.

The court, with Justice Arthur J. Goldberg not participating, said that doctrine handed down in the General Electric case is "sound" and applies to the Carrier case. In the GE case the court held that the legality of picketing at gates not used by primary employes depends on the type of work being done by employes using the gate.

White commented that the lower court's holding of an illegal secondary boycott would mean that "no picketing at gates used only by employes of delivery men would be permitted" and that this was "expressly disapproved" by the Supreme Court in the GE case.

Bookbinder Named War on Poverty Aide

Hyman H. Bookbinder, a former legislative representative of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation, has been named executive assistant to Dir. R. Sargent Shriver of the Office of Economic Opportunity, the planning agency for Pres. Johnson's anti-poverty program.

Bookbinder resigned as director of the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation, which he had headed since shortly after its organization in November 1962. Previously he had been a special assistant to Sec. of Commerce Luther H. Hodges.

Housing Start Rate Up 19% Over Year

Housing starts in February were 5 percent under the January rate but 19 percent greater than in February 1963, with the drop over the month ranging up to 45 percent in the Northeast, Sec. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee pointed out.

Shishkin and Research Dir. Donald Danielson of the Carpenters have been appointed to the Bureau of the Census Advisory Committee on Research Statistics. The committee is composed of economists and statisticians of private firms concerned with building, housing and home financing, and advises the bureau on the need for construction statistics and the bureau's programs to obtain them.

Building starts in February were at an annual rate of 1.64 million units, compared with 1.72 million units in January and 1.38 million in February 1963, Shishkin reported to the Housing Committee. The number of building permits issued, he added, has increased and is an "encouraging sign" for the future.

Building Permits Up

"According to the Bureau of the Census," Shishkin advised members of the Housing Committee, "the 12,000 communities requiring building permits issued them at the seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.4 million in February, up from 1.31 million in January and from 1.22 million the year before.

"The biggest step-up was in the permit pace for single-family homes, up from the annual rate of 710,000 in January to 779,000 in February. The permit rate rose also for larger apartment projects—those of five or more families—registering an increase from 487,000 in January to 518,000 in February, at the seasonally adjusted annual rate."

AFL-CIO PROGRAM to strengthen democratic Latin American unions will be continued, Pres. George Meany (seated in center, speaking) told a meeting of U.S. ambassadors to countries in Central and South America.

'Tight Money' Labeled Potential Job Threat

The AFL-CIO warned Congress that the nation faces a "potential threat" to the job-creating impact of the tax cut by imposition of tight money and higher interest rates by the Federal Reserve System.

Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger told a House Banking subcommittee that the nation's monetary policy during the past decade has contributed to the high and persistent rate of unemployment, declaring:

"The effects of many years of tight money and high interest rates are with us and there is a danger of further tightening and lifting of rates this year."

He stressed that the Federal Reserve must become "a public system broadly representative of the American people and responsive to [their] needs and desires. . . ." Monetary policy, Goldfinger told the subcommittee, "must be geared with the nation's fiscal policy—to encourage economic expansion and creation of the millions of new job opportunities required to achieve and sustain full employment."

The Federal Reserve, he said, "has a power and a duty not only to create an elastic money supply but also to provide enough credit." It is responsible for the fact that "its lack of positive policies from 1953 to 1963 has left the U.S. in 1964 with high interest rates—for every type of paper—so that the cost of money is at high levels."

Time for Changes

The threat of tight money to negate the tax cut and the growth-inhibiting measures to deal with balance-of-payment difficulties make it "especially timely" to examine the need for changes in the 50-year-old FRS, Goldfinger said.

The AFL-CIO, he asserted, "has questioned and will continue to question the validity of pretending that classical free market competition applies to the money market," adding that "the federal government is not a mere participant but a dominant force in the money markets of the U.S." The major concern of a democratic society, the statement added, "is not the freedom of money or markets, but the freedom of men."

Turning to arguments that the nation is faced with potential inflation, Goldfinger noted that inflation that can be curbed by a tight money policy "usually does not exist when there is a 5 percent unemployment rate."

He cited the chronic FRS fear of inflation as "notorious," as contrasted with its "constant displeasure with, but no real fear of persistent high unemployment, which has continued in this country for over six years."

Goldfinger, citing previous AFL-CIO positions, urged a number of changes in the FRS including terms of the chairman and vice chairman to terminate with that of the President, a reduction in the present 14-year term for members of the board of governors and overlapping termination of terms, wider representation to include all groups in the nation including the trade union movement, formal relationships with other government departments including Treasury, Commerce, Labor, the Council of Economic Advisers and government credit agencies, and abolition of the Federal Open Market Committee with its functions transferred to the board of governors.

It should be a matter of public policy and the policy of the FRS, Goldfinger concluded, that "the cost of money should be low enough and the money supply sufficiently ample to achieve and sustain maximum production, employment and purchasing power."

Houston Press Sold, Closed; 320 Jobless

Houston, Tex.—The 320 employes of the Houston Press learned, by reading a front page story in the final edition of Mar. 20, that their paper had been sold to the Houston Chronicle.

Management notified all employes later that they will be given at least two weeks' severance and vacation pay. About 150 workers represented by the Newspaper Guild will get a week's severance pay for each six months of service to a maximum of 40 weeks, plus vacation pay and an eventual share in the Guild-management pension fund, which has accumulated about $82,000 since its establishment in 1961.

The management and the unions opened job placement offices.

The Press, founded in 1911, was a member of the Scripps-Howard chain and had, the publisher said, operated at a loss for several years. The sale left only three U.S. cities with more than two competing ownerships—New York, Boston and Washington.

Maritime Union Wins Army Ships Election

New York—The National Maritime Union has been advised of its recognition as exclusive bargaining agent for 300 crewmen on vessels of the Portland, Ore., Dist. of the Army Engineers on the basis of a 103-71 election victory over the National Association of Federal Employes.

More Help Promised Latin Labor

The AFL-CIO will continue its program "to strengthen the role of democratic trade unionists" in Latin America, Pres. George Meany told a gathering of high-ranking U.S. diplomats.

He addressed a meeting of U.S. ambassadors to Latin American nations at the invitation of Assistant Sec. of State Thomas C. Mann. He told the mission chiefs that the American Institute for Free Labor Development has had "excellent operational results" in assisting unions in developing nations.

The AFL-CIO's activities, Meany stressed are motivated both by the conviction that "there can be no free society without free and democratic labor movements" and by the "self-interest" of protecting freedom from "the direct threat of Communist subversion."

U.S. labor's interest in its neighbors to the South dates back several decades, Meany told the ambassadors. He expressed the hope that American diplomats will develop a fuller understanding of labor's objectives.

Union Rosters Show Rise In Canada

Ottawa, Ont.—Trade union membership rose in seven of Canada's 10 provinces in 1963, according to a study by the federal Labor Dept. which is reported in its monthly publication, the Labor Gazette.

Throughout Canada, union members increased to 1,449,200 from 1,414,800 the previous year. All industry classifications showed raises except transport and utilities, where membership dipped to 324,200 from 329,000 in 1962. Manufacturing showed an increase from 580,700 in 1962 to 585,500 last year, the report said.

The picture of union membership in the provinces showed:

Ontario, 553,000 union members, or 14,200 more than in 1962; Quebec, 360,200, an increase of 6,100; British Columbia, 188,600, a boost of 3,600 members; Alberta, 63,000, up from 60,400 the previous year; Saskatchewan, 43,400, an increase of 1,000; New Brunswick, 27,400, a rise of 1,400; Newfoundland, 20,300 or a boost of 3,600.

The declines were found in Manitoba with 62,400 unionists, a drop of 2,000 from 1962; Nova Scotia, 41,100, a decline of 1,200, and Prince Edward Island, 1,600 or 200 fewer.

Meany Tells Latin Unionists:

U.S. Freedom Linked To Liberty for All

American labor has a deep interest in the preservation of freedom in the Western Hemisphere because "freedom is not something you have just for yourself," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said at graduation exercises for 34 trade union students from 12 Latin American countries and the Canal Zone.

"Freedom in one nation is always dependent on what happens to people in other parts of the world," Meany told the students, members of the first advanced labor education course of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

"What we are trying to do is help the workers of Latin America help themselves and at the same time help their nations develop," said Meany, who is AIFLD president, at the graduation exercises in the AFL-CIO auditorium.

The struggle for freedom will continue, he told the graduates, because "it doesn't make any difference what kind of a dictatorship is established. They all have one thing in common—they must enslave the workers because to dictate you must control the means of production.

Progress for the People

"It is for this reason that we established the institute," he continued. "It is for this reason that we are cooperating with the Alliance for Progress," to see that the progress embodied in the alliance "flows to all the people in Latin America, and especially to the workers."

Meany declared that he knows "no better way to build up the standards of all the people in a country than through trade union organization."

AIFLD Executive Dir. Serafino Romualdi reported that the institute is now functioning in practically every Latin nation.

With the graduation, 215 men and women have been trained at the school in Washington. Institute programs in Latin America have trained more than 3,600 unionists.

Advanced Study Group

The students, representing a wide variety of production fields, come from Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, the Canal Zone, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Honduras, Peru, Paraguay and Uruguay. All came to Washington from local programs south of the U.S. border. Ten went to Israel, Italy, Germany and other countries to form the AIFLD's first international study group, then returned for graduation.

William M. Hickey, president of the United Corp. and an AIFLD trustee, was the graduation dinner speaker and AIFLD Sec.-Treas. Joseph A. Beirne, who is an AFL-CIO vice president and head of the Communications Workers, was toastmaster.

Guests included diplomatic representatives of Argentina, Costa Rica, Honduras; Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, federation Vice Pres. Joseph Keenan, and five industry representatives who serve on the institute board of trustees.

Besides Meany, graduation speakers included Mrs. Esther Peterson, assistant labor secretary, and Jose A. Bonilla Atiles, the Dominican Republic's ambassador to the U.S.

Union Rights Parley Held in British Guiana

Georgetown, Br. Guiana — The Postal Telegraph & Telephone Intl., trade secretariat associated with the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, held its 3rd international seminar on democracy and trade union rights here.

The participants came from the Caribbean islands of Antigua, Barbados, Bermuda, Dominica, Grenada, Jamaica, St. Kitts-Nevis, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and Trinidad, and from British Guiana and British Honduras.

Lecturers during the 11-day program included a number of graduates of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Others who served as instructors included Gen. Sec. Joseph H. Pollydore of the British Guiana Trade Union Council, Wallace J. Legge, PTTI inter-American representative, William Webb of the Communications Workers, and Gen. Sec. Vincente Rubiera Feito of the Cuban Telephone Workers Federation in Exile, who is now on the PTTI staff.

Betancourt at the time was still his country's chief executive. He has been succeeded by another democratically elected President, Raul Leoni.

Massive Program Urged:

U. S. Aid for College Students 'Most Prudent Investment'

College scholarships, students loans, loan guarantees and work-study opportunities are all needed "to open education's doors to those who now find them closed," the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Legislative Rep. Clinton Fair urged a Senate Education subcommittee to approve a four-part bill by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) which would help more than a million students finance their college education.

Fair, testifying for Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, praised the college aid bill passed by Congress last year but pointed out that "there yet remains the problem of providing aid for the students."

He told the subcommittee, headed by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), that the financial obstacles which keep many able young people from continuing their education beyond high school are "a matter of great national concern."

The Hartke bill, co-sponsored by 20 senators, would provide:

● Fifty thousand scholarships the first year—and 200,000 by the fourth year of the program—to be awarded by state commissions on a merit basis, with the amount geared to need, up to $1,000 a year. Colleges accepting scholarship students would be given an additional $350.

● A major expansion of the long-term, low-interest student loan program of the National Defense Education Act to help an estimated 600,000 needy students through loans of up to $1,500 a year for undergraduates and $2,500 for graduate students. The present $135 million a year NDEA authorization would be jumped to $200 million the first year and $250 million thereafter. Half the amount of the loan would continue to be forgiven for graduate who become teachers.

● A new program of federal insurance for private bank loans to college students, which would be available without the test of financial need applied to the direct federal loan program.

● A broad work-study program, on a larger scale than the Administration has proposed in its anti-poverty program, to provide up to 15 hours of work per week for an estimated 330,000 students. Colleges participating in the program would not be permitted to curtail existing student employment programs to take advantage of federal funds.

The AFL-CIO termed the bill "an intelligent, many-sided attack" on the problem of financial obstacles to college education, noting that no single feature of the measure would be adequate by itself.

The scholarship program, it said, would provide benefits "which would extend far beyond the 50,000 scholarship winners." It would "above all encourage many young people to hope for higher education" and "hold up a goal to students of high ability."

The AFL-CIO urged that the bill be amended to allocate the major portion of the scholarships on a congressional district basis rather than through state-by-state competition.

"Such a plan," the federation stressed, "would more widely distribute the scholarships, avoiding the tendency of concentrating them among a few of the best school districts."

Aid for Others

Fair emphasized that while scholarships will help students of exceptional ability, "we need also those students whose ability may not be so great . . . or whose elementary and secondary education may have been inadequate."

For these students, he said, the loan provisions of the bill will be especially helpful.

While the Administration has proposed a $72 million work-study program in its anti-poverty package, the AFL-CIO said the $250 million program in the Hartke bill was preferable because aid would go to a larger group of students than the children of low-income parents.

Labor is also concerned, Fair declared, about young people whose families are not in poverty but who nevertheless need this kind of aid.

"We are concerned, as well we should be, with the children of our own AFL-CIO members," he said. "Our members are not poverty-stricken, but most of them need a variety of aids to see their children through college."

While strongly supporting the Hartke bill, the AFL-CIO also urged Congress to approve:

● The "Cold War GI Education bill" introduced by Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) to give youngsters called into service educational opportunities after discharge comparable to those given veterans of World War II and the Korean war.

● Extension of free public education for at least two years beyond high school.

The United States "must no longer waste our human resources," the AFL-CIO told the subcommittee. Helping young people obtain a higher education, the federation said, "is the most prudent investment this nation can make."

Federal Union Aides Get Training in Instruction

Ann Arbor, Mich.—Seventy-six full-time union staff representatives completed a first-of-its-kind instructors' training course covering problems of collective bargaining and trade union education in the federal civil service.

The week-long program at the University of Michigan was sponsored by the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, the federation's Metal Trades Dept., and the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education. It was conducted with the cooperation of the labor education services of Michigan's state universities.

Teaching techniques and practice teaching were stressed in the course, which included four evening sessions as well as all-day classes. Most of the participants, representing nine unions with members employed by the federal government, will put their training to use later this year as leaders of programs for local union officers and shop stewards.

The faculty and guest speaker roster included Pres. B. A. Gritta of the Metal Trades Dept.; E. C. Hallbeck, chairman of the Government Employes Council and president of the Postal Clerks; AFL-CIO Assistant Education Dir. Otto Pragan; Dir. Hy Kornbluh of the University of Michigan and Wayne State University labor education division; Metal Trades Research Dir. Paul Hutchings; GEC Dir. John A. McCart; Michigan State Professors Russell Allen and Robert Repas, and New York University Prof. Sterling D. Spero.

The trainees included representatives of the Letter Carriers, Postal Clerks, Carpenters, Government Employes, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, Laborers and Operating Engineers.

Latin American Unions Shedding Red Influence

Free trade unions have been gaining ground in Latin America while Communist influence in the labor movement has been declining, the AFL-CIO's inter-American representative declared in a network radio interview.

Andrew McLellan of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs cited as an example the emergence of a new democratic labor leadership in Bolivia, which he said had been "isolated . . . for many, many years" from the hemisphere's free trade union movement.

A split in Bolivia's formerly "pro-Communist" labor federation opened the road to democratic unionism, McLellan said on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public affairs program heard on the Mutual Broadcasting System. He was interviewed by Tad Szulc of the New York Times and Ben Mayer of the Associated Press.

McLellan cited also the "slow disintegration" of the Ecuador labor confederation, which was "the only major affiliate" in Latin America of the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

Of particular significance, he said, was the recent demise of the hemispheric arm of the WFTU, which was headed for many years by Vincente Lombardo Toledano of Mexico. An attempt to set up a successor Latin American federation with Communist leanings was "still-born," McLellan said.

'Failed Miserably'

In fact, he added, every effort to create a pro-Communist "revolutionary" labor movement embracing Latin America has "failed miserably."

The AFL-CIO joined with its sister trade union federations in a successful drive to give democratic labor "a voice and full participation in the Alliance for Progress," McLellan noted.

He pointed also to AFL-CIO sponsorship of the American Institute for Free Labor Development to help train young democratic trade union leaders and to the establishment of a Social Projects Dept. within the AIFLD which has helped channel union funds into housing cooperatives as well as to provide technical assistance.

Commenting on a recent trip to Panama, McLellan said he found the democratic trade union movement there "desperately-anxious to see their government re-establish diplomatic relations" with the United States "without losing any face or prestige."

On the other hand, he reported, the situation in British Guiana is "deteriorating" because of the "campaign of intimidation" against free unions launched by the government of Cheddi Jagan. He said the Trade Union Congress in Guiana has filed complaints with the Intl. Labor Organization accusing the Jagan administration of reprisals against trade unions for an 80-day strike to block legislation putting the unions under government control.

CLC Protests Red Anti-Semitism

Ottawa, Ont.—The Executive Council of the Canadian Labor Congress has asked the Canadian government to "vigorously protest" at the United Nations and elsewhere "official Soviet anti-Semitism."

The council accused the Soviet government of engaging, over a long period, in "the most vicious form of discrimination against Jewish community life through the suppression of Jewish religious and cultural institutions," and of trying to load on the Jews the responsibility for failures in the country's economy.

In another resolution the council called on the government to take action that would permit Canadians of Indian, Eskimo and Metis extraction to share with their countrymen equality of opportunity and the chance "to live an abundant life."

Meany Urges Support For Crusade on Cancer

A call to members of AFL-CIO affiliates to enlist in the April Crusade Against Cancer has been issued by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Support of the labor movement has been extended for many years, he recalled, to efforts of the American Cancer Society "to educate the public about the life-saving value of early detection and prompt treatment of this disease."

"We hope that this year your message will reach the 90,000 Americans who, as matters now stand, will die of cancer simply because they did not see a doctor in time," Meany wrote former Gov. George M. Leader of Pennsylvania, 1964 crusade chairman.

"Our common goal is to enlist them in the ranks of the 1.2 million other Americans who have been cured of cancer and are alive and well today.

"Once again I am asking the 13.5 million AFL-CIO members to join in the traditional April campaign, known this year, by presidential proclamation, as 'Cancer Control Month.' I am sure the response to this educational and fund raising effort will be more generous than ever."

South Africa Withdraws From ILO

Capetown, S. A.—The government of South Africa has announced its withdrawal from the Intl. Labor Organization, where it had been under heavy fire for its "apartheid" policies.

"The time has come," Labor Minister Alfred E. Trollip told Parliament, "for South Africa to decide whether to retire of its own free will or allow itself to be forced out." He said the ILO "has lost much of its status."

The ILO is the sixth international organization South Africa has left. In December it quit the Food & Agriculture Organization—like the ILO, an agency of the United Nations—because of what it called "political victimization." At last year's ILO meeting African, Asian and Communist delegates staged walkouts in protest against South Africa's racial policies. South African delegates were barred from membership on key committees.

The ILO Governing Body, at a recent meeting in Geneva, approved two proposed amendments to the constitution for submission to the ILO conference in June, aimed at permitting disciplinary action against countries with racist policies, such as South Africa. One would permit the ILO to expel a member-state against which the UN had taken similar action. The other would allow barring from the conference a country which the UN has said "flagrantly and persistently" enacts racial discrimination by legislation.

Connecticut Locals Set Up COPE Unit

Berlin, Conn. — Representatives of eight directly affiliated AFL-CIO local unions, with a total of more than 5,000 members, set up a Committee for Political Education at a meeting here.

Senator Criticized:

Attack on Rights Bill Held Error-Studded

A widely circulated anti-civil rights speech by Sen. Lister Hill (D-Ala.) has been sharply criticized by the AFL-CIO as containing "serious inaccuracies" about the possible effects on labor unions.

In a letter to all state and central body affiliates, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller warned that Hill was unjustified in charges that the rights bill would "undermine . . . the seniority system," deprive unions of "representation rights" under basic labor laws and otherwise be a "blow to labor union freedom."

Basing his letter on a federation legal analysis of the civil rights bill and Hill's comments about it, Biemiller stated flatly that the AFL-CIO was seeking to "correct misunderstandings" that might arise and reaffirmed, AFL-CIO support of the rights bill as "morally right" and "in the truest sense in the best interests of all American workers."

Citing Hill as a "distinguished senator . . . often sympathetic toward the cause of labor," the federation said it was thus "all the more regretful" at his "error-studded" speech on the rights bill.

Errors Cited

The bill, the analysis declared, in regard to labor unions "simply would not do what Sen. Hill says it would." It added:

- It would not "undermine seniority systems" or interfere with "bargaining rights," but actually strengthen these systems and rights.
- It would not be "a blow to union freedom," but would merely impose on unions and on unionized employers "certain obligations" already imposed by existing law.
- It would not require that minority group workers including Negroes be "given preference in employment." The AFL-CIO "does not believe in righting ancient wrongs by perpetrating new ones," and the notion that the civil rights bill would require this is "utterly false."

The AFL-CIO analysis of Hill's charges spelled out its conviction that Hill was "misled" into erroneous interpretations because of his opposition to the rights bill, as such, and not because of what the bill provides.

The proposed legislation "would not alter" the obligations a union already has "to represent all employes fairly and impartially without regard to race or creed," it declares. Any employe claiming he is unfairly represented already can bring suit in federal court, and "any union practicing racial discrimination would be acting contrary" to basic AFL-CIO policy, stated in a 1963 convention resolution, "to establish a vigorous civil rights program of its own geared to banishment of every form" of racial or other discrimination.

Non-Union Firms Hit

The kind of employers who might be affected by the rights bill, it stated would be the "non-union employers" not covered by existing law or by obligations of unions under "freely adopted AFL-CIO policy."

The civil rights bill would, in addition, strengthen the union seniority system "by depriving non-union employers of the 'advantage' they now have . . . in being able to practice discrimination in employment policies without the risk of running afoul" the legal duties imposed on unionized employers and unions, the comment on Hills' speech continued.

"Of great practical importance," it said, is that "both organized and unorganized employers will be placed on an equal footing" in regard to discrimination, abolishing the "special incentive a segregationist employer [is now supplied] for keeping out a union."

The rights bill, the federation analysis declared, "does not give to any race the right of preferential treatment. It does not prevent an employer or a union from relying on genuine gradations in skill or experience or similar qualifications in deciding whom to hire or promote or refer to a job."

"It does not force a union to favor non-union men over union men. It lays down just one overriding rule regarding employment: starting one year after the bill is effective, unions and employers alike are forbidden to judge a man by the color of his skin, or the faith he professes."

In supporting the civil rights measure that Hill opposes, it continued, the AFL-CIO "does not believe that white workers who possess hard-earned seniority should be discriminated against in the future because Negroes were discriminated against in the past."

"The federation firmly believes" the rights bill "will take nothing from the American worker which he has already acquired, and it will keep from him nothing to which he has a just claim."

Wiser than Hill in regard to "organized labor's best interests" in the rights bill, it declared, was "the Texas delegate to the last AFL-CIO convention who said simply, 'We will take our stand with the Negro, with the Latin American, or 10 years hence we will not stand at all in our state, and I don't know about yours.' "

ACCELERATED PUBLIC WORKS program should be extended with a $2 billion appropriation to generate 400,000 jobs directly and as many more indirectly, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, center, testified before Senate Public Works Committee. Accompanying him were Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger, left, and Assistant Research Dir. Frank Fernbach.

Rights Bill Clears Two Hurdles, Renewed Filibuster to Hit Floor

said it would be a "hideous setback" to the progress of the bill to send it to the Judiciary Committee, headed by Mississippi Sen. James O. Eastland (D). Civil rights supporters noted that the Senate's Commerce and Labor committees had already held hearings on two key phases of the bill—public accommodations and fair employment practices.

With the initial issue out of the way, the Senate gave itself an abbreviated three-day Easter recess and scheduled the start of the long, grueling main bout for Mar. 30.

The 16 days of preliminary debate, most of it devoted to wide-ranging discussions of the bill's provisions rather than how to bring it before the Senate, gave a preview of the showdown battle still to come.

Although not a full-fledged filibuster—the preliminary vote could have been blocked for a longer period of time if the Southerners had made an all-out effort—the tactics provided a rehearsal for both sides.

A corporal's guard from each side carried the brunt of each day's debate. Speeches opposing the bill generally ran three to five hours with frequent interruptions—hardly more than a limbering up exercise for veterans of past filibusters. Consent was freely granted for senatorial excursions into unrelated issues.

Feeling Tense

Civil rights supporters were held within calling distance of the floor to answer occasional quorum calls, but on most rollcalls, nearly all Southerners themselves answered to their names.

Nevertheless the intensity of feelings on both sides occasionally rose to the surface in verbal slugging matches.

Meanwhile Pres. Johnson kept up a drumfire of pressure for passage of the bill, including a dramatic appeal to 150 Southern Baptist ministers meeting in Washington.

"Help us to pass this civil rights bill and establish a foundation upon which we can build a house of freedom where all men can dwell," he asked.

Noting that the denomination is strong throughout the South, the President declared:

"Your people are part of the power structure in many communities of our land. The leaders of states and cities and towns are in your congregations. . . . Their attitudes are confirmed or changed by the sermons you preach and by the lessons you write and by the examples you set."

Earlier he invited to the White House 150 social workers who had come to Washington to lobby for civil rights, and told them—as he had told two big union gatherings the same week—that passage of the rights bill is the first item on the Administration's legislative priority list.

He said Pres. Kennedy had given his life for a better social order and that the civil rights bill would be passed if it took all summer.

On the other side of the Capitol, the House took an Easter Week recess after leaders set Apr. 7 and 8 for votes on two hotly-debated bills.

Food Stamp Vote Set

The first vote will come on a modified version of the food stamp plan which is part of Pres. Johnson's anti-poverty legislative package. It would broaden the pilot program of discount sales of food stamps to needy persons who could then spend the stamps at face value to buy food at retail stores.

The second vote will come on a motion to accept unchanged a Senate-passed wheat control plan as an amendment to a previously approved House bill lowering the price of cotton for domestic textile mills.

The bill will be brought up—over Republican protests—under a rule which permits no amendments. Thus, if it is passed, it can go directly to the White House without having to wait for final action until the Senate disposes of the civil rights bill.

Two Proposals on California Ballot Stir Labor Interest in Campaign

Los Angeles—Union leaders in California are calling for an all-out political effort in both the June primary and the November general elections, with two ballot measures expected to add strong impetus to the campaign.

The California AFL-CIO said it expects the two issues to help generate almost as much labor political activity as the so-called "right-to-work" referendum battle did in the 1958 election.

That "work" measure was badly defeated and was credited with helping Democratic Gov. Edmund G. Brown, who fought it, sweep into office with the first Democratic State Assembly and Senate since the turn of the century.

One of the new issues is an initiative to override the existing Rumford Act and to prohibit the state government from ever again passing any law to prevent discrimination in the sale of real property.

The second is an initiative to repeal the full-crew law, which requires railroads to have a fireman on freight trains and as many brakemen as specified by the State Public Utilities Commission.

Railroad management has said it plans an initial campaign fund of about $500,000 to qualify the measure for the November ballot. Union leaders predict the railroads will spend millions more on what management will attempt to sell as an "anti-featherbedding" campaign.

State Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts and other union officials, with all leaders of the railroad brotherhoods, have already denounced the rail management's campaign and pledged a major battle to defeat it.

The emotionally-charged measure to kill the fair housing law, the Rumford Act, will also see millions spent by what the State AFL-CIO called the "forces of bigotry and confusion."

California is one of 10 states which have laws prohibiting discrimination because of race, religion, creed or color in the sale of real estate.

The law, which went into effect Sept. 20, 1963, is "un-American," according to the California Real Estate Association, the major force behind the initiative.

Realtors and white property owners should have the right to discriminate in the sale of their houses, the CREA said in a statement.

Labor, working with civil rights groups, plus nearly all Democratic Party leaders and many Republican Party leaders, have agreed that the CREA has accurately put the problem and will fight the campaign on the issue of whether it is truly "American" to be allowed to discriminate.

The fights to maintain California's full crew law and the fair-housing law should "bring out labor's forces in strength in the coming elections," Pitts predicted.

He called for a registrar of voters in every AFL-CIO local, door-to-door registration drives in worker precincts and in plants, and close cooperation between COPE groups and women's auxiliaries.

Overtime Called 'Paradox' by Carey

The time-and-one-half rate for overtime work was intended to spread employment and not as "a source of increased income for those employed," Pres. James B. Carey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers told a House Labor subcommittee.

Carey, urging passage of legislation requiring double pay for overtime hours, called the "spectacle of continued unemployment, coexisting with substantial overtime, one of the terrible paradoxes of our time."

He said it was also "imperative" that the basic workweek be reduced to 35 hours along with a higher overtime rate.

Kheel, Tuvim, to Get Union Label Awards

New York—The New York State Union Label & Service Trades Dept. for the first time will make a double presentation of its annual Union Label Award and will confer it on Theodore Kheel, prominent arbitrator, and Joseph Tuvim, manager of Ladies' Garment Workers Local 142.

The presentation will be made at the dinner May 19 during the department's annual convention, to be held in the Statler-Hilton Hotel. The convention will follow the 10th Empire State Labor-Management Exhibit.

Rights Bill Proponents Press Fight

By David L. Perlman

The Senate's bipartisan civil rights coalition took the offensive with a section-by-section exposition of the House-passed bill as formal debate began after three weeks of preliminary sparring.

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), Democratic floor leader for the rights bill, challenged the southern opponents to debate—not filibuster—the bill whose "simple purpose," he said, is "to extend to Negro Americans the same rights and the same opportunities that white Americans take for granted."

His Republican counterpart, California's Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel, joined in a call for "reasonable, rational, logical discussion," followed by a vote.

"A clear majority of senators, Democrats and Republicans alike, wish to make some progress in the field of equal treatment under law," he declared.

To this, Sen. Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.), leader of the Dixie bloc fighting the bill, replied: "The senator assumes, of course, that a majority is always right. That is the most violent and erroneous assumption that has ever been asserted."

Cut Off Rejected

Russell declined an offer by Humphrey to set a date for the close of debate—as late as June 1, the Minnesota senator offered. Southerners held the floor for three weeks before allowing the civil rights bill to be called up.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) told newsmen later that debate on the civil rights bill could last through both national party conventions this summer, while other bills "just pile up." The Republican convention opens July 13; the Democratic convention, Aug. 24.

Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) meanwhile served notice that he will offer amendments to two key sections of the bill—dealing with fair employment practices and public accommodations.

Dirksen did not spell out the details. He said his amendments to the employment section would not "water down" the bill but would avoid "harrassment" of businessmen. He has previously indicated a desire for a "voluntary" rather than mandatory public accommodations section.

While Dirksen said he found "substantial" support among Republicans for his proposals, Kuchel said he believed a majority of GOP senators would stand

Living Costs Dip Slightly In February

By Robert B. Cooney

The consumer's cost of living declined slightly in February—the first drop since December 1962, the Labor Dept. has reported.

The previously steady upward trend in prices is expected to resume with the March report, government experts said.

In a companion report, the Labor Dept. said the spendable weekly earnings—or take-home pay—of factory production workers rose by $1 in February due to a substantial increase in hours of work. Real earnings also increased.

The spendable earnings, when combined with the small drop in the cost of living, resulted in a 1 percent hike in "real" spendable earnings between January

Would 'Destroy' Bargaining:

Meany Says CED Revives 'Old Anti-Union Policies'

The Committee for Economic Development, once looked on as the "voice of enlightened management," has joined the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers in purveying "tired old anti-union polices," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

The CED, said Meany, voices "pious concern for the collective bargaining process" in its latest policy statement, but "what it recommends would in effect destroy that process." (Text of Meany reply to the CED appears on Page 7).

The CED which declares itself for the "preservation and strengthening of our free society," issued a 10-point program under the title "Union Powers and Union Functions" which contains recommendations for:

- Outlawing the union shop.
- Granting employers unlimited authority to use the lockout against unions.
- Eliminating the obligation of employers to bargain in good faith.
- Restoring federal injunctions in certain strikes.
- Increasing restrictions on secondary boycotts.

Noting that the CED began as a group of businessmen and industrialists "who accepted the proposition that collective bargaining is in the national interest and who acknowledged the need for strong unions," Meany commented that the CED "has steadily receded from this position in recent years."

He cited the publication of an idependent study in 1961 by the CED which stressed the importance of a strong, free trade union movement, "generally defended its structure," and warned against state "right-to-work" laws and other moves to weaken unions.

The 1964 CED statement, the AFL-CIO president said, is a "rebuttal to that document." Noting that the latest document uses "sophisticated language," Meany added:

"Union-busting is not made more palatable by a garnish of lofty sentiments."

The CED program, he continued, "is no less than an emasculation of the labor movement. It has thus burned what was once hopefully regarded as a bridge toward better understanding. We can only wonder how Paul G. Hoffman and the late Eric Johnston [founding members of the CED] would now regard their creation."

The CED statement was made public by Theodore O. Yntema, chairman of its Research & Policy committee and chairman of the finance committee of the Ford Motor Co., and William C. Stolk, chairman, American Can Co. and chairman of the CED subcommittee which prepared the document which declares that "the great enemy of free collective bargaining may turn out to be the excessive power of unions."

Meany, citing this sentence, notes that the statement offers six possible approaches which it says are worthy of "serious consideration." Five of the six he pointed out, "would break up national unions that bargain with competing employers."

On the CED call for an end to racial discrimination in unions, Meany replied that the AFL-CIO is "in full accord," but noted that the statement dismisses the role of employers in hiring policies. He added:

"As everyone knows, the effective

Says Pact Binds New Owners

By Eugene A. Kelly

The Supreme Court, in a landmark decision affecting the rights of union members under collective bargaining agreements, has ruled that a company which takes over the business of another firm must "in appropriate circumstances" carry out the terms of the absorbed firm's agreement with the union for arbitration.

Voting 8-0, with Justice Arthur J. Goldberg not participating, the court upheld a finding by the 2d U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in a suit to compel arbitration brought by Dist. 65, Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union, against John Wiley & Sons, Inc.

When Wiley bought Interscience Publishers, Inc., it refused to recognize Dist 65, whose collective bargaining agreement with Interscience still had four months to run. Wiley refused to arbitrate, as the contract provided, and the union filed suit on behalf of its 40 Interscience members.

The employer argued in three U.S. courts that the contract was automatically terminated by merger. The union asserted that federal policy is paramount and that transfer of ownership through purchase, merger or consolidation does not free an employer from his obligations under a contract held by the consolidated firm.

Justice John M. Harlan, voicing the opinion of the eight justices, said: "We hold that the disappearance by merger of a corporate employer" holding a contract with a union "does not automatically terminate all rights of the employes covered by the agreement."

"In appropriate circumstances, present here," he added, "the suc-

Oklahoma 'Right-to-Work' Proposal Assailed as 'Punitive' by Monroney

Oklahoma's senior U.S. senator has blasted a proposed "right-to-work" amendment to his state's constitution as both "punitive" and "unwise."

Sen. Mike Monroney (D) told his constituents that the proposed ban on union shop agreements would bring "strife" to replace Oklahoma's "outstanding" record of labor-management peace and would set back the state's economic progress.

In a sharp attack on sponsors of the petition campaign which forced the "work" issue on the May 5 primary ballot, Monroney said the major industries which have been attracted to the state and built new plants there do not want a "right-to-work" law.

"I will vote for our good record and against the so-called 'right-to-work' amendment, which I consider to be unfair, Monroney said.

"Oklahoma has one of the best reputations in the nation in the labor-management area."

He pointed out that under free collective bargaining, Oklahoma last year set an all-time record for economic prosperity and is now enjoying an industrial boom.

"Many major industries have located in Oklahoma in recent years," the senator declared.

"We are moving ahead fast. Thousands of new jobs are being created each year.

"I feel it is unwise to write into the Oklahoma constitution an amendment which could bring strife to the now pleasant relationship between labor and management in Oklahoma.

"The good record of our labor unions attracts industry. I do not feel we need punitive legislation."

Monroney noted that in 1962

Cost of Living Drops, Take-Home Pay Rises

and February. Over the year, worker purchasing power was up by 5 percent, partly because of the new tax cut.

Rebates on gas utility bills and lower gasoline prices were the main reasons for the decline of one-tenth of 1 percent in the Consumer Price Index, the Labor Dept. said. The cost of home gas service fell an average of 3.5 percent for the nation, with substantial refunds to customers, especially on the West Coast and also a rate cut for New York City, it noted.

Arnold Chase, assistant commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, explained that the gas utility rebates resulted from a U.S. Supreme Court decision last May which affirmed the authority of the Federal Power Commission to regulate rates charged by gas producers. The lower costs to retailers are now being passed on in lower rates for consumers.

Price wars in Los Angeles and Detroit lowered gasoline prices and used car prices also dropped.

These declines offset the continued rise in prices for food, rent, home ownership and such services as doctor bills and hospital room rates.

The February CPI, at 107.6, stands 1.4 percent higher than a year ago. The February index means the market basket of goods and services which cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period now costs $10.76. In January it cost $10.77.

Rise Seen in March

Chase told a press conference he expected generally higher prices would bring a rise in the March CPI.

Some 100,000 workers will receive cost-of-living hikes of 1 cent an hour because of union contracts with escalator clauses tied to the February index. About 85,000 are in aerospace and 6,000 in chemical industries. A city index will bring a 1-cent increase for 2,600 public transit workers in Washington, D.C. and a 1-cent cut for 4,000 food processing workers in Detroit.

The February CPI of 107.6 is based on a new index introduced in January which reflects changing buying patterns. It puts less emphasis on food items and more on housing, transportation, health and recreation. It also covers for the first time single workers living alone as well as family groups.

Chase suggested this would be a good time for unions and management to switch their contract escalator clauses to the new index since both it and the old index are identical for February. The old index eventually will be dropped.

The February gains in spendable earnings, the report said, resulted from a recovery of the workweek from the effects of severe weather in January. Usually, there is little change this time of year, it added.

Spendable earnings—gross pay minus social security and federal income taxes—rose by $1.03 to $90.68 for a single worker with three dependents and by 99 cents to $82.97 for a single worker, the report said.

At Record Highs

In both cases, the spendable earnings—which reflect the income tax cut—are at record highs, the report said.

Compared to a year ago, the spendable earnings of the worker with three dependents are $5 higher—a gain of 6 percent. Before the tax cut, the report added, spendable earnings were running about 3 percent higher than the year before.

Husband and Wife Presidents of Locals

Sudbury, Ont.—What the labor movement needs is more families like the Moores of Sudbury.

Bert Moore is president of General Workers Local 101, directly chartered by the Canadian Labor Congress, while his wife, Sylvia, is president of Local 148 of the Canadian Union of Public Employes, which covers employes of a home for the elderly. Both also are active in the labor-backed Nickel Belt New Democratic Association.

NLRB Examiner Rules:

Firm's Anti-Negro Poster Held Bar to Fair Election

A propaganda poster connecting the late Pres. Kennedy with a racial theme, hung in a Mississippi clothing plant four days before a scheduled National Labor Relations Board election, interfered with the rights of employes to an uncoerced election choice, an NLRB trial examiner has ruled.

Examiner Thomas S. Wilson, in one of three cases with racial overtones to reach the NLRB hearing stage, found that the poster and other employer actions implied a threat to white employes of Durant Sportswear, Inc., of either "loss of their job tenure" or working conditions "more onerous or less pleasant." The poster was put up by a "bundle boy" and management "permitted or acquiesced" in its display, he ruled.

The poster was hung in the plant last Aug. 9 and stayed up for at least a day. It showed a Negro woman saying to a white woman, "Mr. Kennedy and the union man says we'uns must work with you'uns."

The examiner noted that the "free speech" provision of the Taft-Hartley Act permits an employer to express his views, argument or opinion without threats or promises of benefit. The provision "does not, and was never intended by Congress to, convert an NLRB representation election into a contest between the employer and the union" to the extent of antiunion demonstrations in the plant during working hours, Wilson said.

The law, said Wilson, requires that the employer maintain "strict neutrality" between the actual contending factions, The employer in his Durant, Miss., plant had been involved in two previous unfair labor practice charges, the examiner observed.

Beyond 'Mere Notification'

On this issue of whether the Kennedy poster itself infringed the law, the examiner said "it goes beyond mere notification that the union [the Clothing Workers] favored integration and the employment of Negroes." Otherwise, he asked, "Why is reference made to Pres. Kennedy? What did he have to do with the union representation election?"

The report suggested that Kennedy was mentioned "to recall to the employes recent events relating to integration at Oxford, Miss.," at the state university about 100 miles away.

A "reasonable man," the examiner concluded, would "reasonably understand" the poster to mean that the union would "request or require . . . management to abandon its previous policy of hiring whites only and to commence hiring colored personnel."

Wilson recommended that the employer stop permitting antiunion posters in its plant, stop discouraging activities on behalf of the Clothing Workers or interfering with its employes, and reinstate Ann Otts, union supporter who was fired during the election campaign, and reimburse her for pay losses.

Goodyear Complaint Dismissed

Trial Examiner Ivar H. Peterson, former board member, in a separate case, recommended dismissal of a complaint by eight Negro employes of the Goodyear Tire plant at East Gadsden, Ala., that Rubber Workers Local 12 refused to prosecute grievances relating to segregated rest rooms. He said the law does not require a union to negotiate affirmatively for integrated toilets, showers, lunchrooms and sports facilities, as the complainants urged.

Peterson found also that the union did not refuse to bargain, as the workers charged, on backpay for a layoff period. Before the charges were filed, a seniority system maintaining jobs on a white male, Negro male and female basis was abandoned by management, the examiner said.

In a third case, Examiner David London recommended that Auto Workers Local 453 and the Maremont Corp., Chicago, be ordered to cease discriminating against six white employes. The primarily Negro leadership of the local's Maremont unit caused management to reduce their departmental seniority, London said, because they resented a so-called "lily white" department in which the white members worked. He urged that seniority ranging from 15 to 21 years be restored to the six workers.

New Bargaining Unit Established by IUD

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has established a new collective bargaining services section as part of a program of internal reorganization designed to carry out directives of the 5th IUD convention last November.

Heading the new section, with a professional and technical staff of six, will be Richard T. Leonard, formerly assistant to IUD Pres. Walter P. Reuther.

Leonard Lesser, previously director of the IUD social security section, becomes assistant to the department president and will continue to coordinate policy in the field of social security.

IUD Executive Dir. Jack Conway, in announcing the reorganization, said the expanded collective bargaining section will strive for maximum unity and coordination among affiliates dealing with the same multi-plant employer or in the same section of an industry and provide direct services to individual unions.

The department now has about 25 committees composed of unions which negotiate with common multi-plant employers and, the announcement said, the reorganization is "due in part to increasing demands for service" from these committees.

"We are satisfied that this reorganization will result in more effective services to our affiliates," Conway said. "Our objective is to be a service center of value to the unions that comprise the IUD."

New Approach

The 1963 IUD convention called for development of new bargaining approaches and techniques as "a major task" confronting the department. The delegates said that corporate mergers and stock swaps, new products and materials, and other aspects of a rapidly changing technology "serve to blur old distinctions" in industry and have tended to make traditional collective bargaining techniques "inadequate" to present needs.

As part of the department's reorganization, all collective bargaining activity now performed by the IUD research section will be shifted to the new collective bargaining section. The research section, under Dir. Everett Kassalow, will concentrate on economic studies, legislative research, and supporting data for other nonbargaining functions.

Named assistant director of the new bargaining section under Leonard was Stephen J. Harris, IUD pension and welfare expert. Other staff members in the section are Charles Hall, industrial engineer; Roy Ockert, labor economist, and Don Doherty, formerly on the Chemical Workers staff. They will be assisted by Mrs. Mildred Joiner and Mrs. Gheretein Wilson, research technicians.

The reorganization also calls for elimination of the IUD education section, with the research section taking over educational activity for the present. The announcement said there will be no change in assignments or activities involving IUD organizing, legislative efforts, state and local councils, or publications and public relations.

EDUCATION CONFERENCE at Allentown, Pa., brought together 80 local union leaders who have been studying under the auspices of the Union Leadership Academy at four universities—Cornell, Rutgers, Pennsylvania State and West Virginia. Among the speakers were, from the left, Al Loewenthal of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers Dist. 3; Herb Levine, director of the Rutgers labor program; Alice H. Cook of the Institute of Labor & Management Affairs, Cornell; Mark Brown of Pennsylvania State; Assistant AFL-CIO Education Dir. George Guernsey; Carl Schlesinger of Typographical Local 6, New York City.

National Symphony Out:

Mediator Offers Aid In Orchestra Strike

The Federal Mediation Service has intervened in a strike by National Symphony Orchestra Musicians over firings and demotions the union charged amount to a "purge" of orchestra members active in last year's contract dispute.

Both the symphony association, which controls the Washington, D. C., orchestra, and Musicians Local 161 accepted a proposal by Federal Mediator James A. Holden to attempt to work out a solution to the strike and keep the concert season alive for its remaining seven weeks.

The entrance of the Mediation Service occurred as support for the Washington orchestra members mounted across the country.

Two concerts by the Boston Symphony, scheduled for Constitution Hall under National Symphony auspices, were cancelled when the Boston musicians voted not to cross picket lines.

Members of the Philadelphia Orchestra sent financial aid to the Washington musicians and petitioned their local to deny National Symphony Conductor Howard Mitchell the privilege of conducting within its jurisdiction.

The Philadelphia musicians also called on the Intl. Conference of Symphony & Opera Musicians to seek similar supporting actions from other member orchestras.

The dispute was sparked by dismissal of the first trombonist and the third trumpeter, both of whom the union says had been active in supporting the orchestra members' position during last fall's negotiations, which led to a brief strike over salaries and length of season.

Noting that the first trombonist had won his seat in promotions during four years with the orchestra, and only six months before had drawn Mitchell's enthusiastic praise, Local 161 concluded that the dismissals must be viewed as reprisals for union activity.

While the local sought a settlement of the dispute under the contract, a probationary member of the trombone section was dismissed and a member of the first violin section who last season had headed the Musician's Committee of the orchestra was demoted.

Then followed three more dismissals, including the co-principal bass who had been active in preparations for last fall's negotiations, and notices to eight other orchestra members that their probationary periods were being extended or that they would have to re-audition for their jobs.

Robert Rogers, orchestra manager, denied that any reprisals were involved in the firings and demotions, but a spokesman for Local 161, Sec. J. Martin Emerson, asserted that at least five of the cases clearly involved retaliation and raised "serious doubts" over the other 10.

The local has put forth two key demands:

- Maintenance of the status quo on all seatings and dismissals for one year to allow time to reexamine pertinent contract clauses.
- Formation of a committee, to include the conductor and a number of musicians elected by their colleagues, to control hiring, firing and seating under a system similar to that used by top European orchestras and such American orchestras as the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

A statement by the local said that the strike was called—with 64 of the 79 members favoring the walkout—when "all remonstrances to the symphony association proved ineffectual."

The statement emphasized the importance of seating in the dispute, since the prestige involved has a major effect on outside work and off-season earnings to supplement symphony salaries. In last fall's strike, orchestra members won a minimum wage of $147.50 a week and a guarantee of 34 week seasons for the next two years. Further pay raises were won for 1964 and 1965.

CAB DRIVERS of Washington, D. C., recently organized into Local 814 of the Machinists, demonstrate outside the District of Columbia building as hearings opened on proposed revisions of local taxi zone rates and regulations. Leading this group of drivers and their supporters was Poncie Ponce, who plays one of television's most celebrated cab drivers, "Kim," on the Hawaiian Eye program. He has been named an honorary member of Local 814.

Organizers' License Fee Law Dropped

Osceola, Ark.—The Osceola City Council has repealed an ordinance enacted in 1957 setting a $1,000-a-day license fee for union organizers.

The city's governing body acted to kill the ordinance just two weeks before a suit attacking its constitutionality was due for trial in U.S. District Court at Jonesboro. Because repeal made the question moot, Judge Gordon Young dismissed the suit with costs assessed against the defendants—the city and a number of its officials and the county sheriff.

The lawsuit was filed last Apr. 23 during an organizing campaign by the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers among employes of the American Greetings Corp. here. Judge Young had set trial for Mar. 17 after denying motion by the Osceola officials to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the federal court did not have jurisidiction.

'Muzzling' Doomed

James E. Youngdahl of Little Rock, who represented the union impling suit, the State AFL-CIO and a number of individual labor officials in the suit, expresed "great satisfaction" over repeal of the ordinance.

"When this result is added to the repeal or invalidation of similar ordinances in Star City and Truman in recent months," he said, "it is evident that Arkansas municipalities are now recognizing that attempts to muzzle free speech are doomed to failure under the great American constitutional guarantees."

Chicago Teachers Ask Single-Agent Election

Chicago—The Chicago Teachers Union at a Chicago Board of Education meeting set for Apr. 8 will renew its request that 21,000 teaching employes be permitted to choose one exclusive bargaining representative in a systemwide election.

Pres. John M. Fewkes of Teachers Local 1 said the board at its Mar. 25 meeting postponed action on the union's request. The next day Supt. Benjamin C. Willis, directed by the board to meet with the union, walked out of a meeting with a union committee and sent back a note suggesting the committee meet with three of his assistants.

This the committee declined to do, saying it preferred to wait for Willis. Fewkes said members were "disturbed and disappointed" by the superintendent's actions following an announced decision of the board to recognize two or more groups as teacher bargaining agents—the union, the Chicago branch of the Illinois Education Association, and possibly others.

"Recognition of two or more teacher organizations as collective bargaining agents in the same jurisdiction can result only in a confused, chaotic and most probably an illegal situation," Fewkes said in a letter to Board Pres. Clair M. Roddewig. "The board must adopt rules which are uniform for all employes in a classification."

The union letter exhorted the board to "reject its paternalistic pattern of dealing with its professional staff of educators" and to grant speedily "democratic self-determination in the form of a secret election."

If the board is interested "in recruiting and retaining . . . qualified teachers to man every classroom," it should hold an election to determine one bargaining agent, the union asserted.

75-Cent Package Won At Canadian Iron Mine

Adams, Ont.—A package increase of at least 75 cents an hour over two years is provided in a new contract between the Steelworkers and the Adams Mine of the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp. that may change the labor relations pattern throughout Northern Ontario's Kirkland Lake mining area.

The agreement raised the basic wage rate from $1.40 to $1.83 in the first year and to $1.895 in the second, and in addition introduced to Canada a system of job classifications with a 6-cent differential between categories which will be worked out through a cooperative wage study.

The contract in addition cut hours from Kirkland Lake's standard of 44 a week to 40 a week and provided that all workers must pay dues to the union by checkoff. Gold mines in the area have resisted any form of dues checkoff.

The pay raise, according to the union, will yield an average wage rate estimated at $2.31 an hour during the first year of the contract. The new basic rate is 41 cents higher than the labor rate at the best-paying gold mine in the Kirkland Lake area, and 25 cents above the highest base rate in Kirkland Lake-Cobalt silver mining.

The agreement affects only 65 workers at present, but their number is expected to increase to 400 by October. The mining operation, the newest in Ontario, consists of an open pit operation and pelletizing of the ore.

Other highlights of the pact include two weeks vacation after three years; seven statutory holidays this year and eight in 1965; shift premiums of 7 and 9 cents and a Sunday premium of 15 cents an hour, and a jointly-financed welfare program.

Internal Disputes Plan 'Working Just Fine'

Rochester, N. Y.—The AFL-CIO Internal Disputes Plan "is working just fine," David L. Cole, impartial umpire under the plan, said in an interview here.

Cole also said the AFL-CIO is justified in working for the statutory 35-hour week because in many major industries automation is killing more jobs than it is creating. The AFL-CIO stand is sound, he added, despite arguments that the 35-hour week might impair the country's ability to compete in international markets.

Clerks Hit Jersey Milk-Date Repeal

Newark, N. J.—A bill in the New Jersey Assembly repealing the requirement that fresh milk be dated was condemned as dangerous to the health and economy of the state's residents by Pres. William A. McLaughlin of Retail Clerks Local 1262.

"The proper dating of cartons or bottles of milk is the only means by which the consumer can be assured of the freshness of so vital a product," he said. "Rather than repeal this law we should see that it is enforced more rigidly."

McLaughlin said repeal would make it possible to cut deliveries, thus eliminating jobs of dairy clerks and drivers. Stores could get three or four days' supply at a time, he said, "and no matter how carefully it is rotated some consumers will not be getting fresh milk."

FEC's Chairman Hit By Labor Dept. Aide

Assistant Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds told a nationwide television audience that government efforts to mediate the 14-month-old Florida East Coast Railway strike have been "thwarted" by Edward Ball, board chairman of the railroad.

Reynolds, with other central figures in the dispute, appeared on the National Educational Television's public affairs program, At Issue.

He recounted Ball's insistence on tape-recording mediation and negotiation sessions and commented that "any person with any experience in the field of labor-management relations knows full well that the presence of either a court reporter or a recording device completely enervates the bargaining process, and you create a climate in which the parties are more concerned with making a record than they are with making progress."

Reynolds noted that the unions involved had agreed to the government's suggestion that the dispute be arbitrated but "unfortunately . . . the railroad management—and when I say the railroad management, I mean Edward Ball—declined."

Another neutral party in the dispute, A. H. Raskin, a member of the New York Times editorial board and a veteran labor reporter, warned:

"If Edward Ball could smash the unions on the Florida East Coast Railway, he will have put a time bomb under the entire structure of labor-management stability on the nation's railroads."

NLRB Aide, 70, Wins Retirement Waiver

Charles W. Whittemore, a small, slender man with an enormous capacity for work, is staying on the job as a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner despite the fact that he has reached the normal compulsory retirement age of 70.

NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch said Whittemore was granted a one-year exemption by the U. S. Civil Service Commission in recognition of his outstanding record of productivity. In the last 3½ years he has averaged 40 unfair labor practice cases annually, taking testimony and preparing decisions, and in addition has handled up to 20 cases settled during hearings or after them.

The Critical Primaries

IN THE NEXT 60 days the shape and the general tone and content of the 1964 elections will be determined in two key areas—the record built by Congress and the numerous primary elections to select candidates for the November voting.

The legislative effectiveness of the 88th Congress will loom importantly in the presidential and congressional elections this fall, especially the 1964 session. The fate of the civil rights bill, hospital care for the aged under social security, the war on poverty and many other critical issues will define the election issues for millions of voters.

But of equal concern is the current campaigning for party nominations for Senate and House seats, for gubernatorial and state house offices, in the primary contests. The tone of the general elections campaign, the nature of the candidates, are determined in these primaries, which unfortunately too often are paid relatively slighting attention by the majority of voters.

If the issues are to be joined in the fall, it is critically important that voters in each of the major parties participate fully in the choice of candidates.

VOTER PARTICIPATION in the primary is hampered by a number of things: the time lag between April or May party choices and a final decision in November; the lack of a final record on congressional issues; a general apathy and an inclination to allow the year-round political leaders to choose the candidates. But perhaps the most important barrier is the ineligibility of millions of voters who are not registered.

In the adjoining column, the report of the President's Commission on Registration & Voting Participation summarizes the psychological and legal barriers to widespread registration and voting, making the point that "in some states it is easier to get a hunting or fishing license or a pistol permit than to register and vote."

The psychological causes of a low voter turnout must be attacked by educational programs to overcome the apathy, unconcern and indifference and the still prevailing mythology that "one vote doesn't make any difference."

The legal barriers are complex. Many elections laws and administrative practices are unreasonable, unfair an outmoded. They obstruct the path to the ballot box and the registration list disfranchising millions of Americans who want to participate in the electoral decisions.

WHILE CHANGES in election and registration laws and procedures can be pressed, the major effort must still come from those public interest groups concerned with the nation's problems and their solution.

Organized labor has mounted a register-and-vote campaign of significant importance, a campaign being waged in every precinct in the nation. In the next 60 days this campaign will be in high gear, seeking out the unregistered and aiding them to become eligible voters.

As AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany recently pointed out, a 10 percent increase in voter registration by union members and their families can spell the difference between domination of the next Congress by the conservative coalition or an increase in liberal voices dedicated to moving the nation forward.

New Approaches Needed:

Psychological, Legal Barriers Block Higher Voter Turnout

The following is excerpted from the report of the President's Commission on Registration & Voting Participation, stressing the psychological and legal reasons for low voter participation in American elections.

BY FAR the most important psychological factor affecting an individual's decision to vote is his identification with a political party. A strong Democrat or Republican is much more likely to cast a ballot than a person who feels little or no allegiance to a party. When an election is expected to be close, the strong partisan is even more inclined to vote.

Of course, this is not to say that all or even most nonpartisan or independent voters have poor voting records, but the voter who identifies himself with a party seems to be more regular in his balloting. Beyond party commitment, a person is likely to vote if he has a personal interest in the candidate, campaign, or issues; if he becomes concerned about the outcome of an election; or if he feels that his vote will be fairly counted and may really make a difference.

Taken together, these variables add up to the elector's sense of political involvement. Studies of recent presidential elections show that persons whose involvement was low were less likely to vote.

Characteristics such as education, age, and sex also relate closely to voter involvement and participation. The more formal educational experience a person has had, the more likely he is to be politically involved, to feel that his vote counts, and to vote. Our research also shows that voter participation tends to increase with age until the late fifties. Young people not only vote less than older persons but are less strongly allied with political parties.

In addition, young people move most frequently, As a consequence, precisely those persons least involved in politics often must overcome an added obstacle to voting. The older person is more highly motivated to vote and less likely to have to go through the process of registration. The younger person is less involved in politics to start with, he moves more often, and he must expend more time and effort to stay on the registration books.

Voter participation among women is approximately 10 percent lower than among men. Since women are a significantly larger element in our adult population than men, their lower participation tends to reduce the national average.

Restrictive legal and administrative procedures for registration and voting are a major reason for low participation. Many election laws and administrative practices are unreasonable, unfair, and outmoded.

The exercise of the franchise usually requires two deliberate acts on two different days: registration and voting. The finest voting system in the world is of no avail if registration inhibits participation. Registration procedures often require a visit to the county courthouse, with such attendant inconveniences as making the trip during working hours and standing in long lines. Although the majority of states provides permanent registration, only half enable voters to register in their precincts rather than at one county office. Only 17 states allow registration by mail.

IN TOO MANY states, registration closes more than a month before the election, when political campaigns are not in full swing and peak interest has not been achieved. Early closing dates coupled with the inconvenience of many registration procedures discourage potential voters.

Residence qualifications serve two principal purposes: allowing the voter to become acquainted with local problems and candidates, and preventing election fraud. Yet they also prevent many citizens from voting in presidential elections. Some states have attempted to meet this problem; 15 now permit presidential voting by new residents and seven allow former residents to vote for President. Similarly, some states permit intercounty and inter-precinct movers to vote by absentee ballot in the precinct where they formerly voted.

Yet such modernization has been slow and has not kept pace with our high rate of population mobility.

Absentee voting laws also disfranchise many potential voters. In 16 states, more than mere absence is required for absentee voting, with the result that businessmen, students, vacationers, and handicapped and incapacitated persons often cannot vote. Three states do not even provide for civilian absentee balloting of any kind.

Many Election Day procedures also discourage citizens from voting. Polling places in many areas close in late afternoon or early evening, and potential voters who are not allowed time off from work to vote must rush to the polls during the time of heaviest voting. The early closing hours dissuade many from making the effort. Polling places are sometimes relatively inaccessible to voters. Overpopulated precincts cause long lines which may turn away potential voters.

Morgan Says:

The Strong Juices of Protest Circulate Anew in Rights Fight

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

LIKE SAP RISING from the tree-roots in springtime, the strong juices of protest are circulating anew on behalf of the civil rights movement and a fresh round of demonstrations has begun.

The process is bound to yield more bitter fruit before the year is out but what the nation at large is coming only very slowly, even reluctantly, to understand is that the insistence on equality of opportunity for minority groups is not a transitory thing. It is part of our universe now, like the sun and the moon and the tide and the seasons. There is brightness and shadow to it, it may ebb and flow, it may alter course somewhat as it is buffeted or welcomed by public opinion, but it is there and it will remain.

Morgan

There have been negative aspects to this force and there will be more. The recent rush hour sit-down on New York City's Tri-Borough Bridge to "dramatize" the de facto segregation of New York public schools was utter folly. It created a king-sized traffic jam which couldn't have created anything else but ill will.

This negative, frustrated approach, will probably continue in direct proportion to the delays in righting the wrongs of enforced second-class citizenship which have been accumulating for a century. But against that intolerably long background of denial, it is astonishing to note that most of the fight for civil rights has had a positive approach.

The battles began in the courts and even when obstructions to justice forced them into the streets, the demonstrators were remarkably peaceful. Violence came from the other side; often, ironically enough, from the minions of law and order, so-called, themselves. Last year's majestic march on Washington disappointed the racists because there was not a single incident to disturb the dignity of the marchers' demands for equal rights.

Subdued in part by an unseasonal snowstorm, there was [recently] a march on Washington's sister city, Baltimore. Slowly, painfully, this traditionally southern city and the border state of Maryland are coming 'round to enforce constitutional rights regardless of race. But the job still to be done is appallingly large.

SOMETIMES a national problem can best be seen—and sometimes most effectively treated—in fragments. There are plenty of fragments in East Baltimore, in the tenements crowding back from the harbor. At 1520 East Monument Street, not far from Johns Hopkins University, there is a neat black and white sign over a basement entrance which reads "BAYOU".

The neighborhood abounds with honkytonks but this is not one of them. BAYOU stands for Baltimore Area Youth Opportunities, Unlimited.

BAYOU is Baltimore headquarters for NSM, the Northern Student Movement, and on Saturday nights it is a social center where neighborhood teen-agers come for coffee and coke, some phonograph music ranging from Handel's Messiah to rock-and-roll, maybe a game of checkers, and talk. This is only one activity of NSM, whose members from several eastern seaboard colleges and universities are committed to the civil rights movement but they seem to be as interested in quiet deeds as public demonstrations.

Last summer NSM started a special project in Baltimore, a tutoring service for Negro teen-agers. It is a fragile but fascinating experiment. St. James Catholic Church donated classroom space and, nightly, girls from Goucher College and male students from Johns Hopkins donate their time helping Negro boys and girls over the jumps in algebra, science and language. If the student has no textbooks, the tutor gets one —often paying for it personally.

There are, of course, no dropouts. At the moment there are more volunteer tutors than takers. But with interesting frequency, there is a migration from the classes to the Bayou's Saturday nights, and vice versa.

One of the volunteer mop brigade which house-cleaned the BAYOU office for its opening was Terry Rogers, blond daughter of a Philadelphia businessman and now a junior at Goucher. On the way to work she spotted a store selling pot-bellied stoves. She thought they were charming. Then it dawned on her that this was not an antique shop. The stoves were all the heating some people on Monument Street could afford. She hadn't realized, she recalled later, the great gulf between the value of the haves and the have-nots. Terry and countless college contemporaries around the country on such volunteer assignments are helping to close the race gap.

New 'Marketbasket':

Revised CPI Reveals Living Habits Today

WOMEN'S NIGHTGOWNS aren't as important as they once were in the cost-of-living. Nor are men's pajamas. Nor a lemon. Nor an appendectomy.

That doesn't mean, Labor Dept. statisticians hastily point out, that men and women are more inclined to sleep in the raw than they ever were. Or that lemons and appendectomies are unimportant to those who have to have them.

The Dept. of Labor has just launched its new "basket" of things that the American people buy. This "basket" and its cost form the basis for the highly important Consumer Price Index which is published once a month. The old one had some 325 items whose cost was carefully computed. The new one has 400 items.

In the 10 years between 1950 and 1960, when the last census was made and the new price index "basket" was drawn, there has been a great change in the buying habits of the American people. There has also been a change in the relative importance of various goods and services that we buy. And there has come historical and statistical proof of how our society has become richer and richer for most of us.

JANUARY 1964 MARKED the first month during which the Bureau of Labor Statistics put together its revised Consumer Price Index. The new series contains items that were relatively unimportant in 1950, but have now assumed new importance. They give a strong clue to the changes in American life that have taken place in the intervening years.

In the 1950 index, for example, a sewing machine was an important family purchase because so many women did their own sewing. Today it is not as important in the family budget. Instead, the new items that have become important—reflecting the higher level of living for most of us—include the cost of between-meal snacks; hotel and motel rooms when we travel, demountable air conditioners to make the summer more comfortable, taxicabs instead of trolley fares, outboard motors for our fishing boats instead of oars, golf course fees instead of a Sunday walk in the park, college tuition and textbooks, music lessons, legal services and ever more costly funeral services.

This doesn't mean that the old items, some of which have been dropped, are less important in themselves than they ever were or that the new items are more important in their individual cases. But the new "market basket" reflects on a broad basis what we actually buy today and the prices we pay for it.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT in the new method of computing the Consumer Price Index is a revised "weighing" of the various components, reflecting modern conditions.

In the old days, food was a prime item in all budgets. It still is, of course, but its relative importance has dropped as evidence of the sociological fact that the more affluent a society becomes the less it spends proportionately on food and the more it spends on other commodities and services.

In the 1950 index, food had a relative "weight" of 28.18 percent in the make-up of the market basket. In the new one, food has a relative weight of only 22.43 percent. In the old index, housing had a relative importance of 30.71 percent. In the new, it is 33.23 percent, reflecting far wider home ownership than in the past. Apparel and its upkeep have remained almost stable: 10.58 percent in the old series and 10.63 percent in the new.

Transportation is more important than it once was, reflecting our increasing ownership of automobiles, and their upkeep. The old weighting for transportation was 11.65 percent. It is now 13.88 percent.

Finally, health and recreation are more important than in the past as factors in our budgets. The old weighting was 18.03 percent, the new one, 19.45 percent.

Broadly speaking, food has gone down. Goods and services have gone up. You have only to see the automobiles pouring into our huge suburban shopping centers on a Saturday to realize how different our buying habits and needs have grown over the years. The new Consumer Price Index is designed to reflect this change. (PAI)

Washington Reports:

Community Planning, Transit Logical Part of Housing Bill

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT and mass transit are a logical part of the 1964 Housing Bill, Rep. Leonor Sullivan (D-Mo.) declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

"They are proper parts of a program that would take care of all the needs of people in major housing areas," she said.

Rep. William B. Widnall (R-N.J.), member of the House Housing subcommittee along with Mrs. Sullivan, declared that he was chiefly concerned with whether families removed in slum clearance programs would be able to get new housing in the same neighborhood. He was therefore urgently interested in the type of redevelopment permitted, he said.

"Urban renewal has been Negro removal in city after city," the New Jersey congressman charged. He reported he had received protests about the situation from all over the country, and 300 indignant Negroes in his congressional area are protesting now in fear of a similar fate.

The Administration bill includes a provision prohibiting discrimination in housing, but the two members of Congress said such a basis is "not the whole answer" to the problems of families removed from slum areas. New housing made available to them "must definitely be kept within the range of what people can pay," Mrs. Sullivan said.

Both members also stressed the importance of rehabilitating existing homes where possible—a feature provided for in the Administration bill. Widnall has his own measure, which would authorize loans of up to $10,000 for housing rehabilitation at 3 percent interest over a 15-year period.

MRS. SULLIVAN expressed interest in seeing that elderly couples, "who have lived all their lives in an area," are not displaced when they "don't have enough years left to start all over again."

She explained that the housing bill, now being considered in committee, includes a provision for such persons to get rehabilitation loans at a low interest rate despite their age.

Widnall disagreed with the amount proposed for commercial redevelopment in urban renewal, but called for protection of small businessmen displaced by such programs.

Mrs. Sullivan praised the St. Louis urban renewal program in the Mill Creek area, which includes medium-sized industries, garden type and high-rise apartments, housing 2,000 families.

Although the St. Louis program is one of the nation's models, she said, some slum sections were torn down "before there was a place to put the people."

A HOUSING BILL will be passed by Congress this year, two members of a House Housing subcommittee, Rep. Leonor Sullivan (D-Mo.), left, and Rep. William B. Widnall (R-N.J.), agreed in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

SOCIAL JUSTICE AWARDS to the late Pres. John F. Kennedy and Sleeping Car Porters Pres. A. Philip Randolph were presented by Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther at the recent UAW convention. Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, left, accepts the award given posthumously to his brother for giving "new dimensions to human dignity." Randolph, right, accepts the award citing him as a "courageous crusader for civil rights and equal opportunity." Social Justice awards also went to Poet Carl Sandburg and to Pres. Arne Geijer of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, who were unable to be present.

Labor Urges Adoption of Stiffer Walsh-Healey Safety Standards

The federal government should use its regulatory powers under the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act to help reduce the nation's "tragic toll" of disabling on-the-job injuries, the AFL-CIO urged.

Federation Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan asked at a Labor Dept. hearing for a major updating of federal safety regulations. The Walsh-Healey safety code applies to firms manufacturing goods for the government.

Keenan, accompanied by a delegation of union safety experts, took sharp issue with industry claims that safety should be left to the states and that business is being overregulated.

State safety codes and enforcement machinery are generally "substandard," Keenan testified. He noted that 10 times as many mandays are lost through occupational accidents as through strikes.

Profits Before Safety

When manufacturers are left unregulated to make a choice between "safety and profit," Keenan said, safety is "inevitably the loser."

He urged the Labor Dept. to improve its proposed safety code revisions, the subject of the hearing, by adopting as "minimum" standards codes which have been developed by recognized national organizations, such as the American Standards Association.

Where authoritative codes do not exist, Keenan either concurred in draft regulations proposed by the Labor Dept. or urged adoption of substitute language drawn up by union experts, such as noise control regulations proposed by the Boilermakers.

Joining in the federation's testimony were Executive Sec. John D. Connors of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, and Alan Burch, Paul Connelley and Victor Whitehouse, safety experts respectively for the Operating Engineers, the Carpenters and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Testimony on noise control was presented by Harold Buoy, Washington representative of the Boilermakers, accompanied by Dr. Joseph Sataloff of Philadelphia.

NAM Protests

Earlier in the hearing, the National Association of Manufacturers contended that the Labor Dept. is stretching its powers by issuing mandatory, rather than "advisory," safety standards under the Walsh-Healey Act.

The NAM also said the safety field should be left to state jurisdiction and complained that it would be too costly for employers to comply with the proposed regulations.

Keenan told the Labor Dept. there should be more, not less, federal inspection. He noted that the Labor Dept. presently allows six states, with presumably above-average safety regulation, to make Walsh-Healey Act safety inspections on the basis of state codes. He pointed out that the percentage of violations uncovered through state inspections was less than half that found by federal inspectors.

The "logical conclusion," Keenan said, is that "the responsibility for the safety of workers employed on all federal supply contracts . . . must rest with the U. S. Dept. of Labor." He urged the department to ask Congress for funds to hire additional safety engineers to inspect plants.

The AFL-CIO reiterated its proposal, first made a year ago in a letter from Pres. George Meany, for establishment of a labor-management advisory committee to help the Labor Dept. kep its safety and occupational health standards up to date.

Meany noted that safety "is not a static matter" and said the federal Walsh-Healey standards "should be revised at least every two years."

The standards now in effect were adopted in 1960.

A separate hearing will be held by the Labor Dept. Apr. 13 on proposed special standards in industries handling radioactive materials.

Building Trades Report Gains from Conference

Delegates to the 9th national legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. have returned to their home states pledged to carry out the admonition of federation Pres. George Meany to help "change the political picture" of the nation by adding 20 to 25 liberal and progressive-minded members to Congress.

At a report session ending the four-day conference in Washington, D. C., delegates generally agreed that prospects for the passage of the department's 12-point legislative program seemed fairly bright. Two of the four days had been spent in visiting senators and representatives and urging their help in passage of the labor-backed legislative program.

Conference leaders urged delegates to intensify a letter-writing campaign in behalf of labor goals and Pres. Peter J. Brennan of New York, reporting for that city's Building & Construction Trades Council, sounded the conference keynote in saying "Let's do the job at home and get the right men back here" in Congress.

Speakers at the final session, introduced by Dept. Pres. C. J. Haggerty, included Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.), Labor Dept. Solicitor Charles Donahue and Labor Undersec. John F. Henning.

Civil Rights Stressed

Humphrey came from the Senate debate on civil rights legislation to tell the conference that "we shall attempt to the best of our ability to bring the Civil Rights Act to final passage" and to establish a "legal framework of constitutional guarantees and civil rights in which men and women can work out their problems through reason and judgment, through persuasion and accomodation within the law."

Pledging to "build a better America," Humphrey thanked the building tradesmen "for what you have been doing, for your constructive position on legislation, for coming here to give us a sense of courage and determination."

"I can honestly say," he added, "I have never known organized labor to ask America to do anything that wasn't good for America. Not once."

Donahue reported that an appeals board will be established soon by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz to review Labor Dept. wage determinations and said labor is "on the threshhold of success" in obtaining enactment of a bill to add fringe benefits in wage determinations under the Davis-Bacon Act.

Henning noted that while some consider civil rights a major building trades problem, the fact is that "it is the problem of all Americans, of every segment" of American life. In writing the "new history of liberty and equality for all Americans," he asserted, "there is a proud place for the American trade union movement."

UAW Delegates Act:

'Multi-Front' Attack On Poverty Pushed

Atlantic City—The Auto Workers convention called for a multi-front attack on the roots of poverty mobilized by the same coalition of labor, church and Negro groups now pressing the civil rights issue.

A major resolution adopted by the 2,400 delegates applauded Pres. Johnson for his pledge to lead the nation in an "unconditional war" on poverty and termed the President's program "a good beginning but . . . only a beginning."

Because of the President's call to action, the resolution said, millions of Americans for the first time realize the "staggering" dimensions of the poverty that afflicts one-fifth of the nation's families "in a society that has enjoyed increasing affluence."

"The problems of civil rights, inadequate education, school dropouts, slums, poor neighborhoods, unemployment, underemployment, obsolete skills, the aged and the handicapped—these are all inseparably bound together with the total problem of poverty," the convention declared.

The "essential foundation" for a comprehensive program must be national policies to assure full employment, the convention continued. It urged a "vast increase" in federal outlays for job-creating public works, including a $2 billion extension of the accelerated public works program to create jobs and at the same time meet such urgent community needs as schools, hospitals, housing and urban redevelopment.

Other priorities in the war on poverty demanding government action, the resolution declared, include:

Speedy passage of the civil rights bill, broad federal aid to education, enactment of the proposed Job Corps and other work-training programs for youth, adequate health care, a $2-an-hour federal minimum wage and extended coverage, liberalized benefits and coverage under federal and state welfare programs, federal standards for unemployment and workmen's compensation systems, programs to improve the incomes of family farmers and give basic protections to hired farm workers, and creation of a "watchdog" commission on poverty to aid the President.

Among resolutions referred to the UAW executive board in the rush of closing was one which would "authorize and direct" the union's leadership to "seek profit-sharing agreements wherever appropriate and possible."

UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther noted that the resolution termed profit sharing "not a demand, but a mechanism."

The convention also gave "the highest priority" to intensified efforts to complete UAW organization within its jurisdiction, with special attention to the problems of clerical, technical and professional employes."

Another resolution attacked "monopsony" in the auto industry—the domination of suppliers by giant corporations which could turn the whole parts industry "into a social jungle."

Earlier, the convention had heard UAW Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey report that the union's financial condition was the best in history as it prepared for 1964 negotiations with the major auto producers, As of Jan. 31, he said, the general fund amounted to $10.6 million and the defense fund had reached nearly $62 million. Mazey also reported that average dues-paying membership of the UAW was 1,150,672 for 1963, a gain of 77,125 over the previous year and of 142,348 over 1961.

Reuther, Mazey Re-elected

Reuther and Mazey were reelected by acclamation to new two-year terms along with Vice Presidents Pat Greathouse and Leonard Woodcock and three at-large executive board members, Ken Bannon, Nelson Jack Edwards and Douglas Fraser. Eighteen other executive board members were returned in elections by regions. The convention voted to eliminate a third vice presidency left vacant by the retirement of Richard T. Gosser.

Constitutional amendments approved by the convention will raise Reuther's salary from the present $24,000 in three stages to $28,000 a year effective Jan. 1, 1966. Increases also were voted for other officers, executive board members and international representatives.

Salaries of the international representatives go from the present $8,741.72 to $10,500 effective with the pay period ending Apr. 11. Further increases of 3 percent are provided next Jan. 1 and a year later.

The officers reported a new statement of policy outlining relationships with a Staff Council of Intl. Representatives. The council will represent UAW staff members in meetings with the officers on salaries and other working conditions and grievances.

DISTINGUISHED service award of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped was presented by Pres. Johnson to Legislative Dir. Walter J. Mason of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. for 17 years of cooperation. Left to right, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty, Mason, Johnson.

Would 'Destroy' Bargaining:

power to hire rests solely with the employers, not with unions. In addition, it is the unions which support federal legislation to prohibit discrimination in employment while the employer organizations oppose it. As a matter of fact, CED itself did not testify on the fair employment practices bill."

The CED statement declared its 10-point program would make the conduct of unions "more consistent with and conductive to the national interest." Meany replied:

"For a once-respected management group to give its endorsement to such arrant nonsense is a distinct disservice to the national interest."

The CED proposals touched on the following areas of trade union function and labor-management relations: "labor violence," union membership, injunctions, lockouts, secondary boycott, duty to bargain, political contributions, national emergency strikes, unfair labor practices and "market power of unions."

Jack Conway, executive director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., noting that the CED statement has "won the plaudits of the far-right National Right to Work Committee," termed it "a union-busting document all the way . . . far more worthy of the NAM and the Chamber of Commerce than the CED."

The National Council for Industrial Peace charged in a statement that the CED has "knuckled under to reactionary management pressure" in a complete switch of policy including its stand on so-called "right-to-work" laws. "Self-interest," the council asserted, "has triumphed over the CED's adventurouse 'pursuit of the national interest.'" The council referred to the 1961 independent study sponsored by the CED.

William Benton, publisher and chairman, Encyclopedia Brittanica, and Allan Sproul, both members of the CED Research Committee, filed a general dissent declaring the statement "has the aspect of a presentation of grievances by the business community which it represents, which may well harden rather than soften the 'adversary position' in labor-management relations which the statement itself deplores."

New Job Opportunities Rise for Negro Women

Employment patterns of Negro women workers show a trend in the direction of clerical, professional and sales occupations and away from traditional home service types of work, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said in announcing publication of a new Labor Dept. study, Negro Women Workers in 1960.

The study, made by the department's Women's Bureau, showed that while the number of employed Negro women reached 2.5 million in 1960—an increase of 31 percent since 1950—the percentage of private-household workers among all Negro women dropped from 60 percent in 1940 to 36 percent in 1960 while the percentage of Negro women clerical workers was rising from 1 to 9 percent.

Service workers outside households, the bureau found, rose from 10 to 21 percent between 1940 and 1960. It said that "significantly greater" numbers of Negro women also have been employed in banking, retail trade, medical and other health services, public administration and manufacturing.

These major trends, Wirtz said, "reflect recent gains in employment and educational status" and show that while the percentage of Negro women workers in farming and factory occupations has been dropping, the proportion in "white collar" fields and in service work other than household jobs is on the rise.

The study in discussing the rise in educational levels gave these examples:

- The percentage of nonwhite women who are high school graduates rose from 14 to 23 percent between 1950 and 1960.
- The median educational level for those in the 25-and-over age group rose from 7.2 years in 1950 to 8.5 in 1960.
- By 1960, more than three-fourths of the employed nonwhite women, aged 25 and over, with four or more years of college training, had professional or related jobs.

The report cited as other important factors in the broadening employment opportunities the continuing migration of Negroes from farms into industrial and metropolitan areas, and a "noticeable" flow of Negroes from the South into other regions. In 1960, slightly more than half the nonwhite women of working age lived in the South, as against nearly three-fourths in 1940.

The study revealed that a significant gap still exists between the earnings of Negro and white women workers. One in 10 Negro women earned $3,000 or more in 1959 compared to one in four white women. The median earnings of nonwhite in 1959 were $1,219 while the median for all women workers was $2,257.

$100,000 Fund Set for South

Philadelphia — The Glass Bottle Blowers have appropriated $100,000 to expand the union's organizing activities in the South.

The money was voted by the executive board following a National Labor Relations Board election victory after a 14-year campaign to organize the Owens-Corning-Fiberglas plant at Anderson, S. C. The win gave the union bargaining rights for 1,000 workers.

Oklahoma Senator Hits State's 'Work' Proposal

there were only 18 strikes in the state, involving 1,980 workers, and he contrasted the industrial "peace record" with that in neighboring "right-to-work" states.

"Our phenomenal low loss of time from work stoppages is appreciably lower than the national average," he said. "Texas, which has such a law, has twice the percentage of time lost."

Monroney made his statement available to the Oklahoma State AFL-CIO and the Oklahoma Committee to Preserve Free Marketing & Bargaining, which are leading the fight to defeat the "work" referendum.

The National Right to Work Committee and a special committee of the U. S. Chamber of Commerce made Oklahoma a key target in a nationwide drive to outlaw the union shop and helped launch the petition campaign. The state legislature previously had turned down repeated efforts to pass a "right-to-work" law or constitutional amendment.

Business Agent Gets 'Women's Status' Post

Concord, N. H. — Mrs. Mary Allen, business agent of Local 242, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, has been named a member of the New Hampshire Commission on the Status of Women by Gov. John W. King (D).

U.S. Sets Up Studebaker Guidance Aid

South Bend, Ind.—The federal government has allocated $50,000 in Manpower Development & Training Act funds to a special project aimed at providing counseling, testing and guidance services for former Studebaker workers, aged 50 and over, who have not found new jobs.

The Auto Workers, engaged since December in trying to find jobs for nearly 8,000 members hit by the sudden closing of Studebaker's U. S. operations, hailed the action of Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz in providing "seed money" for a "start on a much broader program" of training and relocation of the "stranded" workers.

Under the plan, 300 to 500 workers over 50, unemployed and in need of specific vocational help, will be given "highly intensive and individualized" counseling, testing and guidance.

Some 400 ex-Studebaker workers are in training here now under a MDTA program and 200 others will start a new program May 1, according to UAW Regional Dir. Ray Berndt's office.

Questionnaire to Go Out

The union, with the aid of many agencies, has helped find jobs for stranded Studebaker workers in nearby states and Berndt is sending out questionnaires next week aimed at finding out the exact status of every affected worker—whether he has a job, expects to get one, is receiving unemployment compensation and needs specific help in relocating or retraining.

The UAW will intensify its program to bring new industry into the area after the questionnaire results are tabulated, it said. In February, the Kaiser Jeep Corp. bought Studebaker's defense products division and agreed to hire several hundred former Studebaker workers to produce trucks under an Army contract.

The sponsoring agency for the latest MDTA program will be the United Community Services of St. Joseph County, Inc., which has strong labor representation from UAW Local 5 and other union groups. UCS said it expects to cooperate also with the Indiana State Employment Service and the National Council on Aging.

Meany Text on CED

The following article by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is a reply to the policy statement "Union Powers and Union Functions" issued by the Committee for Economic Development.

By George Meany

THE RECENT STATEMENT by the Committee for Economic Development, "Union Powers and Union Functions: Toward a Better Balance," re-states in more sophisticated language the tired old anti-union policies purveyed for generations by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers.

It might be said that with this statement the CED has lost its last excuse for existence. There is little justification for still another employer group that echoes the discredited shibboleths of its elders.

The CED began as the voice of enlightened management—the voice of industrialists and businessmen who accepted the proposition that collective bargaining is in the national interest, and who acknowledged the need for strong unions. But the CED has steadily receded from this position in recent years.

As recently as 1961 the CED published an independent study (authorized two years earlier) entitled "The Public Interest in National Labor Policy," which stressed the importance of a strong, free trade union movement, generally defended its structure, strongly upheld the need for unions to have effective strike power and noted that some degree of conflict was inevitable in labor-management relations. In particular it warned against state "right-to-work" laws and moves toward fragmentation of unions.

The AFL-CIO disagreed with many phases of this study, but recognized it as a serious effort by a distinguished panel to make constructive proposals in a complex area. Now the CED has—as the new publication tacitly admits—composed a rebuttal to that document.

To be sure, the CED clothes its latest pronouncement with pious concern for the collective bargaining process. Yet what it recommends would in effect destroy that process—as its principal author, Theodore O. Yntema, who is hardly a novice, is very well aware.

Union-busting is not made more palatable by a garnish of lofty sentiments.

What the CED proposes is no less than an emasculation of the labor movement. It has thus burned what was once hopefully regarded as a bridge toward better understanding. We can only wonder how Paul G. Hoffman and the late Eric Johnston would now regard their creation.

Consider these examples:

- The spirit of the CED statement is summarized in its next-to-last sentence, which the authors have had printed in italics for emphasis. It reads: "The great enemy of free collective bargaining may turn out to be the excessive power of unions."
- The CED would curb this "excessive power" by doing exactly what its 1961 study rejected—fragmenting the labor movement. While it refrains from endorsing any one way of achieving that end, it offers six possible approaches it says are worthy of "serious consideration."

Five of the six would break up national unions that bargain with competing employers, for this, CED asserts, gives workers "the power to pass on increases of labor costs to consumers of the product." Coming from a committee headed by an automobile company executive, this borders on the grotesque.

- On the other hand, the CED—while seeking to prevent unions from acting in concert—calls for unlimited authorization for employers, acting "singly or collectively," to use the lockout as a weapon against unions.
- The CED would outlaw the union shop—a proven requisite for stable labor-management relations. It insists, in the face of clear evidence to the contrary, that unions flourish under so-called "right-to-work" laws.
- The CED would entirely eliminate the obligation of employers to bargain in good faith with the legally chosen unions of their workers. This requirement, the CED asserts, is "detrimental to free collective bargaining." The truth is, of course, that without the present legal requirement—weak as it is, and lacking adequate enforcement provisions—a considerable number of employers would refuse to bargain at all.
- The CED calls for an end to racial discrimination in unions. With this the AFL-CIO is in full accord. But while it inveighs at some length about various forms of union discrimination, its reference to the obligations of employers is dismissed in two words, contained in the following sentence:

"Racial or other discriminatory barriers to union membership, apprenticeship OR EMPLOYMENT should be eliminated." (Emphasis supplied.) As everyone knows, the effective power to hire rests solely with employers, not with unions. In addition, it is the unions which support federal legislation to prohibit discrimination in employment while the employer organizations oppose it. As a matter of fact, CED itself did not testify on the fair employment practices bill.

These are only a few of the more glaring distortions in the CED report. In general it embraces the baseless fantasy that unions in the United States are an overwhelming force which needs to be "balanced" by further legislative restrictions. For a once-respected management group to give its endorsement to such arrant nonsense is a distinct disservice to the national interest.

High Court Rules:

Arbitration Clause Binds New Owners

cessor employer may be required to arbitrate with the union under the agreement."

AFL-CIO Supports Union

The AFL-CIO appeared before the high court to argue for the viewpoint of the union and also filed a "friend of the court brief" in conjunction with counsel for the Industrial Union Dept.

IUD Exec. Dir. Jack Conway said that the decision will make it impossible for an employer to avoid a contract obligation to union members "by arranging a convenient merger or otherwise disposing of legal ownership."

Conway said the court ruling "upholds the view that a collective bargaining agreement is different from an ordinary contract; that it is negotiated . . . in accordance with the National Labor Relations Act and that it binds all employes concerned whether union members or not, even if they are hired after the agreement becomes effective."

The unanimous nature of the decision, Conway observed, "will have a lasting impact upon labor-management relations" because it "supports the free collective bargaining concept."

Must Arbitrate

The Supreme Court, taking note of the circumstances of the Wiley case, ruled that a company which takes over the business of another firm is required to carry out that firm's agreement to arbitrate, as in the contract between Dist. 65 and Wiley.

Whether the issues raised by the union come within the scope of an arbitration clause is for the arbitrator to decide, the justices ruled, but it is the duty of the courts to determine first whether a collective bargaining agreement compels arbitration.

Justice Harlan, pointing out that the court does not hold that the duty to arbitrate survives every case in which the ownership or corporate structure of a business is changed, asserted also that employes and their union do not ordinarily take part in merger negotiations, but "the objectives of national labor policy . . . require that the rightful prerogative of owners . . . be balanced by some protection to the employes from a sudden change" in employers.

The preference of national labor policy for arbitration as a substitute for tests of strength could, he continued, be overcome "only if other considerations compellingly so demanded" and "we find none" in this case.

The court noted that if the Wiley firm's argument prevailed, delays "attendant upon judicial proceedings preliminary to arbitration" would take place.

Delays Decried

It said also "as the case, commenced in January 1962 and not yet committed to arbitration well illustrates, such delay may entirely eliminate the prospect of a speedy arbitrated settlement of the dispute, to the disadvantage of the parties (who in addition will have to bear increased costs) and contrary to the aims of national labor policy."

The merger took place Oct. 2, 1961. Dist. 65 filed suit a week before its contract with Interscience expired the following Jan. 31. The Court of Appeals decision, now upheld by the Supreme Court, reversed a lower court ruling against the union.

FIRST OF A SERIES of conferences for representatives of affiliated unions active in world affairs was held at AFL-CIO headquarters with Pres. George Meany welcoming spokesmen for 30 unions and Intl. Affairs Dir. Jay Lovestone (above) outlining policies adopted at the last AFL-CIO convention.

Bipartisan Civil Rights Coalition Presses Case in Senate Debate

fast for a strong public accommodations section.

Later Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) said Republicans would give "positive and clear" support to the bill without weakening amendments. Javits cited as evidence of GOP support messages he received from six Republican governors backing the House-passed bill.

'Bogeymen and Hobgoblins'

Humphrey, in opening the Senate debate, charged that since "this bill cannot be attacked on its merits," opponents have raised "bogeymen and hobgoblins . . . to frighten well-meaning Americans." He told the Senate:

"A bill endorsed by hundreds of prominent attorneys is called by the opponents unconstitutional.

"A bill endorsed by every major religious denomination in America is called Communist inspired.

"A bill passed by an overwhelming majority of the House of Representatives—Democrats and Republicans alike—is called socialistic.

"It is said that the bill would make the attorney general a dictator, when in fact the only power he is given is the authority to introduce lawsuits to give some American citizens their constitutional rights and require other Americans to obey the law.

"It is called a force bill, when in fact it places first reliance on conciliation and voluntary action.

"It is called an attack on state government, when in fact the bill specifically directs that state and local officials and agencies will be used wherever feasible.

"It is claimed that it would impair a property owner's ability to sell or rent his home, when in fact there is nothing in the bill pertaining to housing.

"It is claimed that the bill would require racial quotas for all hiring, when in fact it provides that race shall not be a basis for making personnel decisions."

Moving into the section-by-section debate, Senators Kenneth B. Keating (R-N.Y.) and Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) led the bipartisan case for enactment of the voting rights provision, the first title of the bill.

Speaking to nearly empty chambers but to full galleries, they cited case after case of denial of voting rights of Negroes in southern states because of minor and immaterial errors in applications, while whites with the same errors were qualified.

Some examples of voter discrimination cited in the debate:

- In one Louisiana community, a Negro who sought to register was rejected because she said on her application that her color was "Negro," rather than "brown" or "black." But in another community in the same state, an applicant was rejected for writing "brown" instead of "Negro."
- A Negro graduate of Harvard University was rejected in Mississippi for not interpreting a section of the state constitution to the satisfaction of the registrar, while white applicants, literate or illiterate, registered without difficulty.
- A Negro school teacher in Alabama was rejected on a technicality on her first attempt to register. Two months later, when she again sought to register, she was rejected on the ground that she had previously been rejected.

The House-passed bill would bar discriminatory standards for registration, forbid disqualification for immaterial errors or omissions on application forms, and put the burden on the state to prove that a person with at least a sixth grade education was illiterate.

Labor, Bank to Finance Dominican Housing

The Inter-American Development Bank and the AFL-CIO have pooled financial resources to provide sugar workers in the Dominican Republic with modern low-cost housing.

This is the first time the two organizations have undertaken a joint effort in the field of private foreign aid, according to William C. Doherty, Jr., social projects director of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Dominican Pres. Donal J. Reid Cabral said his government will provide a 100 percent repayment guarantee of the funds loaned. Doherty reported that the loan is for 25 years at 4.5 percent interest, and includes $2 million from the Inter-American Bank and $1 million from the welfare and pension funds of AFL-CIO unions.

More than 750 individual dwellings are planned at a cost of $3,000 to $4,000 each. The new community will be built at San Pedro Macoris for workers of the Porvenir Sugar Mill and, like many other trade union housing projects in Latin American, will be named the John F. Kennedy workers' housing project.

Doherty said land for the houses has been provided by the Dominican government which also has agreed to build necessary streets, sidewalks and a shopping center along with a church, school and hospital.

Doherty, who returned recently from the Dominican Republic, said Pres. Reid had offered the "most ample government cooperation" on the project.

The AIFLD will administer the building project through its representative, Capt. Andrew S. Klay (USN, ret.) a former Navy Seabee engineer.

The institute, founded by the AFL-CIO and now supported almost in equal part by the federation and affiliates and by business leaders, foundations and the U. S. government, is helping organized workers in Latin America to achieve increasingly effective participation in the Alliance for Progress.

Its work is done through educational programs which, in the past year, have trained more than 4,000 unionists from Latin American and Caribbean nations and by helping unions organize housing, credit, consumer and general cooperatives help bring about a rise in workers' living standards.

Union Scales Rise In Printing Trades

Printing trades wage scales of union workers in cities of 10,000 or more increased an average of 10 cents an hour in the year ending June 30, 1963, according to a report by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Gains amounted to 3 percent in book and job shops and 2.8 percent on newspapers, the report showed. Scales in book and job shops ranged from $2.08 an hour for bindery women to $4.30 for photoengravers, or an average of $3.37. On newspapers the daywork range was from $3.33 for mailers to $3.99 for photoengravers.

Spanish Labor Unit Asks Aid in Freeing 3 Unionists

The Coordinating Committee of the Spanish Labor Union Alliance has called on trade unions and other liberals throughout the world to join in a campaign of protest against the impending imprisonment of three union leaders by the Spanish government.

Accused of subversion and of conspiring against the Franco government are Francisco Calle Mancilla, a carpenter; Agustin Mariano Pascual, a metalworker, and Jose Cases Alfonso, a printer accused of printing so-called propaganda for the Labor Union Alliance, which is composed of the General Workers Union (UGT) and the National Labor Confederation (CNT).

Unless sufficient pressure is exerted upon the government, the alliance said, the three workers "will probably be condemned to long prison terms for the crime of being democratically-minded leaders of a workers' alliance that fights inside Spain to obtain freedom and striking rights for Spanish labor."

Wirtz Sets Walsh-Healey Base at $1.25

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has set $1.25-an-hour as the minimum wage for all industries subject to provisions of the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act, except those for which the federally-regulated pay floor already has been established at a higher rate.

The Walsh-Healey Act protects workers on government supply contracts in excess of $10,000. The $1.25 hourly rate matches the minimum wage set under the Fair Labor Standards Act for all workers engaged in interstate commerce or in production of goods for such commerce.

The determination makes final a proposal published last July 24 to which no objections were raised at a subsequent hearing, the Labor Dept. said.

It permits employment of learners at a lower rate to the same extent and under the same conditions authorized by the FLSA.

Meany Backs Poverty Bill, Stresses Key Need of Jobs

Humphrey in Public Pledge:

Rights Forces Vow To Keep Bill Intact

By David L. Perlman

The Senate's Democratic and Republican civil rights leaders pledged publicly to fight any weakening amendments to the House-passed bill and to beat down "for once and all" the filibuster threat which has been used over the years against civil rights legislation.

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) told the architects of the bipartisan civil rights coalition in the House, Representatives Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.) and William M. McCulloch (R-O.), that:

"We have no intention of letting you down, selling you out, trading you away, or in any way weakening the bill you sent to the U.S. Senate. I speak for a majority of the Senate."

His pledge, at the annual congressional dinner of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., was made in response to a warning by Celler that the bill could be "amended to death" in the Senate and that it would be difficult to enact any legislation if the House could not accept Senate amendments without the need for a conference.

Kuchel Sees Victory

Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.), GOP floor leader for the bill, stressing the bipartisan unity in the civil rights drive, predicted that "after ennervating days and weeks of debate, two-thirds of the Senate will vote for cloture . . . in the interests of demonstrating to the world that this republic still can work."

He denounced the filibuster weapon against civil rights legislation as "a contemptible thing" and said that segregationist newspaper advertisements seeking to undermine northern support for the rights bill carry "vile untruths."

Celler, who with McCulloch received IUD plaques for civil rights leadership, said "perfecting" and minor amendments to the House

Food Bill, Wheat Aid Pass House

The House in a burst of activity passed two major Administration measures, a food stamp bill and a cotton-wheat bill, over angry Republican opposition.

The cotton-wheat bill, previously passed by the Senate goes directly to the White House for Pres. Johnson's signature. The food stamp measure, to make permanent a previously existing pilot program based on executive authority, moves to the Senate.

Both bills had the backing of the AFL-CIO—the food stamp program in a specific endorsement of a permanent program by the 1963 convention, and the cotton sections of the agricultural bill as representing an approach to labor's long-standing support of the principle of direct payments to farmers to sustain farm income on an equitable basis.

The food stamp bill, urged by the late Pres. Kennedy and endorsed by Johnson as a significant section of the "war on poverty"

Adult Men Gain:

Unemployment Rate Holds Fast at 5.4%

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's job picture showed some improvement in March, but there was a continued failure to dent the unemployment problem, the Labor Dept. has reported. The jobless rate remained at 5.4 percent, with 4.3 million out of work.

The Labor Dept. said both the rise in non-farm jobs, and a drop in unemployment among adult men were better than seasonal changes.

Non-farm employment jumped by 429,000 to a total of 64.5 million, the report said. This exceeded the usual February-to-March increase by about 170,000; it also followed extra-seasonal gains of 300,000 in January and 400,000 in February.

"This steady rise over the last few months is a sign of some strength in the economy," commented Harold Goldstein, the Labor Dept.'s manpower and job statistics expert.

Aside from the spurt in non-farm jobs, the other main bright spot singled out was the continuing decline in the jobless rate of adult men. This fell to 3.9 percent in March, down from 4.1 percent in February and 4.3 percent in January.

School Aid, Wage Law Called Vital

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged Congress to approve — "speedily"—the Administration's anti-poverty bill. But he cautioned a special House Labor subcommittee that the measure, although "an important step forward . . . will not end poverty in America."

The "real answer to poverty," he stressed, is "jobs at good wages for every American who is able and willing to work."

In calling for action on other "equally important" measures, Meany declared:

"No single step could do more to strike at the roots of poverty in America than universal coverage of all wage earners under the Fair Labor Standards Act, coupled with an increase in the minimum wage to $2 an hour."

Meany said the Administration's omnibus poverty bill can help young people "overcome their educational shortcomings . . . give them work experience . . . help to keep deserving but needy students in college."

This, he said, is "fine" but "will be of no avail, in the long run, unless they have somewhere to go when they finish."

Meany's praise of the objectives of the Administration bill and his call for additional measures was backed also in testimony before the subcommittee by two AFL-CIO vice presidents.

Reuther, Randolph Testify

Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther, testifying also for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., called for "a much more fundamental attack . . . if we are to bring poverty and deprivation to an end."

Alaskan Unionists' Morale High Despite Loss of Homes, Halls, Jobs

Anchorage, Alaska—The earthquake and tidal wave that spread death and destruction across southern and central Alaska on Good Friday threw hundreds out of work and wrecked homes, union halls and business places, but the morale of those who survive is "excellent," State AFL-CIO Pres. R. E. McFarland has reported.

Listing details of the crisis confronting Alaskan unionists and the services of trade union volunteers in helping the young state "dig out" in wrecked areas, the state federation head added in a personal postscript:

"I lost my home but my family is OK and that is good enough for me."

Upwards of 25 union members lost their lives in the Mar. 27 disaster and "lots of assistance" will be needed in outlying areas remote from the larger cities, McFarland reported.

As labor and many other agencies rushed aid to the sufferers, the state labor chief gave this earthquake summary:

- The body of one longshoreman has been recovered but 24 other Seafarers members unloading a freighter at Valdez, east of Anchorage, are missing and presumed lost. They were at work when the tidal wave struck their dock.
- More than 20 others are dead or missing at Kodiak, and another 23 at Chenega, which had a union fish cannery. Many workers at Kodiak were employed at building construction, cold storage, fishing or cannery work and some labor unionists presumably were among the

Rail Unions, Management Get LBJ Bid

Rail operating unions and management representatives, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, were reviewing a proposal by Pres. Johnson that they continue negotiations for a 20-day period in an effort to settle their long dispute over benefits and working conditions on 200 railroads.

Calling both sides to the White House in a last-minute effort to avert a work stoppage and unilateral imposition by management of revised work rules, Johnson proposed that, during the 20-day period, both

NLRB Trial Examiner Upholds Sale and Closing of N.Y. Mirror

A National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has recommended dismissal of a complaint that the Hearst Corp. committed unfair labor practices when it sold the New York Mirror to the New York Daily News last Oct. 15.

Severance pay and "zipper" clauses in contracts between the publisher and four unions that filed charges after the sale, Examiner John F. Funke ruled, constituted a "direct, written and unconditional waiver of the right to notice of, or consultation on, any decision to suspend publication."

Three of the unions—the Pressmen, Paper Handlers and Stereotypers — had contracts negotiated through the Publishers' Association of New York City; the Newspaper Guild negotiated directly with the Mirror.

They charged that the Hearst Corp. had unilaterally shut down its operation and terminated the services of employes without prior notice to the unions and without having given them an opportunity to negotiate or bargain on the shutdown and termination, though the unions were the exclusive representatives for bargaining purposes of their members employed by the Mirror.

The examiner said he was aware that under present board law an employer may not, by unilateral action, subcontract or close down a portion of his business in which the employes have selected a bargaining representative even though the decision has an economic motive, and that the obligation to bargain applies to the decision itself as well as to the rights of the affected employes.

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia has upheld this twofold requirement and its ruling is now before the Supreme Court but "it is clear," the examiner said, "that the overwhelming consensus of other appellate court rulings is against any requirement that an employer must bargain with a union concerning a decision to go out of business."

Since the NLRB requires its examiners to follow its decisions until they have been overruled by the Supreme Court, a "facile and thought-saving answer" for an examiner would be to cite the decision in the key Fibreboard case, Funke observed, but he rejected this procedure and cited instead the contracts between the parties.

In each contract, he said, there was a provision for various forms of termination or severance pay and the Mirror lived up to them. Each contract also contained a "zipper" clause which read:

"The parties hereto agree that they have fully bargained with respect to wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment and have settled the same for the term of this agreement in accordance with the terms thereof."

Noting that New York City has a long history of newspaper mergers and suspensions and that there were rumors of other impending discontinuances during last year's 114-day strike and lockout, Funke ruled that "the parties concluded a final and binding contract." This being true, the examiner concluded, there was "no need to decide" other issues.

Organizing Drive Wins New England Workers

Boston, Mass.—A vigorous AFL-CIO organizing drive in New England resulted in the winning of representation rights for 12,672 workers in Maine, Massachusetts and New Hampshire, Reg. Dir. Hugh Thompson has reported.

Announcing the start of a new organizing effort in the Springfield, Mass., area, Thompson said a score of AFL-CIO unions cooperated in the New England drive with these results;

In Maine, the organizing committee won 12 elections and lost 8; in Massachusetts, 7 and 7; New Hampshire, 1 and 1, for a winning figure of 55.5 percent.

Thompson said nearly 13,000 workers are in the 20 units won in the organizing drive, and fewer than 3,000 in the 16 units lost.

Officers of central bodies and union staff representatives reported at a Chicopee, Mass., meeting that the current organizing effort will be directed toward 15,000 workers at 58 business places in Hampden County, Mass. Major population centers include Springfield, West Springfield, Westfield, Holyoke and Chicopee.

Earlier the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization under Dir. John Livingston had reported that a "concentrated and coordinated" organizing drive, launched in Maine some 24 months ago, had succeeded in raising union membership in the state to the 60,000 mark. Success of the drive was credited to "complete harmony and unity" among participating unions.

Later the same methods were used in nearby states and are being stressed in the Hampden County effort.

Otto C. Dehn Dies. Cigarmakers' Aide

Otto C. Dehn, a member of the Cigarmakers since 1896 and secretary of the union from 1936 until his retirement in January 1963, died of a heart ailment at his home in Washington. He was 87.

He was initiated into Chicago Local 14 on Dec. 8, 1896, and after activity in the local was named a clerk in the international union office, then in Chicago, in 1907. He was appointed secretary—not an elective office in the Cigarmakers —by the late Pres. R. E. Van Horn and was renamed by successor presidents. At the time of his death he was still serving as associate editor of the union's Journal, the official publication.

Surviving are two daughters, Mrs. Mildred D. Yerkes, with whom he made his home, and Mrs. Ruth D. Stone of Arlington, Va. Masonic and religious funeral services were held in Washington, where burial took place.

Postal Union Aide Takes U.S. Job

The Postal Clerks have announced the resignation of Paul A. Nagle as administrative vice president of the union, and the appointment of Henry T. Anglim to succeed him.

Nagle, president of the National Postal Transport Association until its merger with the Postal Clerks in 1961, has accepted an assignment with the Post Office Dept. to enforce compliance with the government's fair employment program by contractors doing business with the department.

Meany Commends Parties:

Seafarers, Trustees In Canadian Pact

The Seafarers Intl. Union and government-named trustees of Canadian maritime unions have reached an agreement under which the Seafarers Union of Canada will be restored to the constitutional control of its members.

In a series of meetings between SIU Pres. Paul Hall and Charles Millard, acting for the government trustees, a settlement was worked out under which the government trustees "will continue to exercise their powers and responsibilities," but the "active management" of the SIU of Canada "will be in the hands of the membership," a joint statement announced.

The 18,000 SIU members in Canada will elect their own officers next fall.

The agreement between Hall and Millard, said AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, "represents an honorable and constructive approach to the resolution of a critical situation which might otherwise have led to consequences detrimental to the best interests of all concerned."

The parties "should be commended," Meany continued, "for their restraint and sound judgment" in working out an agreement "in very difficult and trying circumstances, and for guiding themselves by a primary concern for the rights and welfare of the individual seamen who would bear the brunt of continued strife on the [Great] Lakes, and the overriding need for the preservation of the strength and integrity of their union."

Meany Hopeful on Trusteeship

Meany said he was "hopeful" that the agreement "will be instrumental in clearing the way for an early end of the government trusteeship."

The Hall-Millard statement, in addition to opening the way for fall elections by the SIU of Canada and interim administrative control by its own members, set forth these agreements:

- "Continued close relationships will be maintained" between the SIU of North America and the SIU of Canada "to advance the common interests" of Canadian members.
- Steps will be taken to unite all elements of the maritime industry of Canada and the U.S. in a cooperative effort to settle all differences on the Great Lakes.
- The parties will seek the cooperation of the Canadian Labor Congress, the AFL-CIO, the Railway Labor Executives' Association, the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. and other groups "to assist in the achievement of normalcy in the maritime industry."
- "All possible steps will be taken to achieve integration of maritime unions in Canada where it is in the interest of union stability."
- "Should either party feel that all obligations have not been met, they are at liberty to consider all arrangements terminated."

Start of Dispute

The disputes leading to establishment of a Canadian government trusteeship over the SIU of Canada arose when ships previously under contract with SIU moved to a contract with a newly-chartered Canadian Maritime Union and the ships were picketed in Great Lakes ports.

Harold C. Banks, SIU of Canada president, was also criticized in a report following a royal commission inquiry and was ousted as a union officer by the trustees.

Millard, a government-named trustee, paid tribute in a separate statement to the "initiative" shown by Hall and the SIU in seeking meetings to work out the agreement just announced. Millard is a veteran Canadian union official with a background with both the Auto Workers and Steelworkers.

He pointed out that the legislative act under which Canadian maritime unions were trusteed "provides that trusteeship shall end as early as possible" and said he hopes the "spirit of cooperation marking negotiations" previously will be continued.

Hall in a separate statement said the SIU maintains that the trusteeship law "is anti-union and undesirable" and said that as a union "our responsibility is to continue our fight for its recission."

He paid tribute to Meany, to U.S. Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, Assistant Sec. James Reynolds and others "for unremitting efforts to assist" in resolving the immediate trusteeship problem.

He also urged that the SIU of Canada "continue to function as an autonomous organization, making its own decisions," but expressing "firm and solid fraternal ties" between Canadian and U.S. SIU members.

Banks is involved in court proceedings, Hall pointed out, and the SIU at present "will not comment in that regard."

College Leave Denial Held Unfair Practice

Refusal of a furniture manufacturer to let a union president study at Harvard University after winning a labor scholarship was an unfair labor practice, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

Three members of the board, upholding a decision by Trial Examiner James V. Constantine, ordered Harvey Probber, Inc., of Fall River, Mass., to stop discouraging membership in the Furniture Workers by refusing to grant Americo Ramos, or any other employe, a leave of absence for unlawful reasons.

Ramos, a frame assembler who was president and chief steward of UFW Local 159 at the Probber plant, was a forceful union leader who actively enforced the contract. Notified in 1962 that he had won the right to take a special course of study under the Harvard Trade Union Program, Ramos posted the letter on the plant bulletin board, received congratulations from two company officials, and five months later requested a leave in writing.

The union contract specifies that employes will be granted leaves for "valid reasons" if they "can be spared from production." On Jan. 10, 1963, the firm's executive vice president—one of those who had congratulated Ramos—denied the request in writing without giving any reason.

At hearings before the examiner, management claimed Ramos could not be spared because of a "huge backlog of orders." Constantine concluded the firm had failed to prove this contention, but used it as a pretext in resentment against Ramos' union activities.

'Contribution to Bargaining':

Steelworkers, Kaiser Hail First Year of Sharing Plan

A full year of experience with the "Long-Range Sharing Plan" between the Steelworkers and Kaiser Steel at the company's Fontana, Calif., plant reveals a "definite contribution to free and responsible collective bargaining," the union and company said in a joint statement.

Emphasizing that the plan is not "profit-sharing" but a division of actual "savings" in production costs, the company-union statement also pointed out that the year just completed was the first in what is designed as a "continuing" program subject to cancellation only at four-year intervals.

The number of Fontana workers covered has climbed from an initial 3,939 to more than 5,000—partly as a result of new hirings and partly from voluntary transfer of older employes previously on an existing incentive program.

USWA Pres. David J. McDonald spelled out specific results in a letter to international officers and district directors of the union.

Total savings to the company amounted to dollar gains of $10.5 million. Under the agreed plan, more than one-third of this—nearly $3.8 million—went to employes. This averaged out to more than 41 cents an hour for hourly-rated employes, more than 16 percent of standard rates, and totaled more than $850 for full-time employes for the year, the union president reported.

Sharing plan earnings for USWA members in the lowest of five job groups averaged 27 cents an hour; for employes in the highest job group the average was 91 cents an hour, more than 35 percent of basic wages, or about $2,000 a year.

These payments, McDonald pointed out, "were over and above the amounts accumulated at a uniformly increasing rate in a reserve . . . to cover the cost" of improvements negotiated in the 1963 basic contract between steel companies and the union.

The 1963 contract improvements, which became effective at Kaiser at the same time as at other steel companies, include extended vacations and an improved insurance plan plus a reserve to cover future improvements negotiated with the basic steel industry on wages and other benefits.

Company Earnings Up

McDonald said that of the $10.5 million in "savings" to the company, "well over $6 million represented savings in materials and supply costs," and that Kaiser Steel climbed from a net loss figure of $5.2 million in 1962 to a net profit of $11.3 million in 1963. The improved earnings figure came in the face of a $12 a ton average price reduction in October 1962 followed by a $1 a ton average increase in April 1963, he noted.

McDonald said in his letter that almost 30 percent of employes covered by "regular" incentive systems have voluntarily transferred to sharing plan coverage to increase their earnings. Now, "the entire amount of incentive earnings" they would have received is paid to the sharing plan employes as a group in addition to savings generated under the plan itself.

Kaiser Steel employment climbed by 11 percent during the year, he said, and the number of workers protected against layoff under an employment security guarantee ranged from a low of zero in some months to a maximum of 35 in November following technological changes.

The joint Kaiser-union statement pointed out that the employment security section of the sharing plan—an agreement setting up a reserve to protect workers against layoffs resulting from changed equipment or practices—"was not fully tested in the first year."

There were "minimal" changes in this field, and the provision was found, in practice, "difficult to administer, subject to a variety of interpretations, and not consistent with a new seniority agreement reached during the year," the joint statement said. It has been replaced by a new provision, effective Jan. 1, "expected to overcome these problems."

'Tailored' to Fontana

The Long-Range Sharing Plan "was tailored specifically for conditions existing at Fontana," the joint statement said, and its exact provisions are "not necessarily applicable or workable anywhere else."

At the same time, the sharing plan has given the union and company "a highly desirable degree of flexibility" in adjusting to new conditions, the statement noted, and the parties "have been able to meet and resolve their problems without rancor or outside intervention."

Public members of the committee that helped set up the plan have made many contributions, the company and union said, but "it has not been necessary for the parties to turn to them for mediation or more direct intervention in the area of basic decisions."

A SPECIAL ATTRACTION of the 1964 Union-Industries Show will be a full-size model of the Mercury space capsule, exhibited by the National Aeronautics & Space Administration. Sec.-Treas. This year's show will be held May 22-27 at the Kentucky Fair & Exposition Center in Louisville.

Station Drops Program, UAW Hits 'Censorship'

The Auto Workers have petitioned the Federal Communications Commission to revoke the broadcast license of a Baltimore radio station whose new owners abruptly cancelled the union's daily Eye Opener program.

Eye Opener, a half-hour of news and commentary, had been carried by station WCBM since 1955. It had opened the station's broadcasting day and, the UAW said, "had become a listening habit to thousands of our members and their families in the Baltimore area."

Eye Opener is now off the air—dropped on a slim one-week notice on the eve of the UAW's recent convention—and WCBM's program day now begins with a news broadcast sponsored by three automobile dealers.

In its petition to the FCC, the UAW charged that dropping the program "was a flagrant act of political censorship violating the station's public trust."

Pres. Dominic Fornaro of the Baltimore AFL-CIO and Sec.-Treas. William B. Scheffel of the state central body led a delegation which called on the station to reconsider cancellation of its only union-sponsored program.

They told the FCC in a sworn affidavit that the station's management informed them that the program was being dropped because representatives of several big corporations had protested that it was too "controversial."

Metromedia, Inc., which took over the ownership of WCBM last July, had tried unsuccessfully to get the program cancelled a year ago, the UAW said, but was overruled at the time by the station's owners.

The union charged that the station's present owners had made "knowingly false" statements to the FCC that no substantial programming or contract changes were contemplated as a result of the change of ownership.

"With the cancellation of the only regular labor-sponsored program on WCBM, while 16 daily newscasts are sponsored by the auto industry and the remainder by other commercial industries, there is created a serious program imbalance," the UAW asserted.

sides agree to work to settle the issues or work out procedures for settlement, with Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Chairman Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., of the National Mediation Board aiding them "intensively and continuously."

Johnson held a 19-minute meeting with the deadlocked negotiators after the mediators reported they had been unable to reconcile the disputants after day-and-night meetings at the Labor Dept.

The Johnson Administration stepped into the four-year-old dispute when J. E. Wolfe, spokesman for rail management negotiators, said the operators ordered new work rules put into effect at 12:01 a.m. Apr. 10, because of a strike called by four brotherhoods against the Illinois Central Railroad alone.

Managements also notified shippers of a freight embargo and unions began deploying representatives to key rail terminals.

Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Firemen & Enginemen had called the management move "irresponsible."

Signalmen Say Pay Proposal Falls Short

A Presidential Emergency Board found that railroad signalmen suffer from "a serious wage inequity" in relation to the skills they bring to the job. The board's pay recommendations, however, were described by the union as "disappointing."

For skilled signalmen and signal maintainers, the board recommended a 10-cent hourly wage increase, retroactive to Jan. 1. It proposed a 6-cent raise for helpers and lesser-skilled employes represented by the union.

Signalmen Pres. Jesse Clark welcomed the emergency board's "recognition of our skills and responsibilities" but said the "wage lag that has accumulated over many years" justifies a higher increase. The union had sought a 25 percent raise.

Meanwhile another Presidential Emergency Board heard arguments from rail shopcraft unions for a job stabilization program to halt mounting unemployment among shop workers and "job decimation." The unions are bargaining jointly through the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept.

'Work' Leader Exposed On Union 'Credentials'

The "labor" credentials of a leader of the "right-to-work" campaign in Oklahoma have been exposed as non-existent by a national representative of the Postal Clerks.

A self-styled Oklahoma Council for Labor's Rank & File, set up to campaign for a constitutional amendment to ban the union shop, lists its chairman, William Schweikhard, as "a union member of 40 years and former Oklahoma president of the United Federation of Postal Clerks, AFL-CIO."

John C. Hill, the union representative in Oklahoma, says Schweikhard now admits that he never even was a member, much less an officer, of the Postal Clerks.

Puzzled by the identification, Hill said he phoned Schweikhard and learned:

- Schweikhard, before his retirement from the postal service, was a member of an unaffiliated association of supervisors.
- Some 30 years ago, according to Schweikhard, he was state president of an organization, not affiliated with any labor federation, called the United National Association of Post Office Clerks. By the time this group merged nationally with the Postal Clerks several years ago, it had long been inactive in Oklahoma, Hill said.

Schweikhard, in his role as a "rank and file" labor spokesman, has been going about the state calling for enactment of "right-to-work" in order to "return control of the unions to the members," according to clippings from Oklahoma newspapers.

Hill stressed that the Postal Clerks "have always fought" against "right-to-work" proposals and added:

"We certainly don't want someone who never belonged to our group claiming to be a former president, especially while trying to get people to vote for what we consider against our best interests."

The false identification, Hill said, could lead people to believe that the union suports the "right-to-work" amendment.

"Nothing could be farther from the truth," he declared.

67 New Credit Unions Organized by Labor

Madison, Wis.—Sixty-seven new credit unions were organized by members of trade unions in the United States during 1963, according to the annual report of the Credit Union National Association.

At the end of the year there were 1,250 such union-sponsored bodies in the U.S. and another 110 in Canada. Throughout the world some 29,800 credit unions—21,500 in the U.S.—offer a source of savings and low-cost loans to more than 18 million members.

U. S. Proposes Federal Union Contract Bar

The Labor Dept. has proposed a two-year contract bar to changes of collective bargaining representative by government employes working under a union agreement.

Assistant Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds invited agencies and unions in the federal service to comment by Apr. 30 on the department's proposal to bar challenges to bargaining rights for the duration of a contract, up to a maximum of two years.

Labor-management relations in the federal service are governed by a presidential executive order and do not come under the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board. Thus, while the NLRB currently has a three-year contract bar policy, there has been no comparable regulation affecting organizations of federal employes.

The Labor Dept. proposes to establish the new policy indirectly, by refusing to nominate arbitrators in disputes involving bargaining rights where an existing contract is in effect for not more than two years.

$75,000 Aid to Alaska Kicks Off Labor Drive

Contributions totaling $75,000 from the AFL-CIO and the Carpenters paced initial efforts of organized labor to aid victims of the Alaskan earthquake disaster.

Pres. George Meany announced that an AFL-CIO donation of $25,000 will be presented to the Red Cross and the Salvation Army by Alaska State AFL-CIO Pres. R. E. McFarland.

The Carpenters presented their check for $50,000 to Gen. James F. Collins, new president of the American Red Cross, on his first day in office as successor to Gen. Alfred M. Gruenther.

As other trade union bodies took action to help reduce the misery of disaster victims, the Washington State AFL-CIO announced the establishment of a special fund to aid in rebuilding union offices destroyed or damaged by the quake.

In a letter to more than 750 affiliates, Pres. Joe Davis of the Washington state council said the fund will be sent to the Alaska AFL-CIO to help local unions whose offices and files were destroyed.

Meanwhile Congress approved and sent to Pres. Johnson an emergency bill to provide $50 million in disaster relief. At the same time Johnson made $2 million available through the Farm & Home Administration for house repair loans for periods up to 33 years at 4 percent interest.

Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) termed the $50 million appropriation from federal funds merely a "first installment" on further funds needed. Sen. Warren Magnuson (D-Wash.) told the Senate that Alaska damages will total more than half the assessed real estate valuation of the entire state.

Present for the Red Cross ceremony were 1st Vice Pres. John R. Stevenson of the Carpenters, accompanied by 2d Vice Pres. Finlay C. Allen, Sec. Richard E. Livingston and Treas. Peter E. Terzick.

The money, Collins and Executive Vice Pres. John C. Wilson of the Red Cross said, will be used to continue emergency aid to homeless families and to help some 1,000 families while they are rebuilding their damaged homes.

Six emergency shelters are functioning in Anchorage and nine at Glen Allen. At Seward the Red Cross is feeding 800 persons, and on Kodiak Island, 300 are being sheltered and fed, it said.

Official Relief Agency

Gov. William A. Egan has named the Red Cross the official disaster relief agency. The agency said it has nearly 60 staff members in the area to help provide relief and answer 51,000 inquiries from members of the families of area residents.

Wirtz Aide Named to Manpower Post

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz has announced the appointment of his executive assistant, John C. Donovan, to be administrator of the department's Manpower Administration.

casualties.

• Labor unions reported few casualties at Anchorage, but the Retail Clerks' office was demolished, as were other union halls. More than 400 RCIA members lost their jobs, as did 250 in the service trades, through damage to their work places.

Hard-hit areas in Anchorage were the downtown business district and a residential area called Turnagain, where 100 homes slid into Cook Inlet, another 100 were wrecked and others damaged.

Building Trades Turn To

"Immediately after the quake," McFarland reported, "the construction trades unions and the Anchorage chapter of the Associated General Contractors set up joint headquarters in the Carpenters' Hall here and took over duties assigned them by the Civil Defense Agency."

These duties, he continued, included the salvaging of food and drugs from wrecked stores, shoring up damaged buildings, housing vital communication facilities, emergency repair work on public utilities including sewer, water, electric power and highways.

The union volunteers, among other duties, also served as city building inspectors, loaded and unloaded food supplies, clothing, portable sewage equipment and power generators at the request of the Red Cross, Salvation Army, Civil Defense Agency and other relief organizations.

"This work was entirely volunteer work," said McFarland, "with members of the various unions assigned work according to their capabilities. Food for the workers was provided by the State Council of Carpenters, and prepared and served by members of the culinary trades.

The work "has gone on around the clock" as long as the emergency lasted, he said. Anchorage earthquake victims were joined, he reported, by residents of many villages in the area, suffering primarily from damage done by tidal waves, who were brought to the city and housed temporarily in school buildings where they are being fed and clothed.

The state labor president said the RCIA probably will be hardest hit in job losses. Several major chain stores were wrecked but some stores and food markets have reopened and employes have been called back to work.

Many Jobs Lost

The Hotel & Restaurant Employes reported that 20 Anchorage restaurants were destroyed and 250 jobs lost. However, other restaurants opened after cleanup and repair work and food stocks were said to be "in fair supply."

Building tradesmen were seriously hit by job loss when subcontractors' shops were demolished. Reconstruction was reported delayed at least 10 days while a geological survey is being made for banks, private investors and government agencies to determine where building is feasible and safe.

Most promising work opportunities, according to McFarland, appear to be in repairs needed at military installations, utilities, the municipal airport, the Alaska Railroad, the Post Office Dept. and the State Highway Dept.

First damage estimates were put at $200 million for the Anchorage area, up to $500 million for all Alaska. The Alaska Railroad alone put its loss at nearly $200 million.

McFarland said major causes of damage were elevated areas sliding into low ground, buildings falling into deep chasms and structures that "just shook to pieces." He noted some chasms 40 feet deep, 100 feet wide and several blocks long.

Wages, Retroactivity Block Strike Peace

Sault Ste. Marie, Ont.—Settlement of a strike of 400 members of the Woodworkers at the lumber and veneer plant of Weyerhaeuser Canada, Ltd., has been blocked by a deadlock over wages and retroactivity.

The workers walked out at the end of February when demands for a 14-cent across-the-board increase and additional benefits were met with a counteroffer of only 6 cents. The company later offered 14 cents for laborers and 9.5 cents for other categories, but with only 4.5 cents retroactive to contract expiration.

Foreclosure Rate Up, Highest Since 1939

Mortgage foreclosures on nonfarm properties last year jumped 14 percent over 1962 to a total of 98,195—largest since 1939, according to the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

Jobseekers Warned To Avoid Alaska

Anchorage — Jobseekers flocking into Alaska are making things worse for residents who survived the recent earthquake and have little hope of finding work, State AFL-CIO Pres. R. E. McFarland reported.

"I believe we will be real lucky to get our own people to work by mid-July," he observed. He said many jobseekers have just enough money to get to Alaska, and must be fed and housed along with victims of the quake.

"This morning [Apr. 4] it was 5 degrees above zero," he said. "The spring breakup [of ice in the rivers] is still six weeks away and there is absolutely no chance of newcomers going to work for three or four months."

5-Year Pact Gives Clerks Pensions at 60

Long Beach, Calif.—More than 6,000 members of Retail Clerks Union 324 voted here by a 40-1 margin to ratify terms of a new five-year contract with supermarkets in the Long Beach and Orange County areas.

The agreement calls for wage increases totaling 36 cents an hour for members of the local's food division; retirement at age 60 with full pension benefits—$100 a month plus a cost-of-living adjustment—after 20 years of employment in the Southern California food industry; and an industrywide vacation plan providing that workers who change employers will not lose vacation eligibility.

The former contract permitted retirement at age 65 after 30 years of service. In the new pact, early retirement with reduced benefits may begin at age 50 instead of 55.

A new life insurance program will give eligible members a $5,000 death benefit payment plus $500 on the death of a spouse or dependents. In addition, drug prescriptions will be paid for from a trust fund paying 75 to 90 percent of cost. Members who have retired on pension also get prescription care and will be covered by death benefits of $1,000 to $2,500.

Unused sick leave will be paid in cash at the close of each employment year. A preventive medicine program will provide regular physical examinations for members. Improvements were added in hospital, medical, dental and psychiatric care, including guaranteed maintenance of all benefits.

Retained in the contract were provisions for extra pay for night, holiday and Sunday work, and supplemental unemployment and disability benefits, Sec.-Treas. Arthur Z. Berland reported.

2 Kinds of Unions Called Aid to Sales

Toronto, Ont. — Trade unions and credit unions play a key role in maintaining mass purchasing power in Canada, Pres. W. D. Whitaker of the O'Keefe Brewing Co. told the annual meeting of the Ontario Credit Union League.

"Organized labor has assured the rise of incomes in dollar terms," he said, "while credit unions have increased the buying power of each dollar for middle-income families."

Facts on the Issues:

Fund Needs Imperil Public Works Jobs

$2 Billion More Sought to Extend Accelerated Federal Program

The job-creating Accelerated Public Works program has run out of money—and it's up to Congress to give this successful operation additional funds to keep it going. The AFL-CIO is calling for its extension with an additional $2 billion to help finance more job-creating federal, state and local public work projects.

The APW program, approved by Congress in 1962, pumps high-velocity job-creating federal dollars into depressed areas with high unemployment. The APW unemployment requirement is less restrictive than that for areas eligible for aid under the Area Redevelopment Act of 1961.

About 17 percent of all APW funds so far has gone into all-federal projects. The rest has gone into matching-grant payments to help pay for federally approved state-local public works for which no money was available under existing federal grant-in-aid programs such as area redevelopment, water pollution control, airports, hospital and other community facilities construction.

With a multiplier effect in boosting economic activity in local areas and in the nation, APW dollars, going into nearly 8,000 projects in more than 3,000 communities, have opened up an estimated 200,000 job opportunities.

Unless Congress moves fast to continue and to expand the APW program, its success story will soon come to an end. Hundreds of thousands of APW-created jobs will run out, and thousands of communities across America will lose the opportunity to build desirable public facilities of permanent value.

With current unemployment at about 5.5 percent, and with unemployment higher than 5 percent for the past six years, persistently high long-term unemployment is a major national problem. Average monthly unemployment since 1957 has been in excess of 4 million American workers looking for jobs to support themselves and their families. The 1964 tax cut will create jobs—but there is no single, simple solution to the unemployment problem.

Council Statement

The AFL-CIO Executive Council in a February 1964 statement on the "War on Poverty" declared:

"One of the major needs at this time—in addition to other long-range job-expanding actions—is a vast increase in federal outlays for job-creating public works. This will quickly create jobs—including substantial employment opportunities for unskilled and semi-skilled workers—and at the same time provide vitally needed public improvements of permanent worth. Towards this end, the now expiring Public Works Acceleration program should be extended, with a $2 billion appropriation, and similar measures should be enacted which would create jobs producing schools, hospitals, housing, urban redevelopment and other improvements that all communities urgently need."

In spite of the tremendous reserve of unemployed workers, there is a big backlog of community needs throughout the country. There is a backlog of planned and approved federal, state and local public works projects on the shelf—projects waiting only for money to give them the "go" sign to start job-creating construction work. The National Planning Association estimates the total of needed public works at $30 billion.

Congress appropriated only $880 million in 1962 and 1963 for the Accelerated Public Works program. All of this money has now been committed to specific projects. Some 3,000 pending applications, for funds in excess of $900 million, now remain unfilled, and this is only a fraction of the potential demand for APW funds.

Johnson Silent

Although the approved projects are waiting for APW matching grant aid, Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson has not yet given the support of his Administration to the continuation of the program with additional funds, as proposed by the AFL-CIO. And not enough members of the Senate and the House have been raising their voices and pressing for prompt congressional action to continue and to expand the APW program.

The 8,000 job-creating projects previously approved include about 1,200 badly-needed water supply improvement and expansion projects, about 650 sewage waste treatment works, about 600 sewer projects, and over 800 new public buildings such as fire and police stations, courthouses and libraries. They include more than 500 health and recreation projects, 1,150 street and road improvements, and 1,650 conservation and natural resource projects.

Without the federal APW funds authorized in 1962, these projects would not have been started—and more than 200,000 job opportunities opened up directly and indirectly would have been lost.

Types of Projects

APW projects have ranged in size from $2,000 for improvement of fishing facilities in Clearwater, Minn., to $2.3 million for an Eastern Kentucky mountain highway. Here are a few others:

- In San Diego County, Calif., construction of a $3.4 million irrigation project, financed in part by a $1.1 million APW grant, is giving an immediate job boost to the local economy, which has suffered from severe water shortages. When finished, the water transmission and irrigation project will provide water supply and water storage for 145,000 people in the La Mesa area of San Diego County.
- Cimarron, N. M., raised more than $200,000 to match $145,000 in APW grants for water line extensions and sewage system construction. As a result of these APW projects, Cimarron will soon have facilities to support a new electronic company employing 150 workers.
- In Boone County, Ark., an APW grant of $480,000, supplemented by $261,000 in state-local funds, is making possible construction of a nursing home addition to the hospital in Harrison. The new nursing home will provide about 50 permanent new jobs.
- In Carlton, Minn., a $13,000 APW grant, matched by an additional $13,500 in local funds, helped finance water and sewer improvements which enabled a local manufacturing company to expand and employ 50 more workers.

Pittsburgh's Mayor Joseph M. Barr, representing the U.S. Conference of Mayors, testified before the House Public Works Committee last year urging continuation of the APW program.

Creation of Jobs Hailed

"The existing program has not called for federal handouts," he said. "Instead, it has created local-national investments in the future of literally hundreds of large and small municipalities which house millions of our nation's citizens."

After listing 12 APW projects in Pittsburgh, Barr said:

"In order to receive the federal grants, the city had to borrow and furnish $2,716,575 in matching funds. We also had to increase our local capital budget by adding 39 projects costing in the neighborhood of $2.6 million. To put it another way, the $2.6 million which the federal government is providing for Pittsburgh's APW projects, is generating $5.3 million in local expenditures."

In testimony before a Senate subcommittee James M. Gleason, Multnomah County, Ore., commissioner representing the National Association of Counties, also called for continuation of the APW program, and declared:

"I would like to point out that (in Oregon) there have been 105 projects, 30 of them aided with matching funds. There has been provided in Oregon some $11.5 million of federal funds under the Accelerated Public Works program, and it has been matched by approximately $7 million of local funds.

"I think that this is extremely important. Of the 30 matching fund projects, 17 were sewers or sewage projects providing permanent improvements that will help to bring in new industry and take care of the industry and the population that we have at the present time."

From the Detroit area, Gerard H. Coleman, executive director of the Supervisors Inter-County Committee of Southeastern Michigan, told the Senate subcommittee:

"We sincerely believe the Accelerated Public Works program to be one of the finest legislative tools that local government has been able to utilize in pulling up its own 'economic bootstraps' to build needed facilities, such as water supply systems, sewage treatment plants, sewage disposal systems, airports, hospitals.

"It has at the same time provided employment for a large portion of a surplus work force that still numbers over 53,000 in the six-county Detroit metropolitan area."

Douglas Testifies

Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) told the Senate subcommittee that in Illinois "we have had 230 projects approved, and when they are completed, $22,216,000 of federal funds will have been used. An important factor to consider is that the $22,216,000 federal portion will have been matched with $40,950,000 in local funds, coming from the Illinois communities themselves."

Mayor Thomas J. Whelan of Jersey City, N.J., told the same Senate subcommittee:

"We have a city ringed with major highways, a corridor to the entire Eastern United States, yet our municipal roads are strikingly inadequate for the effective movement of traffic. We are trying mightly to induce industry to locate in our city, yet in some areas . . . the city has only old sewer lines which cannot meet the requirements of heavy industries.

"I have been painting an intentionally grim picture, but it is a picture, I think, which with minor variations would reflect the situation in almost every old, big city in the country.

"I have no way of knowing if Jersey City will get one dollar out of the proposed new public works authorization; but I do know that other cities like ours will; and I know they need it."

In urging Congress to extend the Accelerated Public Works Act and provide $2 billion for more job-creating projects, the AFL-CIO convention declared last November:

"A long-range and continuous effort to overtake the nation's critical public service lag is overdue, and the federal government must lead the way. What is more, it is precisely now, when a substantial portion of our labor force and our industrial capacity are under-utilized, that public investment should be substantially increased to close the public service gap.

AFL-CIO Asks Expansion

"The AFL-CIO therefore calls upon Congress to enact a vastly expanded program of job-creating public facilities of permanent value to the nation.

"When the Public Works Acceleration Act was enacted [in 1962], both the Administration and Congress implied that it would be extended . . . if the unemployment rate continued at a very high level. All evidence now indicates that the jobless rate will substantially exceed 5 percent during the year ahead (1964). We therefore urge extension of this act, with an authorization and appropriation of $2 billion, so that an adequate program of increased federal, state and local public works can be continued."

According to U.S. Dept. of Labor studies, a $4 billion injection of construction spending into the economy—$2 billion in federal APW funds plus $2 billion in state and local matching funds — would directly create about 400,000 badly needed him in on-site construction and in production and distribution of building materials and equipment. Another 200,000 to 400,000 jobs would be opened up indirectly.

More jobs—created directly and indirectly by APW spending—are essential to cut the high unemployment rate.

In the House, Rep. John Blatnik (D-Minn.) introduced H.R. 7351, a bill to authorize an additional $900 million for APW. In December 1963 the House Public Works Committee, by a vote of 16 to 15, approved the Blatnik bill. It is now in the House Rules Committee.

A Senate bill, S. 1856, introduced by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), would authorize an additional $1.5 billion for APW. The Senate Public Works Committee held hearings in December 1963 on the APW program.

Write Your Congressman!

Senators and congressmen should be told that there is strong support in their home states and their home districts for continuation of the Accelerated Public Works program with a substantial amount of money.

The AFL-CIO is urging its affiliates and friends to ask their senators and their congressmen for prompt action.

Summary of Key Points In '62 Public Works Act

Here are major provisions of the 1962 Accelerated Public Works Act, which now needs a renewed authorization and appropriation:

- Authorized a $900 million appropriation to speed up construction of public works of enduring value—with $300 million earmarked for depressed rural areas.
- Authorized the President to allocate APW money to start or speed up construction on previously authorized federal public works projects or for state and local public works projects for which federal aid was previously authorized, which could be finished within 12 months, but for which no actual money had been appropriated.
- Made areas eligible for APW aid if they had 6 percent or more unemployment during at least nine of the preceding 12 months or if they were classified as "redevelopment areas" under the more restrictive requirements of the Area Redevelopment Act.
- Authorized the federal share of the cost of a state or local project to be 50 percent and as much as 75 percent if the locality was not economically or financially capable of raising 50 percent of the project funds.

To make sure that APW recipients did not simply reduce their normal capital improvement spending, they were required to increase such spending by an amount approximately equal to the amount of non-federal funds for the APW-aided project.

Labor's Fact Sheets Available to Public

Fact sheets on Accelerated Public Works are available at no charge for mass distribution from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D. C. 20006.

Other 1964 legislative fact sheets still available cover civil rights, medicare, Davis-Bacon fringe benefits, double-time for overtime, extension of wage-hour coverage, youth employment, unemployment compensation, consumer protection, education, congressional reform, housing and mass transit.

UAW Retirees Give to Hospital

Detroit—The nearly 3,000 retired members of Auto Workers Local 154, once employed by the former Hudson Motor Co., have contributed $25,000 to Metropolitan Hospital here to equip 12 new rooms and to provide medical care for themselves.

A check for the sum was presented by Acting Pres. Dan Manley of the local to John Nelson, associate director of the hospital, at a luncheon following a general meeting of the union at which Dr. Leonard S. Rosenfeld, general director of the hospital, outlined the improvements the gift will make possible.

The retired members of Local 154 made a similar gift to the hospital in 1956.

Profits and Jobs

THE FIRST three months of 1964 have produced little if any change in the nation's persistently high levels of unemployment.

The 5.4 percent rate of unemployment for the first quarter is a slight improvement over the average 5.8 percent for the first quarter of 1963. But the net change is something under 1 percent.

This contrasts with what's happening to the economy overall. The gross national product—the total value of all goods and services produced—has increased more than 4 percent, adjusted for price changes, from the first three months of 1963 to the first quarter of the current year. Corporate profits set an all-time record in 1963 and are moving upwards, according to reliable estimates.

The full impact of the tax cut is yet to come, but it has been conceded by many economists that a tax cut alone will not supply the stimulus or the drive that will cut the jobless rate below the 5 percent where it has been for over six years.

On Page 5 of this issue of the AFL-CIO News is a documented presentation on the critical need for extension and expansion of the accelerated public works program. This is one program that can make an immediate impact on unyielding unemployment.

'Not a New War for Us'

THE AFL-CIO has long sought to focus public attention on the paradox of poverty in the midst of plenty, on labor's ceaseless struggle to create decent living standards and respect for human dignity for all Americans.

Pres. George Meany described organized labor's long involvement in this struggle in his opening remarks to the House committee holding hearings on the Administration's anti-poverty program:

"This is not a new war for us in the labor movement. The trade union movement has been engaged in a campaign against poverty and for the improvement of conditions of life and work and opportunity since the first day of its establishment, generations ago in America. The elimination of poverty is and always has been, a primary goal of organized labor and a basic reason for its existence.

"We have not been satisfied merely to elevate and improve the income and opportunities of our own members. We have sought to eliminate the cancer of destitution and want from the vitals of society at large—by our advocacy of free public education, social security legislation, minimum wages and many other measures designed to improve the standards, security and opportunity of all Americans, whether union members or not. Were it not for the efforts and accomplishments of organized labor in America, over the years, I am confident that the problem of poverty in this country would not be one common to a minority of our citizens, but a majority.

"Not all of us in the labor movement have had the personal experience of going hungry in our youth, or were evicted from our homes, or saw our hopes shattered by some act of fate—an industrial accident to the father, the closing of a plant, the illness of a grandparent. But if it did not happen to us, we saw it happen to our friends and neighbors.

"We also saw the workings of those other disasters—being born the 'wrong' color, or raised in the 'wrong' religion, or having the 'wrong' kind of ancestors.

"So as president of the AFL-CIO, I tell you we hate poverty in all its forms and for whatever reason it exists."

In Letter to Senators:

22 Leading Lawyers Uphold Constitutionality of Rights Bill

Twenty-two attorneys, including three former attorneys-general and four past presidents of the American Bar Association, have advised Senators Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.), top managers of the civil rights bill in the Senate, that the public accommodations and fair employment practices sections of the bill are constitutional. The following is the text of their letter to the senators signed by Harrison Tweed of New York and Bernard G. Segal of Philadelphia, co-chairmen of the Lawyers' Committee on Civil Rights. 20 other lawyers joined in the opinion.

WE HAVE RECEIVED your letters addressed separately to each of us, in which you request our views regarding the constitutionality of two parts of H. R. 7152, the proposed "Civil Rights Act of 1963," now pending in the Congress, specifically Title II, prohibiting discrimination in places of public accommodation, and Title VII, providing for equal employment practices by certain employers, employment agencies and labor unions.

Your inquiry requests our opinion either as co-chairmen of the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law or in our individual capacities. We are replying in the latter role, and, in accordance with one of the suggestions in your letter, we have asked a number of other lawyers to consider the questions which you have raised and to join with us in formulating this statement. We want to make it clear that we are expressing our views solely on the constitutional issues raised in your letters and not on the merits of the bill.

Upon careful consideration of the established judicial precedents in this area of constitutional law, and in full recognition of the vital importance of the legal issues which are the subject of this letter, we conclude that Title II and Title VII are within the framework of the powers granted to Congress under the Constitution.

With respect to Title II, the congressional authority for its enactment is expressly stated in the bill to rest on the commerce clause of the Constitution and on the 14th Amendment. The reliance upon both of these powers to accomplish the stated purpose of Title II is sound. Discriminatory practices, though free from any state compulsion, support, or encouragement, may so burden the channels of interstate commerce as to justify, legally, congressional regulation under the commerce clause. On the other hand, conduct having an insufficient bearing on interstate commerce to warrant action under the commerce clause may be regulated by the Congress where the conduct is so attributable to the state as to come within the concept of state action under the 14th Amendment.

THE GROUNDING of the public accommodations title on the commerce clause is in keeping with a long tradition of federal legislation, validated in many judicial decisions, and is not today open to substantial legal dispute. In exercising its power to regulate commerce among the states, Congress has enacted laws, encompassing the widest range of commercial transactions, similar to the regulatory scheme of Title II of H.R. 7152.

It is also clear that the discrimination or segregation prohibited by Title II is subject to regulation by the Congress under its power to enact laws to enforce the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment where there is participation and involvement by state or local public agencies in the unlawful conduct. The decision of the Supreme Court in the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883), in no way prevents the Congress from barring discrimination in those factual circumstances constituting state action under the 14th Amendment.

With respect to the equal employment opportunity provisions of Title VII, there are many decisions of the federal courts upholding under the commerce clause similar laws regulating employment relationships which in some fashion impinge on interstate commerce.

Powers which Congress can exercise under one part of the Constitution may be limited by guarantees found elsewhere in the Constitution. In our opinion, neither Title II nor Title VII imposes such arbitrary restrictions upon private property or on the operation of private business as to conflict with due process requirements. In the development of congressional authority under the commerce clause and other express grants of power, statutes designed to enhance individual rights and to ameliorate working conditions have been regularly upheld by the courts even though they have in some measure affected property or contract rights.

Morgan Says:

Radio, TV Reminded of Stake In Freedom for Broadcasters

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

BROADCASTERS, the men who run the electronic instrumentations of the mass media known as radio and television, are no different basically from other businessmen in their makeup, morals and motivation, even though their stations must be licensed to use a public resource—the air. They are happiest when stations and networks are making a profit. They prefer to pursue this worthy enterprise with a minimum of opposition, whether in the form of competition or governmental regulation. They have developed a certain sense of community service and public responsibility, though with one historic exception this sense has not been overdeveloped. The exception, of course, was the broadcast coverage of the black November weekend of Pres. Kennedy's death. The industry was pleased by the applause from the critics and the public alike for its handling of this tragic assignment. But it was also embarrassed because its own excellence had put broadcasting on the spot. It had proved how good it could be—by violating nearly all the guidelines of its normal daily operation.

Morgan

It was disappointing but not surprising, then, when radio and TV slipped back into their regular routine of, on the whole, mediocre programs.

With some notable exceptions it was, by and large, back to the wasteland that Newton Minow had so eloquently and courageously condemned in a speech to the National Association of Broadcasters in 1961 which the stunned delegates misinterpreted as a sinister bureaucratic libel instead of the serious but friendly warning it was meant to be.

Only a faint whimper of public protest supported Minow's cry which had faded to an echo when the NAB opened its 42nd annual convention in Chicago on Monday. The convention atmosphere was indeed comfortably auspicious. The NAB's own invaluable conscience in the person of its president, ex-Gov. Leroy Collins of Florida, who has made broadcasters more than uncomfortable by reminding them of their public responsibilities, wouldn't let them forget the health issue involved in cigaret advertising but much of his message dealt with the dangers of pay television to the industry. Minow's successor as chairman of the Federal Communciations Commission, 35-year-old E. William Henry of Memphis, had already lost a bid to have the FCC limit the length and number of commercials—thanks to the benevolent intervention of Congress. So it was logical to expect that Henry's maiden speech before the NAB would be as gentle as springtime. What the delegates got was an electric shock delivered in a Tennessee drawl.

Henry served notice that the FCC's efforts to combat over-commercialization were by no means over even though in absence of a rule they would have to be applied on a case-by-case basis.

He warned too that "most radio and television commercials are simply too loud"—and pointedly invited the industry to tone them down. Then he got to his main point: The shockingly ambivalent approach of the broadcasting industry to the issue of freedom. When a limitation on commercials was suggested—no stronger in fact than that contained in the NAB's own code—a storm of protest broke. This was government invasion. But when the freedom of broadcasting was really at stake, who took action? There is no record, Henry said, that a single commercial broadcaster came forward to the FCC on behalf of freedom of speech and freedom of the press in the Pacifica Foundation case.

HE WAS REFERRING to a three-year-old battle over licensing Pacifica's FM radio stations in Los Angeles, Berkeley and New York City. There had been complaints of "obscenity" and "radicalism" because of the foundation's policy of airing esoteric poetry, music and every point of view from Communist to John Bircher. The commission, taking too long about it, nevertheless found the complaints groundless and granted the licenses in a unanimous landmark decision widely hailed as a brave if belated blow for free speech.

But, Henry sharply admonished the broadcasters, "When you display more interest in defending your freedom to suffocate the public with commercials than in upholding your freedom to provide provocative variety—when you cry 'censorship!' and call for faith in the founding fathers' wisdom only to protect your balance sheet—when you remain silent in the face of a threat which could shake the First Amendment's proud oak to its very roots—you tarnish the ideals enshrined in the Constitution and invite an attitude of suspicion. You join the forces of crass complacency—in an industry and at a time in the history of this nation when complacency of any sort is both misplaced and dangerous."

Move over, Gov. Collins and Newton Minow, and make room on the mourner's bench for another responsible citizen trying to help save broadcasting from itself.

Washington Reports:

Rowan Views USIA Objectives As Presenting Truth in Context

GREAT NUMBERS of Russian people have begun listening to Voice of America broadcasts since the Soviet Union stopped jamming programs beamed into that country, Carl Rowan, new director of the U.S. Information Agency, reported in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

Rowan said that the USIA has no means of measuring its Soviet audience, but reports have been encouraging. He also reported that a U.S. graphic arts exhibit, shown so far in three Russian cities, has attracted crowds many blocks long.

"Some of the comments," he said, "have indicated that the people were perhaps more eager to talk with the guides and ask questions about how we live in the U.S. than in seeing the exhibit."

He said "the basic message of the exhibit was the freedom and great diversity of expression that is not only tolerated but encouraged in the U.S."

The main USIA objective, the new director declared, is to present the truth. This, he said, can only be done by providing sufficient background information to put a fact or event into context.

He cited as an example the treatment of the anti-segregation riots in the South that occurred while he was ambassador to Finland.

"I RECALL seeing in Finland newspapers front-page photographs of police dogs, fire hoses and demonstrators being dragged through the streets," he said.

"What we did was to use the material the USIA sent out showing that all this was just one aspect of the many things happening in civil rights in this country. The people of Finland would not otherwise have been aware of the complete picture. Often specific truth can be misleading without the background, without its being put in proper context."

In this instance, Rowan declared, foreigners had to be informed of policies and activities in the Executive, Judicial and Legislative branches of the government.

The new USIA director stated that he had gained helpful background for the post as ambassador to Finland, where he could observe USIA work in the field; as a USIA lecturer in India, Pakistan, and Southeast Asia; and through assignments by his paper, the Minneapolis Tribune, to cover the United Nations, Khrushchev's visit to the U.S., the Bandung conference, and stories in Asia and Africa.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE WISCONSIN triumphal shouts of Alabama's Gov. George C. Wallace will frighten northern supporters of the civil rights bill about a so-called "white backlash" only if they lose their sense of proportion and sense of the realities.

Gov. Wallace is crowing raucously that he got a lot of votes against Gov. John W. Reynolds in the Democratic primary and that this proves northerners as well as southerners are against "centralized government." He says it proves Wisconsin citizens don't want the "central government" to dictate to their local schools. He says he is going to prove it in Indiana and Maryland, also, when he runs in Democratic primaries.

Who ever supposed that civil rights was not a national problem, or that all the voters of northern states were unanimous in supporting any particular proposed bill—particularly one that impinges on ancient suspicions, darkling fears and ingrained thought patterns in the delicate problem of relations between races?

The issue is not whether the "central government" will "dictate" to anyone in Wisconsin or Alabama, but whether Wallace can befuddle supposedly responsible members in the House and Senate into deserting a commitment to high concepts of the meaning of American life, the right of every person to a fair opportunity in schooling and jobs, to live in self-respect and a sense of personal integrity that are respected by the community at large.

Wallace once lost an Alabama primary because he was "outsegged" by an opponent, and he vowed he would never be "outsegged" again. His sought-after notoriety now is deeply disturbing to many southern members of Congress, including some now in the routine of a filibuster.

FOR THE RECORD, the vote in the 1964 Democratic Wisconsin primary fell some 70,000 short of the vote in 1960, when Sen. Humphrey of Minnesota and the then Sen. Kennedy of Massachusetts were in a hot contest in a genuine drive for the presidency—not a paper-tiger matter between a Southerner who really isn't running and a "favorite son" governor merely standing in for Pres. Johnson.

The total vote in both Republican and Democratic primaries this year dropped about 125,000 below the 1,192,000 cast in 1960, when Humphrey and Kennedy had at each other and then Vice Pres. Nixon, who didn't even enter the state to make a speech, was on the GOP ballot.

There was an obvious "crossover" of Republican and Democratic voters in the Wisconsin open primaries—the worried, the aggrieved, the apprehensive, the bitter-enders casting about 25 percent of the total for Wallace.

Rep. John W. Byrnes, a Wisconsin native son who is chairman of the Republican House Policy Committee, fell below 300,000 in GOP votes—well behind the 341,000 rolled up for the non-campaigning Nixon four years ago.

Wallace "segged" and "segged" in full-page newspaper advertisements, in rabble-rousing, and he scored most heavily in "Democratic" votes in territory that normally goes overwhelmingly to the GOP in general elections.

Is this supposed to make such Republicans as Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel of California, the GOP Senate floor leader for the rights bill, desert his decent principles and honorable convictions in spurious fear of a "white backlash" stirred up in what was basically a vacuum—a supposed contest that involved nothing to affect in any way the nominees of the Republican and Democratic conventions next summer?

Reynolds, the Wisconsin governor, got more votes than Kennedy did in 1960; he won all convention votes from Wallace including 30 district delegates and 20 delegates at large.

Wallace isn't running for anything nationally; he might make election prospects more difficult for the only southern-state President chosen in two generations. He may foolishly set back the gradual reunification of the country—a real and developing reunification based on mutual respect and tolerance, which Pres. Johnson, then Senate leader, advanced in the civil rights bills of 1957 and 1960. Any senator tempted to fearfulness needs to consult reality and his conscience.

CARL ROWAN, new director of the U.S. Information Agency, left, declares that "the truth in perspective" must be the object of Voice of America news broadcasts and other USIA activities. He was interviewed for the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People, by Harry W. Flannery.

Cost of College Education Loan Sometimes Outrageously High

By Sidney Margolius

WITH COLLEGE costs soaring, borrowing has become the fastest-growing method of financing post-high school education. Some finance companies and insurance firms especially are pushing the idea of borrowing to go to college. Deveraux Josephs, chairman of the New York Life Insurance Co. and recently chairman of a government committee on higher education, even recommended that colleges raise fees to charge the student "the full cost of his education, and what the student or parents cannot pay from past savings and current earnings, they should borrow."

One of the most shocking practices this writer has encountered is the large number of well-known colleges that recommend high-cost loan companies to students in their catalogs in ignorance or disregard of the true costs of such loans.

Recently Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) has been criticizing education loans offered by finance companies which charge parents the equivalent of true per annum interest of 26 percent and more, and in two cases, 54-60 percent. These examples were based on a survey by the magazine of the Credit Union National Association.

Parents and students need to understand that a so-called "$4,000 plan" offered by a bank or finance company operating a "tuition" or "education plan" is not really a $4,000 loan. As this department previously has pointed out, the money is advanced only for each semester or quarter at a time. Thus, the lender really may advance only $500 at a time on a "$4,000 plan." This is a $500 loan, not a $4,000 loan.

In the case of the very high rates cited by the credit union researchers and Hartke, the true per annum cost is especially steep because the borrower really prepays part of his loan. For example, for a $1,000-a-year tuition plan for four years, on which the lender really advances $500 at a time, the borrower repays $106 a month for 40 months. The $240 of finance charge is only somewhat higher than the typical $150 to $200 charged for similar four-year plans by banks and other lenders. But in this case, the payments are completed in 40 months, instead of the usual 48 months. Thus, during the last few months, the borrower has prepaid some of the money he supposedly is borrowing.

The finance company charging this rate argues that the credit unions and Hartke have not taken into account the fact that insurance is included in the cost of the loan. The company also points out that it does not charge late fees as do some other lenders, and in case of prepayment, gives a full rebate of the remaining finance charge, instead of the more usual proportionate rebate.

Granting these points, the finance charge still is high since the insurance provided is merely inexpensive decreasing term insurance, for which the more moderate-cost banks charge 50 cents a year for each $100 borrowed. Thus, on what is actually a $500 loan, the insurance is worth about $2.50 a year.

In the finance company plans we ourselves have studied, the true per annum rates, after allowing for the value of the life insurance, often do run from 13 to 37 percent. For example, an $800 one-year "plan" offered by one company advances $400 a semester, repaid in eight installments of $104. The borrower pays back in four monthly payments at a finance charge of $16. This is the equivalent of a per annum interest rate of approximately 37 percent, after allowing for the insurance, since the average debt during those four months is only $125, and you have the use of the money for only one-third of a year.

THERE IS NO NEED to pay such rates. The AFL-CIO Dept. of Education points out that the National Defense Education Act provides student loans at a true interest rate of 3 percent. Nor does the interest charge begin until after the student graduates. You have 10 years to repay (actually 11 since you don't have to begin repayments until a year after graduation). Moreover, if you go into teaching, you will have 10 percent of your loan cancelled for each year you teach, up to 50 percent. For students interested in teaching, Defense Act loans actually can serve as a kind of partial scholarship.

If you can't get a Defense Act loan, or other loan directly from your college, here are other sources in order of increasing cost:

State-sponsored college loans: Among states that now have their own or semi-official programs of college loans are Florida, Illinois, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Virginia, Wisconsin and Wyoming.

United Student Aid Fund loans are now available through more than 400 colleges in some 41 states, usually those that do not have their own state programs. The interest rate is a reasonable true 6 percent per annum, including credit life insurance. No payments are required until after graduation.

Home-town, religious, and nationality organizations have a student loan fund at low cost. These organizations include PTA's, high schools, women's clubs, churches, civic organizations as Rotarians and Elks, the Grange, fraternal organizations and many others. In some cases, loans are limited to members; in other cases, any applicant is eligible. Your high school can tell you about local loan funds.

New Job Titles Pop Up So Fast You Don't Know Whom to Envy

By Jane Goodsell

WHAT EVER HAPPENED to the doctors, lawyers, merchants and candlestick makers of yore?
They don't seem to be around anymore.
People nowadays have such complicated jobs that
I can't figure out what they do.
Can you?

When the man sitting next to me at dinner tells me that he's a cryogenic fluids engineer, specializing in vacuum work and heat transfer,
I don't know how to answer.

His line of work is so bewildering to me
That I don't know whether he does it with a broom or a Ph.D.;
Nor am I any wiser
If he says he's a maintenance engineer or an executive compensation specialist or an operational researcher analyzer.
While all of these jobs undoubtedly are respectable. worthwhile roles,
I don't know whether they're performed in offices or banks or airplanes or upside-down strapped to telephone poles.

TO ADD TO MY CONFUSION, I mix up osteopaths with orthopods and podiatrists with pediatricians,
And I can't for the life of me distinguish ophthalmologists from oculists from opticians.

I don't know the difference between a chiropractor and a chiropodist,
And I can't tell a paleontologist from a philatelist from a lepidopterist.

What with psychiatrists and psychologists and psychotherapists and psychoanalysts, I'm going berserk.
A gentleman at a cocktail party confided to me that he had a cousin who was a criminal psychopath, and I answered, "My, that must be an interesting line of work."

BSEIU Publishes Aid to Consumers

A new consumer newsletter, "Dollars and Sense", has been introduced by the Building Service Employes.

The newsletter is being offered in quantity, free of charge, to all BSEIU locals so they can be distributed either at membership meetings or by sending them to members' homes.

In a letter to local unions announcing the publication, Pres. David Sullivan said the newsletter will serve several educational objectives.

"It will appeal to both the member and his family," he said. "It will bring useful consumer information which can save the family time and money. It will also carry pro-union messages, and information about political developments aimed at alerting the member and his family to the need for political action."

Sullivan noted that the publication will be basically a venture in consumer education, "the need for which has been widely noted on the national scene in the last several years."

The first issue of "Dollars and Sense" discusses such items of importance to consumers as interest rates on loans, tips on buying clothing and groceries, and new developments in household equipment. It also explains legislative proposals now pending including the "truth in lending and packaging bills", and the food and drug bill.

New Area Developed:

Recreation Facilities Increased by TVA

THE TENNESSEE Valley Authority is creating a wholly new kind of outdoor recreation facility—Land Between the Lakes—in an area in Western Kentucky and Tennessee, bounded on three sides by water.

The 170,000-acre wooded peninsula with 300 miles of shoreland will be devoted to a wide variety of recreation uses. There will be group camps and family-sized camping spaces. Primitive camping areas will be available for those who want to rough it. Nature trails as well as fishing will be available; there will be hunting, and opportunities for all kinds of water sports. A few camping areas are expected to be ready for use this summer.

Pres. C. C. Hobbs of the Tennessee Valley Trades & Labor Council has hailed the development, pointing out that "the people of America are finding more time for pleasurable leisure activities, and, happily, we are using much of this time to return to the outdoor way of life."

"From labor's standpoint," Hobbs said, "the availability of wholesome outdoor recreation opportunities is becoming increasingly important to the successful operation of our industrial establishments. The Land Between the Lakes project will be of tremendous value in filling this need for workers' families of the Eastern United States."

Land Between the Lakes, announced in June 1963 and launched in January, 1964, will serve not only campers from the Southeast, but from areas as far away as Chicago, New York, and Philadelphia. The area is within a day's drive of a fourth of the nation's population, and less than two days away for 70 million people.

WHEN FULLY DEVELOPED, TVA expects recreation use of the area to reach 7 to 10 million "visitor-days" annually—a level of use several times as intensive as in areas where preservation of natural features is a primary objective.

In connection with plans for the outdoor education aspects of the program, assembly buildings where conservation and nature study activities may be held, living exhibits, and guided tours and lectures are planned. Visitors who prefer air-conditioned lodges to camping will find accommodations available across the lakes, making daytime visits to the Land Between the Lakes.

Boat launching and mooring areas are being constructed wherever there is a concentration of shoreline campsites—generally every few miles. There will be no limitation on the size of boats. The large, deep bodies of water provide ample draft for the largest of inland water craft and the numerous small coves are readily accessible to small boats.

TVA also plans to create new wildlife resources. Under the preliminary outlines for the multiple-use development, much of the 170,000 acre site will be devoted to wildlife management, migratory waterfowl and bird sanctuaries. Consistent with these purposes, TVA says it envisions areas for hunting deer, wild turkeys, grouse, quail, and other small upland game now in the area. In addition, the federal agency is exploring the possibility of introducing other species.

AFL-CIO Researchers Hold:

Workweek Cut Is 'Overdue' As Job-Creating Measure

A shorter workweek for the employed will create jobs and help reverse the upward trend in unemployment, "America's number one domestic problem," the AFL-CIO has declared in an analysis in the April issue of its monthly magazine, The American Federationist.

The analysis, titled "Shorter Hours to Create Jobs," was prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research. It pointed out that the past decade has seen unemployment soar from less than 2 million to more than 4 million, with an additional 2.3 million workers forced on part-time.

A series of measures are needed to achieve and maintain full employment, the analysis asserted, but reduction of the workweek is one step long overdue.

"It is time to move forward—by amending the Fair Labor Standards Act to establish a 35-hour workweek and double-time pay for overtime work," the Dept. of Research declared.

"Unemployment is America's number one domestic problem," it continued, "it is undermining the nation's strength, poisoning race relations and creating difficulties in labor-management relations.

"There is no one-shot cure-all for this serious and growing problem. The tax cut adopted in March 1964 will lift economic activities and prevent the onset of a 1964 recession.

"But the tax cut alone cannot reduce joblessness to a minimum and keep it there. Additional measures are required, such as a great increase in public works programs, extension of federal minimum wage coverage to millions of unprotected, low-wage workers and an increase in the minimum wage to $2 an hour.

"Reduction of working hours and an increase in the overtime premium to discourage employers from scheduling overtime work are elements of the needed series of measures to increase employment and ease the growing job displacement that results from automation."

The AFL-CIO researchers noted that in the ten-year period, 1953-63, the civilian labor force increased by 8.9 million, total employment rose by 6.6 million and the number of unemployed increased by 2.3 million.

"Jobs were provided for only about three-quarters of the increase in the labor force," the analysis observed, adding that the record "is considerably worse than these bare figures indicate."

Those counted as employed, it noted, include the millions of workers compelled to work part-time because fulltime work is unavailable, and an estimated 1 to 2 million additional workers were left uncounted because they despaired and stopped seeking work.

Tracing the job changes of the past decade, the analysis said some 4 million jobs disappeared in such key sectors as agriculture, factory production and maintenance, railways, mining and utilities. The job rises came mostly in the low-paying service and retail trade industries, in office work and in school systems.

Trends Could 'Worsen'

Even with "these shocking trends" of the past decade, the problem could worsen in the future, the analysis warned. The labor force is expected to increase during the rest of the decade by 1.4 million a year—about 50 percent faster than in the past decade. At the same time, with automation moving into the clerical and retail fields, recent productivity has risen to 3.5 percent a year compared to 3 percent for the 1947-60 period.

Professor A. J. Jaffe of Columbia University was cited as forecasting that continuance of the job growth rate of the 1950's would boost unemployment to 9 million by 1970, doubling the present high jobless rate to 11 percent.

"The No. 1 reality is the need for jobs," the AFL-CIO stressed—4 to 4.5 million new jobs each year until 1970.

A key part of the effort in creating these jobs is a reduction in the workweek, it added, asserting that historically such a reduction is overdue. It noted that the 4 or 5-hour cut each decade since 1900 leveled off to a 3-hour reduction after 1949.

In a series of calculations based on U. S. Dept. of Labor statistics, the AFL-CIO asserted that double-time for overtime would result in the hiring of sizeable numbers of now jobless workers; that each 1-hour cut in the workweek with no decrease in pay would create from 500,000 to 1 million jobs; that the cost could be easily absorbed within the context of rising productivity; that gradual hours reduction, high profit margins and selected price increases all can ease the adjustments.

Joblessness In March Holds At 5.4% Rate

The rate for women held steady at 5.6 percent and the rate for teenagers moved up to 14.4 percent, the report added.

As a result, total unemployment declined seasonally by 231,000 to 4.3 million and the key seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment remained at 5.4 percent, the report said.

This means 54 of every 1,000 persons in the labor force were actively seeking jobs and could not find them.

Down from January

The 5.4 percent jobless rate for March and February is down from January's 5.6 percent and compares to 5.7 percent for March a year ago.

The March report also showed a worsening of the situation for the longterm jobless—those out of work 15 weeks or longer.

The ranks of the longterm unemployed increased by 150,000 to 1.3 million. This group moved up over 1 million after resting on a plateau of 900,000 in the latter half of 1963.

In the postwar period, the longterm jobless reached a high for the month of 1.9 million in March 1961 and a low for the month of 280,000 in March 1953.

In terms of overall employment, the Labor Dept. said the gain of a half-million, bringing the total to 68.5 million, was just in line with seasonal expectations because the non-farm job gain was offset by delays in the farm sector's spring build-up.

Counted among the employed were 2.1 million persons on part-time for economic reasons, unchanged from February.

The total labor force increased by 300,000 as expected to 75.6 million, the report added.

Taking a longer view with the close of the first quarter, the Labor Dept. saw the job situation "moderately improved" compared to the first quarter of 1963. The key jobless rate of 5.4 percent for the first quarter of this year was down from 5.8 percent a year earlier, due chiefly to the improvement for adult men.

Governor Lauds CSA Counseling

Des Moines, Ia.—One hundred and ten members of 45 Des Moines area unions who completed a community services activities counseling course sponsored by the Polk County AFL-CIO were told by Gov. Harold E. Hughes (D) at their graduating exercises that such courses "help the labor movement collectively to attain the better public image it deserves."

"Everything you do," he said, "to encourge laboring people to inform themselves on public issues, to vote consistently, to take part in community service and school activities, to participate in the splendid welfare activities sponsored by unions—everything you can do along these lines is good for labor and good for Iowa."

The governor said the story of "what organized labor has done to make this state a better place in which to live" should be better known.

Union, Industry Set Painting Week

National Painting & Decorating Week will be observed June 15-19 in accordance with action by the executive board of the Painters and by the Painting & Decorating Contractors of America.

The labor and employer groups each voted to send copies of their resolutions to Pres. Johnson with a request that he use his "good office" and make it "a truly national" week by Presidential proclamation. Copies also have been sent the governors of the 50 states requesting that they also proclaim the week.

8 Steel Firms Indicted On Anti-Trust Charges

New York—A federal grand jury has indicted eight major steel companies on charges of conspiring to fix prices of carbon sheet steel over a six-year period in a series of meetings in the city's hotels.

The charges are similar to those returned against the electrical equipment industry in 1959 which eventually resulted in 29 companies being fined, seven corporate officials being jailed and 24 others receiving suspended sentences.

The carbon sheet steel portion of the industry averages about $3.6 annually, about one-fourth of the dollar volume of finished steel products. The eight defendants account for about $2 billion of this business.

The indictments, charging violations of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, said company men met in hotel rooms in New York City—the Biltmore and Sheraton East among others—and agreed both on the amounts to be charged for carbon sheet steel "extras" and on uniform standards.

As a result, according to the indictments, carbon steel prices were fixed at arbitrary, non-competitive levels and purchasers were deprived of the benefit of competition.

The indictments grew out of an investigation ordered by the late Pres. Kennedy in April 1962 after the steel industry had raised basic prices $6 per ton and Kennedy had termed the action "irresponsible defiance of the public interest." The companies rescinded the price boosts. Kennedy's anger at the price hikes stemmed in part from the fact that the Steelworkers had concluded a new contract with the industry that had been widely hailed as non-inflationary.

Named in the indictments were: U.S. Steel, Bethlehem Steel Co., National Steel Corp., Great Lakes Steel Corp., Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., Armco Steel Corp., Republic Steel Corp. and Wheeling Steel Corp. Also named were James P. Barton, assistant general manager, administrative service, U.S. Steel, and W. J. Stephens, assistant vice president of Bethlehem Steel and currently president of Jones & Laughlin.

The maximum penalty for each corporate defendant is a $50,000 fine. The maximum penalty for each individual defendant is a year in prison and a $50,000 fine.

Manufacturing Profits Hit All-Time High in '63

Profits of U.S. manufacturing corporations soared to a record all-time high in 1963, topping the 1962 figures by $1.8 billion after taxes, the government reported.

The profit increase, according to the Securities & Exchange Commission and the Federal Trade Commission, registered 11 percent for durable goods and 9 percent for non-durable items. Sales in the two categories increased 7 and 5 percent, respectively, over 1962 levels.

The total profit take after taxes for manufacturing corporations was $19.5 billion, compared to $17.7 billion a year earlier.

The government's report was supplemented by the April Monthly Economic Letter of the First National City Bank, which said all corporations registered a 9 percent gain in profits in 1963 with manufacturing firms showing a 10 percent rise and transportation industries registering an 18 percent boost.

Profit margins for manufacturers figured per sales dollar moved to 5.7 cents compared to 5.5 cents in 1962 and as a percentage of return on net worth increased to 11.5 percent compared to the earlier figure of 10.9 percent.

The bank's compilation of financial reports of 2,069 non-financial corporations for 1963 showed:

- A 9 percent increase in profits over 1962.
- A 6 percent increase in depreciation allowances.
- An 8 percent increase in cash flow—the more precise measurement of profits including after-tax earnings plus depreciation allowances.
- A 7 percent increase in dividends.
- An 11 percent increase in retained income.

After citing these figures, the bank complained that "earnings still have a long way to go" to match profit levels in past periods of prosperity. It added:

"Public opinion polls have consistently shown that people generally have exaggerated notions about how large profits actually are . . ."

The bank noted also that although "over-all profits reached a new record," there has been "only a limited improvement in profitability."

Manpower Act Report:

Training Aid Cited As Boon to Unskilled

Operations of the Manpower Development & Training Act for the full calendar year of 1963 have demonstrated that training programs offer a "significant" step forward in helping workers enter or re-enter the labor market and are especially useful in meeting the problems of the unskilled, Congress has been told.

Parallel reports by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Anthony J. Celebrezze pointed out that training had been offered in more than 500 occupations, that 166,000 persons had entered training, that 70 percent of those completing courses had obtained jobs in fields related to their training.

Calling for a shift in emphasis to assign higher priority to those in greatest need—"school dropouts, delinquents, older workers, nonwhite workers, the mentally and physically handicapped, and workers in rural areas"—Wirtz also stressed that "the concept" of public training programs "has proved reliable and successful."

At the same time, Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning in a briefing session warned that the program was grinding to a slowdown for lack of funds, with $110 million in appropriated money nearly exhausted and with a request for an additional $55 million, already authorized, stuck in the House Appropriations Committee.

The Administration has asked a major expansion of the program, urging authorization of more than $400 million for the fiscal year beginning July 1. In the meantime, between 15,000 and 20,000 potential trainees are awaiting approval of the supplemental $55 million for the current fiscal year.

Experience in the program has revealed a need for greater emphasis on literacy and communication, Celebrezze's report declared. Individuals should be trained for a "group of related skills in a general field," it stated, and this should include training for "newly-emerging occupations."

A majority of trainees in 1963 were between 22 and 44 years of age, Wirtz told Congress, and the "typical" trainee was a young adult with family responsibilities, the head of a household and the primary wage earner in that household.

Most of the trainees were high school graduates, but in the 18-to-24-year age bracket, "nearly 34 percent were school dropouts." Nearly half of all trainees had been jobless for 15 weeks or more prior to training enrollment, Wirtz continued.

The program has worked best "for those equipped to take advantage of it," that is, the high-school graduate or college-trained person "with deep and permanent attachment to the labor force."

The program beginning July 1, he said, is intended to bring effective help to young people in "the areas where much of our unemployment has its roots—the brackets where lack of schooling disqualified a young man or woman not only from jobs but from training for jobs."

Entry Curbs Imposed On Alien Entertainers

Employers seeking to import foreign actors and other entertainers for performances in this country will be required to obtain a U.S. Employment Service certificate that no "qualified" and jobless U.S. nationals are available "capable of performing in the same capacity," Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz announced.

Wirtz said recent experience "has shown a need for protecting the wages and employment opportunities" of U.S. professional entertainers including "principally actors, actresses and night club entertainers."

Foreign performers have previously been exempt from Immigration Act requirements for temporary visas for professional appearances in this country. Wirtz said that after conferences with the Immigration & Naturalization Service the Labor Dept. decided to end the automatic exemption.

The new policy, he said, would apply to foreign performers "who have no unique talents." This is interpreted as indicating clearance for an entertainer of major stature, such as a high-ranking actor or musician of concert status, but a policy protecting the work opportunities of rank-and-file U.S. nationals.

Both Actors Equity and the Musicians have pressed the Dept.. of Labor for protection of American nationals against wholesale importation of acting companies and musicians' groups.

AFM Pres. Herman D. Kenin recently pointed out that complaints against foreign performers do not concern "cultural artists or cultural instrumental groups but are directed solely against . . . foreign instrumentalist entertainers appearing on television, in clubs and ballrooms, and similar commercial ventures."

Jobs Threatened

American stage performers have urged that the importation of totally foreign casts for stage shows deprived U.S. actors and actresses of job opportunities they would normally expect in Broadway and other commercial ventures.

The U.S. Employment Service designated three offices—in New York, Chicago and Los Angeles—as specialists in handling temporary visa applications for foreign entertainers. Producers and employers of entertainers were warned that they should allow at least 30 days for a determination to be made in each application for the entry of a foreign performer.

In a similar area involving job opportunities for U.S. performers, the Screen Extras Guild has renewed endorsement of a pending bill requiring disclosure in films and film advertising of the country of origin of movie and television productions. Many such films are the products of U.S. "runaway" firms which operate "at the expense of American film workers" without disclosing that fact, the union charged.

Screen Extras Seek Pay Hike, Fringe Gains

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Extras Guild has asked wage increases, health and welfare plan improvements and higher holiday and vacation pay in bargaining proposals made to the Association of Motion Picture & TV Producers and other signers of the SEG basic agreement.

The present contract, in effect since July 1, 1960, expires June 30.

The proposed pay boosts include an increase for general extras from the present $25.47 a day to $30; stand-ins, from $23.59 to $30 with an additional $25 for a stand-in for more than one actor; and dress extras and straight riding, $33.54 to $37.

The proposed changes in the health and welfare plan would extend coverage to dependents. On holiday and vacation pay, the SEG is asking for the same allowances paid other daily employes in the motion picture industry—2.449 percent for holiday pay and 4 percent for vacation pay.

Among other improvements the union asked are recognition as exclusive bargaining agent for all work within its jurisdiction exclusive of New York; TV residual payments for extras, and extension of the Hollywood extra zone from a 300-mile radius to 900 miles.

The SEG negotiating committee consists of Tony Regan, Margaret Bacon, Joe Brooks, Jack Clinton, Carmen Nisbet, Murray Pollack, Norman Stevans, H. O'Neil Shanks and Robert W. Gilbert.

Rubber Union Affirms Stand On Doubletime

Rubber Workers Pres. George Burdon assured a House Labor subcommittee that his union strongly supports legislation to require doubletime pay for overtime work—and "deeply resents" allegations to the contrary by Rep. William H. Ayres (R-O.).

Burdon wrote Subcommittee Chairman Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.) "in order that the record might be crystal clear" that the URW favors boosting the overtime premium so that employers will hire additional workers instead of scheduling "excessive overtime."

Burdon said Ayres, during a recent hearing on overtime pay legislation, "attempted to give the impression" that the URW does not favor the double time proposal.

"Nothing could be further from the truth," he declared.

Labor Aide Renamed To Hill-Burton Panel

Lisbeth Bamberger, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, has been named by Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to a second four-year term on the Federal Hospital Council as one of six public representatives.

The 12-member council advises the U.S. Public Health Service and the surgeon general in the Hill-Burton Act's program of federal aid for hospital construction and must approve all general regulations implementing the act. The surgeon general serves as chairman ex officio.

Hirings, Layoffs Drop Seasonally

The hiring and layoff rates in manufacturing showed normal seasonal declines between January and February, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Factory hirings dropped from 36 per 1,000 workers in January to 32 in February for a seasonally adjusted rate of 38 per 1,000—virtually unchanged over the month. Some hard goods industries reported declines in hirings which were less than anticipated.

Layoffs dropped from 20 to 15 per 1,000, the usual decrease for this time of year, and showed what the BLS called a "not significantly changed" seasonally adjusted rate for February of 17 per 1,000. The quit rate, which has moved only seasonally for 2½ years, was 11 per 1,000 workers.

95c Florida Farm Rate Held Too Little, Too Late

The Meat Cutters have charged that the government's importation of foreign farm workers for big growers promotes "political blackmail" and "corrodes" democratic processes.

The union said the reimposition of a 95-cent an hour adverse effect rate for Florida farm workers is "too little and too late."

The suspension of the 95-cent minimum for some six and a half months carried the growers through the peak of the harvest at wage scales as low as 70 cents an hour, the union added. Workers from the Bahamas and the West Indies have been regularly imported to harvest fruits and vegetables in Florida.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz recently ordered the 95-cent minimum to go into effect Apr. 15. He acted under his authority to prevent adverse effect on American workers. Under the law, growers must offer domestic workers at least the minimum he set before foreign workers can be imported on grounds of a labor shortage.

Rate Still 'Miserable'

"Unfortunately," declared Meat Cutters' Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman, "the reestablishment of the 95 cents an hour rate, some six and one-half months after the suspension, is too little and too late."

They added that the 95-cent rate "is still a miserable, poverty-causing wage."

"The same political pressures which caused the adverse effect rate suspension caused this provision to go often unenforced," they charged. "Florida farm workers have gone unemployed while foreign labor was imported into Florida from the Bahamas and West Indies."

As long as the federal government imports foreign farm workers the union said, Pres. Johnson's war on poverty is "negated."

"Also, as long as the foreign farm labor importation programs exist," the union declared, "they will be the source of political blackmail in Washington . . . The effect on due process in our government can only be corrosive."

Mrs. FDR Foundation Head Named

New York—Appointment of Orin Lehman as director of the labor-backed Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation has been announced by Ambassador Adlai E. Stevenson, chairman of the foundation.

Lehman was closely identified with Mrs. Roosevelt and currently is teaching a course on the Age of Franklin D. Roosevelt at the New School for Social Research, where he also serves as a trustee. He has been a director of the U.S. Committee for the United Nations, treasurer of the National Urban League, secretary-treasurer of the American Jewish Committee, an adviser to the New York State Commission Against Discrimination and a member of state and national committees on employment of the handicapped.

In the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation post he succeeds Hyman H. Bookbinder, who has become executive assistant to R. Sargent Shriver in the poverty 'war.'

4,000 Gather:

N.Y. Labor Rally Pushes Rights Bill

New York — Four thousand New York City union members pledged a strong fight to help end the Senate filibuster on the civil rights bill at a rally sponsored by the AFL-CIO Central Labor Council.

A near-capacity crowd of organized workers, who went to the meeting at Manhattan Center after a full day's work, unanimously adopted a program calling for job equality for Negroes, Puerto Ricans and other miniority groups, integrated quality education, and full and equal citizenship for all Americans.

The unionists adopted a resolution commending the national AFL-CIO for its stand on civil rights and urging immediate passage of the civil rights bill without weakening amendments. The resolution asked all affiliates to press for passage of the bill and to form labor management committees to demonstrate support for the legislation. It also urged union members to write and visit their senators, urging them to back the measure, and to initiate neighborhood rallies in support of it.

Mayor Robert F. Wagner, addressing the crowd, predicted that the civil rights filibuster "is going to be broken." In allusion to "four freedoms" enunciated by the late Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Wagner asserted that a fifth has been added in the form of "freedom from discrimination and segregation."

"This isn't a matter of special privilege for some," the mayor declared. "It is a matter of basic rights for each and all—the basic right of a mother to be able to buy a glass of milk for her hungry child at the roadside inn, even though the color of the child's skin is black.

"America has to grow up to its world responsibilities and dignities, and Congress must lay down the standards of decency. Stealing an automobile and transporting it across a state line is a federal offense today. Why shouldn't it also be a federal offense to steal a man's dignity and degrade him on account of the color of his skin?"

Other speakers who moved the audience of union workers to spirited cheering included Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO, Pres. David Sullivan, of the Building Service Employes, a member of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee; Louis Simon, chairman of the CLC Civil Rights Committee and manager of the Clothing Workers' Laundry Joint Board; and William H. Oliver, chairman of the Fair Practices & Anti-Discrimination Dept. of the Auto Workers.

Sullivan noted that when America needed soldiers during past wars she made no distinction over the color of their skin. He also stressed the importance of messages and petitions to legislators from working men and women. Simon, chairman of the meeting, observed that unions have never been complacent about the problem of civil rights. He pointed out that the city central body's civil rights committee has been behind the civil rights fight ever since it was brought into sharp focus. Oliver called for a coalition of labor, church and civil rights groups to help overcome the filibuster and obtain passage of the civil rights bill.

House Passes Food Stamp, Wheat Bills

program, passed by a 229-189 margin.

In a checkered history a, "pilot" plan authorizing distribution of surplus foods by a food stamp plan was approved by Congress in the Eisenhower Administration but the President declined to place it into effect.

In his first executive order in 1961, Kennedy directed the Agriculture Dept. to implement a pilot plan, but lack of funds blocked its extension on a nationwide and long-term basis.

The House Agriculture Committee killed a stamp program temporarily in February when it became entangled in civil-rights politics. A revised plan was cleared in March.

Proved Superior

The AFL-CIO convention last November said that the pilot food stamp program had proved "superior in every way" to other types of surplus food distribution. It said a nationwide program, allowing recipients to use food stamps to buy direct from merchants, offered "a wider choice of foods and greater dignity . . . to millions of families whose poverty deprives them of adequate diets."

The House had not acted on a wheat support bill, and sent to the Senate only a cotton bill designed among other things to eliminate the two-price system under which U.S. cotton sold in world markets at lower prices than American textile producers pay.

The Senate attached a revised wheat price support program and the bill went to the House floor for an up-or-down vote on accepting the Senate amendments. It was passed in a cliff-hanging rollcall, 211 to 202, with Speaker John W. McCormack gaveling down Republican efforts to force a delay.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller in a statement filed with the Senate Agriculture Committee last February pointed out that hundreds of U.S. textile mills had closed and hundreds of thousands of textile jobs had been lost partly because of the $42.50-a-bale price advantage foreign mills enjoyed in buying raw cotton.

BIPARTISAN TEAM which steered the civil rights bill to House passage, House Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) and Rep. William M. McCulloch (R-O.), was honored by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. at its annual congressional dinner. Left to right: IUD Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey, Celler, McCulloch and IUD Pres. Walter P. Reuther.

Pay Data Rule Left Standing By High Court

A National Labor Relations Board decision holding the Timkin Roller Bearing Co. in violation of the Taft-Hartley Act for refusing a Steelworkers' request for certain wage data was left standing by the U.S. Supreme Court when it refused to take the case on appeal.

The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals had previously upheld the NLRB, ruling that the union's demand for the wage information was valid under T-H. The company had contended that because there was no provision in the union contract to furnish the kind of information sought, the question was one for arbitration under the contract.

The Supreme Court also denied review to a case involving picketing of a Seattle building site, letting stand a Washington State Supreme Court ruling that the issue was moot because the project was completed.

It let stand also an Ohio Supreme Court ruling that the practice of non-lawyers giving advice for a fee to workmen's compensation claimants and preparing and presenting claims constitutes unauthorized practice of law and is enjoined.

IUD Honors Leaders In Civil Rights Fight

Pres. Johnson dropped in on the annual congressional dinner of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. saying he had heard "Walter Reuther was going to show Hubert Humphrey" how to get together a quorum of the Senate. The Minnesota senator, Democratic floor manager of the civil rights bill, demonstrated, however, that he didn't need any lessons that night.

Just minutes before the President's unscheduled appearance, a large portion of the Senate's civil rights supporters left their dinners unfinished to scurry back to the Capitol for a quorum call. As they departed, they were given a round of applause from the more than 500 guests, including congressmen and union leaders from their home states who had come to Washington in behalf of the civil rights bill and other labor goals.

Johnson was greeted with full-throated cries of "LBJ All the Way."

Reuther, speaking as IUD president and host to the congressional get-together, set the tone for the evening by stressing that civil rights "transcends partisan politics" and predicting that Democratic and Republican teamwork in the Senate would meet with the same success as the rights coalition in the House.

IUD Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey presented the department's twin awards to House Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) and Rep. William M. McCulloch (R-O.), ranking GOP member of the committee, for their leadership in the "historic" House passage of "the most far-reaching civil rights legislation of the last 100 years."

McCulloch warned that "the war is only half won" and that labor "and all the people in America" must press as effectively for Senate action as was done in the House.

Celler likewise credited House passage to "grass roots support from labor, churches and welfare groups."

Reuther confided that the IUD has similar plaques ready for Humphrey and Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.), the bipartisan civil rights leaders in the Senate.

Humphrey, after reiterating a "no compromise" determination of the Senate's civil rights majority, recalled the battles of past years and reached into the audience to single out AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller—then a Wisconsin congressman—as his partner in swinging the 1948 Democratic convention to upset a Platform Committee civil rights plank and win approval of a stronger plank in a dramatic floor fight.

Kuchel summed up the substance of the rights bill in one short sentence.

"Its single purpose," he declared, "is equal treatment under law."

Priorities Listed

Several hundred congressmen heard Reuther make a strong appeal to them to "do something" about poverty in America. He also included in a "list of national priorities":

- A $2 billion public works program designed to put 400,000 persons to work directly and create an additional 300,000 jobs indirectly.
- Social security hospital care for the aged.
- Federal aid to education "at every level."
- "Getting the Full Employment Act of 1946 out of mothballs."

Reuther called for both "a greater sense of national urgency and a deeper sense of national purpose."

Senate Civil Rights Forces Pledge Fight on Weakening Amendments

bill would cause no difficulty, but served notice of the risk of "distorting" changes.

"I hope the Senate will take heed of what I have indicated tonight," he declared.

Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) unveiled a series of amendments he intends to offer to the fair employment section of the bill and called a Republican policy conference in an attempt to reach a "consensus" on the issue.

Dirksen said the approximately 40 changes he will ask are intended to "improve" the bill and not "water down or emasculate" it.

Civil rights leaders took time out to study the Dirksen proposals before commenting on them.

Sen. Kenneth B. Keating (R-N.Y.) said after a long session of the Republican conference that there was "disagreement from some source on everything" in the Dirksen amendments. Both he and Dirksen said that no "consensus" had been reached on any of the proposals.

Southern Strategy

Southern opponents of the bill hinted that they might adopt a strategy of supporting amendments without dropping opposition to the entire measure.

Sen. Sam J. Ervin (D-N. C.), a leading opposition spokesman, told newsmen:

"It would not be inconsistent to vote for amendments to the employment section, for example, and then to vote to kill the whole title. I have no objection to voting on amendments."

Meanwhile, the bipartisan team of civil rights supporters neared the finish of the first phase of the debate—the affirmative, section-by-section argument for enactment of the House-passed bill. Each of the bill's 11 parts or titles has been discussed by at least one Democratic and one Republican supporter.

As for the next step, Humphrey put it this way:

"We will listen patiently for a period of time, but not too long, to opponents of the bill."

J. H. Piconke Dies; Federal Conciliator

Secretary of Army Takes over OCD

Transfer of the Office of Civil Defense from the Office of the Secretary of Defense to the office of the Secretary of the Army was announced by Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara, who said William P. Durkee will become civil defense director succeeding Steuart L. Pittman, new assistant secretary of defense.

Broad Assault on Poverty Held Urgent

Jobs, School Aid, Wage Needs Stressed in Labor Testimony

Sleeping Car Porters, appearing on behalf of the National Advisory Committee on Farm Labor of which he is co-chairman, praised the bill's effort to reduce rural poverty and recommended that it be strengthened.

The draft bill before the committee includes these main provisions:

- A Job Corps, similar to the Youth Conservation Corps proposed in a Senate-passed bill currently blocked in the House Rules Committee. It would provide remedial education and work experience for youngsters 16 through 21 in government camps and training centers.
- A work training program, geared to state and community projects, for the same age group, similar to the "home-town youth corps" portion of the Senate-passed bill.
- A work-study program providing federal subsidies for part-time employment by needy college students.
- Federal financing up to 90 percent for state and locally-developed community action programs to uproot poverty.
- Grants and loans to low-income rural families to help them acquire or improve family-size farms or finance "non-agricultural enterprises" that would supplement their income.
- Low-cost loans to businesses which would produce stable employment for workers long unemployed.
- A pilot program to provide work experience or training for unemployed fathers.
- A volunteer corps, modeled after the Peace Corps, to work with public or non-profit organizations to meet the health and educational needs of deprived groups. This is similar to the National Service Corps bill which passed the Senate last year.

Meany suggested a number of specific amendments to the Administration measure "aimed at strengthening the bill, not affecting its basic nature."

"We support it strongly," he said. "We believe it is urgently needed." Nevertheless, he stressed, if it is enacted, "neither the members of Congress nor Americans generally can sit back, brush their hands and say, 'Well, that's that; we have taken care of poverty.' "

In addition to expanded wage-hour coverage and a higher minimum wage—to eliminate "poverty among people who are fully employed"—Meany specifically asked enactment of:

- A broad-scale program of federal aid to primary and secondary schools as supported by "every chief executive since Pres. Truman."

"We do not deny the present necessity for scurrying around putting patches on a faulty educational system," he said. "We do reject this as a permanent process."

Progress on Two Fronts

He pointed out also that "providing the necessary school buildings would also provide jobs . . . a classic example of the proposition that social progress produces economic progress."

- Extension of the accelerated public works program, pending in the Rules Committee. Meany stressed labor's "deep conviction that public works must take up the slack" in employment resulting from a 10-year decline in jobs in the private, profit-making sector of the economy.
- Hospital insurance for the elderly under social security. "Almost a third of the poor are 65 or older," he noted, "making the King-Anderson bill more relevant than ever."
- Continuation and expansion of the Area Redevelopment Act.
- Federal aid to develop mass transit facilities in metropolitan areas.

Meany stressed also that civil rights must be achieved in practice, "not just principle." He added:

"We do not simply want a Negro to have the right to a job. We want a job for him. We are not content because a Negro may soon have the right to live where he chooses and eat where he chooses. . . . We want him to have money enough to make a free choice."

Meany termed the bill unnecessarily "vague" about the job training to be provided. The youngsters should be taught "all they can learn," he said, about the use of tools, good work practices and reading, writing and arithmetic. But it can't be expected, and shouldn't be promised, he emphasized, that they will come out of the program as skilled craftsmen.

He told the committee, in response to questions, that labor is not asking any limitation on the extent of the job training but merely pointing out the high degree of preparation needed for today's "complex and sophisticated" trades. He himself, he said, would be unable to take up his original trade as a plumber because of the "tremendous changes" in recent years.

Reuther joined in urging Congress to use a "large enough arsenal of weapons" to win the war against poverty. He praised the high priority given to the program by Pres. Johnson, but said:

"Our basic criticism of the bill would only be that more should be done, even as a beginning. . . . The effort we make and the resources we commit must be equal to the dimensions of the problem."

Randolph said the rural assistance portion would help meet the problems of millions of near-destitute rural Americans. The bill, he said, "is not utopian—it is buying time for us to work out a more rational solution to the rural poverty problem."

He urged the strengthening of the program and "its immediate adoption."

Low-Paid Workers Need Relief to Live

Mayor John J. Grogan of Hoboken, N. J., who is also an AFL-CIO vice president and head of the Shipbuilders, provided first-hand evidence that the federal minimum wage isn't high enough to keep workers with families above the poverty level.

Grogan told AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany that his city pays supplementary relief of $100 to $125 a month to some 200 workers who are employed full-time, but whose minimum earnings are inadequate to support their families.

Meany cited this to the House Labor Committee in urging a $2-an-hour minimum wage as an anti-poverty measure.

Union Groups Get AID Citations

The Auto Workers and the Sugar Workers Council of California are among 123 companies, community and other groups, individuals and institutions which have received certificates of cooperation from the Agency for Intl. Development (AID) in appreciation for assistance to training programs.

AMONG SCORES of volunteers at work in the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education registration center in Milwaukee prior to the deadline for the Apr. 7 state primary were, from left, Susie Jenkins, Margaret Collins, Irene Jackson and Marceline King. Hundreds of telephone calls were made urging citizens to register for the primary vote.

GOP 'Crossover' Seen in Wisconsin As Segregationist Draws Heavy Vote

Milwaukee—Democratic Gov. John Reynolds, running as a favorite-son stand-in for Pres. Johnson in the Wisconsin presidential primary, won all 44 delegates to the party convention next August, but Alabama's segregationist Gov. George C. Wallace claimed a "victory" in his campaign against the pending civil rights bill by rolling up approximately 25 percent of the total Democratic and Republican vote cast.

The Milwaukee Journal reported that a "crossover" by Republican voters into the Democratic primary "was obvious in one area after another."

Nearly complete returns showed that Reynolds polled 508,597 and Wallace 261,148 in votes cast in the Democratic primary. Rep. John W. Byrnes (R), running unopposed as a favorite son in the Republican primary, totaled 294,724 votes.

The extent of the Republican crossover into the Democratic primary was apparent in Byrnes' own 8th Congressional District, where the GOP vote was 40,294 and the combined vote in the Democratic primary for Reynolds and Wallace was 66,501. In 1962, Byrnes swept the district by 80,808 to 47,833 for the Democratic congressional nominee.

In the 6th Congressional District—like the 8th a solidly Republican district—Byrnes got only 32,485 votes against a combined Democratic count of 75,122 for Reynolds and Wallace. The 1962 general election returns gave Republican Rep. William K. Van Pelt 71,298 to 49,238 for the Democratic nominee.

Wallace ran strong in the heavily Republican new 9th Congressional District, actually outstripping Reynolds in silk-stocking Milwaukee suburbs such as Glendale, Wauwatosa and River Hills, while Byrnes ran a weak third.

2 Tests Ahead

The Alabama governor is carrying his northern campaign against the civil rights bill into Maryland and Indiana Democratic primaries, claiming that he can show sufficient strength to break the cohesion of bipartisan civil rights supporters.

The favorite-son Democratic candidate in Indiana is Gov. Matthew E. Welsh. In Maryland, anti-Wallace forces are backing U.S. Sen. Daniel B. Brewster. Both are standing in for the President. A Chief Executive traditionally does not enter state preferential primaries.

National Library Week Given Meany Backing

Public libraries can play an important part in the war against poverty and unemployment, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a statement urging labor groups throughout the nation to cooperate with National Library Week, Apr. 12-18.

"Libraries and organized labor have a common concern in basic adult education, in helping unemployed and underemployed workers obtain job training and re-training, and in helping employed workers to improve their skills and keep abreast of the rapidly changing technology which affects their jobs," Meany said. "The library is also a rich source of the books, the periodicals, and the films that can help bring about the economic and political understanding that are needed to abolish poverty and unemployment."

National Library Week comes this year soon after Congress passed the Library Service & Construction Act of 1964, which provides funds to build new library facilities and provide library services for many of the 18 million Americans who have no such service available and for the 110 million Americans who have inadequate library service.

Many labor groups are planning special observances of National Library Week, including displays of labor materials in local libraries and distribution of information about library services and library needs to union members. In many communities, unions and other friends of libraries have used the week as an occasion to focus attention on the need for more and better libraries in the public schools. The U.S. Office of Education estimates that more than 10 million pupils attend schools with no library facilities.

Among the unions emphasizing National Library Week, the Hotel & Restaurant Workers Union in its publication, the Catering Employee, proclaimed that "books beat the Beatles."

"Parents beset by Beatlemania," a leading article said, "can take comfort that far more young people are spending their time in libraries than are losing their heads over these mopsters."

Reprints of the article will be available from the Joint Committee On Library Service to Labor Groups, 50 E. Huron Street, Chicago. The committee is sponsored by the AFL-CIO and the American Library Association to stimulate better working relationships between unions and community libraries.

1,447 Seek 12 Machinists' Scholarships

The Machinists have received 1,447 applications for the 12 four-year college scholarships the union will award this year, Pres. Albert J. Hayes announced.

Each scholarship is worth $4,000 and may be used at any accredited college. Applications—from IAM members in the United States and Canada and their sons and daughters—are being judged by a committee of five prominent educators not connected with the union. Winners will be announced in late May.

The IAM launched its annual program in 1962 with five scholarships. Voluntary contributions from locals, state and district councils, auxiliaries and individual members enabled the union to double the number in 1963 and expand to 12 this year.

The program's growth, Hayes said, reflects the union membership's "growing concern over the lack of college opportunities for talented youngsters of low and moderate income families." This year's flood of applications amounts to 123 candidates for each scholarship available.

White House Rail Parleys Seen 'Narrowing' Issues

President Reports Progress in Talks

By Eugene A. Kelly

Intensive mediation efforts have narrowed the area of disagreement between 200 U.S. railroads and five operating brotherhoods over contract protection and "both sides are trying their dead-level best to reach agreement," Pres. Johnson announced.

Meeting at the White House with five mediators he named last week to avert a major tieup, and with union heads and railroad presidents, the President was told that progress has been made but that a settlement was not yet a certainty.

A union source saw the appearance of the rail presidents as a hopeful sign. Brotherhood representatives, engaged for nearly five years in a struggle to win better working conditions and protection against job "slaughter," have long urged more personal participation in negotiations by top management.

Johnson noted in a progress statement that the principal question in the rail talks is "whether these bargainers can, in 15 days, get over four years of the idea of somebody else settling their disagreements for them."

"I hope they can, and I think they can," he said, adding "we should know definitely," not later than Apr. 20, whether there will be a negotiated settlement. The country, he asserted "expects the answer to be yes."

New Deadline Set

The long struggle reached the White House when Johnson called in both sides and got consent of labor and management spokesmen to a 15-day postponement of an Apr. 10 stoppage. The new deadline was set at 12:01 a. m. Apr. 25.

The rail dispute reached the crisis stage when management said it would invoke work rule changes nationally after 7,200 workers represented by the Locomotive Engineers, Firemen & Enginemen, Railroad Trainmen and Conductors & Brakemen struck the Illinois Central Railroad on Apr. 8.

The unions said the Central strike was called as a final effort to achieve

Automation Job Losses Foreseen

The technological change now rippling through major industries is expected to have an increasing impact through the 1960s on workers, unions and companies, a government study has warned.

Changes on the threshold of widespread adoption are expected to continue wiping out jobs in 18 industries. In 14 other major industries, jobs are expected to increase as rising consumption outweighs the impact of technology.

The report, entitled "Technological Trends in 36 Major American Industries," was prepared by the Labor Dept., for the President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy.

In a related development, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Commerce Sec. Luther Hodges—who co-chair the President's labor-management group—testified before a House Labor subcommittee in favor of the National Commission on Automation & Technological Progress proposed by Pres. Johnson.

Wirtz said such a high-level group, if it had been in existence, could have eased the human and regional dislocations of the enforced migrations from farm to city, the decline in coal mining jobs and the transport changes

Bids Made To Revise Rights Bill

The Senate stretched its working day to 12 to 14 hours as leaders on both sides of the civil rights issue began to discuss the prospects of starting to vote on amendments to the bill.

Most of the amendment talk was off-stage, in a series of GOP caucuses where Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) continued his search for a party "consensus" on amendments to the fair employment section of the bill.

GOP liberals had rejected many of Dirksen's original list of proposed amendments as damaging to the bill, but the Republican leader said he expects a revised version to be "somewhat acceptable."

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.), Democratic leader of the bipartisan civil rights coalition, said he wants to take a good look at Dirksen's proposals before commenting, but warned: "We don't intend to let any crippling amendments pass."

The leader of the southern opposition forces, Sen. Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.), announced that he, too, has an amendment to offer. Russell said he will ask that the civil rights bill be submitted to national referendum before becoming effective.

On the Senate floor, southerners continued with a series of lengthy speeches opposing the measure, leading Humphrey to comment:

"I've been looking at this garden of oratory, and I see the weeds of filibuster growing."

His Republican counterpart, Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.) agreed and remarked, "It's been fertilized daily."

The Senate had its longest session of the year on Apr. 13, when it met continuously for 14 hours and 13 minutes.

Meanwhile church groups announced plans to step up their activity in behalf of civil rights legislation.

Students from 17 theological seminaries were scheduled to begin a silent, 'round-the-clock vigil at the Washington Monument, starting Apr. 19 and continuing until passage of the bill.

On Apr. 28, national leaders of the Protestant, Jewish and Catholic faiths will hold a convocation at Georgetown University in Washington. Thereafter, the National Council of Churches will sponsor daily prayer services

Court Upsets Pennsylvania Gerrymander

Scranton, Pa. — A three-judge federal court here agreed unanimously with labor's charge that a Republican-sponsored reapportionment of the Pennsylvania Legislature is "discriminatory" and "unconstitutional."

The suit, brought by five state and local AFL-CIO leaders on behalf of 1.25 million Pennsylvania union members, asked the court to invalidate the GOP reapportionment act, signed into law early in January by Gov. William W. Scranton (R).

The court granted the request for an injunction barring any primary or general elections under the act, but then stayed its order to permit the state administration to carry an appeal to the U. S. Supreme Court. A series of similar reapportionment cases

Senior Citizens Month:

Meany Asks Push For Health Care

Enactment of social security hospital insurance for the aged would be "the most meaningful observance" of Senior Citizens Month and organized labor's participation will be keyed to that theme, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a letter to Pres. Johnson.

At the same time, Meany wrote the presidents of all AFL-CIO member unions and central bodies urging that they respond to the President's proclamation designating May as Senior Citizens Month by renewing the social security health care drive "with fresh vigor."

In his letter to the President, Meany noted that the labor movement has traditionally had a "deep concern" for the well-being of older people. He recalled with pride the part it played in the development and improvement of the social security system, in negotiating other retirement benefits, and in the many active union programs that provide recreational and other services to retired members.

"It is no exaggeration to say that in the last generation there has been a revolution—a wholesome and long-overdue revolution—in this country's treatment of the aging and the aged," he wrote. "Yet, as you are well aware, much remains to be done.

"Your proclamation stressed the need for opportunites of all kinds for older Americans—opportunities to work, if they are able and choose to do so; opportunities to make useful application of their experience and wisdom; opportunities to continue as active, useful citizens. We wholeheartedly endorse these goals.

NLRB 'Hot Cargo' Interpretations Checked by Appeals Court Ruling

A Federal appellate court has set aside some of the National Labor Relations Board's interpretations of the "hot cargo" section of the 1959 Landrum-Griffin Act.

In reviewing a 1963 NLRB decision, the court upheld in part the board's findings on "protection of rights" contract clauses devised after the 1959 law, but directed that a new decree be framed "condemning the clauses only to the extent found unlawful by this court."

In two cases arising from contracts of the unaffiliated Teamsters, the U.S. Circuit Court for the District of Columbia spelled out an interpretation of the Landrum-Griffin "hot cargo" prohibition as applied to specific contract language, and ruled:

Both the employers and the unions "must have anticipated" that the section would not be given "the most expansive reading the bare words allowed."

Some of the clauses "have a valid scope of operation," although prohibited "from operating outside that scope," the court declared.

The challenged contract clauses provided that workers would not be subject to "discharge or disciplinary action" for refusal to cross a picket line, to work on or handle struck work, or to perform "hazardous work" during a labor dispute. They also prohibited an employer from using a subcontractor failing to observe wages and working conditions established by the union "having jurisdiction over the type of services performed."

A three-member court panel unanimously made these rulings in

'Battle Plan' for War on Poverty Found in Programs of Labor

San Francisco—Labor's program for better pay, a realistic minimum wage, health care, improved social security, and full employment is the "battle plan" for the war on poverty, Pres. Hunter P. Wharton told the 27th convention of the Operating Engineers as it opened here.

Delegates representing 320,000 union members also heard former Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell warn that labor faces the threat of compulsory arbitration and a wave of so-called "right-to-work" legislation, and must vigorously oppose them.

Wharton, calling the war on poverty "one war that can best be waged by paying decent wages," declared in reference to the nation's lawmakers:

"Let them establish a realistic minimum wage that meets American standards, not the standards of poverty.

"Let them provide better schools; let them meet the basic goals of full employment; let them provide higher social security benefits; let them provide for medical insurance for those over retirement age."

Noting that the shorter work week must be "social gain and not a precondition to holding two jobs," he urged all levels of government to take the lead in furnishing recreation, highways and community centers for leisure time.

"When premium pay for overtime acts as an effective preventive to working excessive hours," he said, "it then will be fulfilling its true purpose, creation of more jobs and elimination of poverty."

Mitchell decried the recent boost given "right-to-work" by the Committee for Economic Development and predicted a wave of such legislation in the near future, declaring:

"It is up to the unions of this country to be alert and fight" it.

He charged that the action of Congress in halting the rail strike last year increased the danger of compulsory arbitration which he said means control of workers' hours and the setting of wages and prices by government edict.

"If you think Landrum-Griffin and Taft-Hartley are bad laws," he said, "wait until you are constricted and bound—about the wages and working conditions of union members—by the findings of a panel which has the final say about what should be done."

Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers and head of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., hit government action permitting strikebreaker-manned trains of the Florida East Coast Railway to serve Cape Kennedy as one of several instances of agency conflict with liberal policies of the Administration.

California Gov. Edmund G. Brown recalled to the convention the 1958 "right-to-work" defeat in the state but warned that rightists are far more active today in their attacks on labor and the Johnson Administration.

Another objective for which the radical right is taking time out from "efforts to impeach Chief Justice Earl Warren and abolish the United Nations," Brown said, is the defeat of California's fair housing law at this year's election and enactment of a constitutional prohibition to bar such legislation in the future.

To defeat them and support the Johnson Administration, Brown urged increased labor political action with immediate priority given to voter registration.

John Birch Supporter Sees Plant Vote Union

Los Angeles—The plant of the Lewis Food Co., citadel of John Birch Society supporter D. B. Lewis, has gone union.

The 202 workers who produce Bircher Lewis's cat and dog food voted in a National Labor Relations Board election for joint representation by three unions—Butchers Local 563, Operating Engineers Local 501 and Teamsters Local 626.

The organizing effort took a year, with union backers making all contacts through home visits. The shape of things to come was indicated by Lewis's lawyer, who said after the votes had been counted: "Well, you won the first round but this is a 15-round fight."

Workers said the result was a blow to Lewis, who sponsors a far-right commentator on Local TV and is a strong supporter of so-called "right-to-work" laws. The plant, producing pet foods under the Dr. Ross label, has been paying 40 to 65 cents an hour under comparable wage scales and no nonsense about fringe benefits, according to the unions.

A spokesman for the Butchers said there will be no more John Birch handouts in the plant—the union's area contracts bar politicking by company or union in work places.

The election result was called a major victory in a joint union drive that helped push the AFL-CIO's pilot organizing campaign past the 36,000 mark. Bill Gilbert, drive director, called the campaign a fine example of union cooperation "against some of the heaviest odds in the business."

UAW Wins Plant After 15-Year Fight

Marshalltown, Ia. — A 15-year effort to organize the Fisher Governor Co. here was crowned with success when the Auto Workers won bargaining rights for the 960-man plant in a National Labor Relations Board election. The vote was 453 for the UAW, 435 against.

Six previous union organizing attempts had been frustrated. UAW Regional Dir. Robert Johnson said success this time was due in large part to cooperation between the union and the AFL-CIO regional office.

Operating Engineers Aid Quake Victims

San Francisco—The executive board of the Operating Engineers gave prompt aid to Alaska earthquake victims. Meeting prior to the union convention, it voted a $15,000 contribution to the Salvation Army for use in feeding quake victims and transferred $100,000 of union funds to Alaska banks to be available as loans.

A check was presented at the convention to Salvation Army Brigadier Donald Berry, assigned to Alaska relief, and Brigadier Lawrence Smith.

The convention also was informed that Paul Askew, assistant to IUOE Pres. Hunter P. Wharton, has been named to the board of consultants appointed by Pres. Johnson to survey the quake rebuilding job. Askew flew to Alaska Apr. 17.

In Dock Safety Dispute:

Backpay in Lockout Is Upheld on Appeal

Philadelphia—A National Labor Relations Board ruling that 3,000 Longshoremen were unlawfully locked out by employers in this port has been upheld by the 3d U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. At stake is an estimated $1 million in backpay.

The court rejected an appeal from the NLRB ruling by the Philadelphia Marine Trades Association, which shut down the port July 6-21, 1959, when 90 longshoremen refused for reasons of safety to unload a cargo of sugar from the freighter Caribe so long as wooden pallets were used to move 100-pound bags of sugar from the ship's hold to the dock.

Under the decision and the board ruling, all members of ILA Local 1291, who lost 16 days' pay, are entitled to be compensated for their lost income. But 2,000 other ILA members in Locals 1242,1332 and 1566 will not collect backpay under the two rulings. They are maintenance men, timekeepers, checkers, and carloaders idled by the dispute but not directly locked out.

The union held that wooden pallets used instead of cargo slings in unloading were unsafe because some of the 100-pound bags of sugar had fallen from them. The union position has been upheld by an arbiter, an NLRB trial examiner, the labor board itself and now the appeals court.

The dispute over the employer's use of pallets came to a boil June 30, 1959, when 90 dockers employed by Atlantic & Gulf Stevedores, Inc., reported for work on the Caribe but refused to proceed when told that pallets would be used.

A compromise plan to unload the cargo with slings and to use pallets for rehandling the sugar bags on the dock was proposed by the pier supervisor but withdrawn by the company's district manager while the union was considering it, Examiner C. W. Whittemore said in a report in 1960 after hearing testimony.

The men stayed away from work for two days, but returned after management agreed to start unloading with pallets and then to switch to slings. But more bags fell from the pallets and the dockers again refused to work.

The employers' association notified the ILA that, unless the men returned to work, all Local 1291 longshoremen would be locked out in the entire port on July 6. The lockout started on schedule, and ended July 21 in an agreement to arbitrate the dispute over safety.

An arbitrator observed the unloading and found the pallet operation unsafe. Management then went back to using slings and the unloading was completed without further incident. The NLRB examiner later viewed motion pictures of the unloading with pallets and agreed the workers obviously believed they were unsafe and the lockout was unlawful.

NMU Wins 2-Year Fight For Life Rafts

New York—The Maritime Union has won its demand for installation of inflatable life rafts abroad freighters and tankers manned by NMU members.

Pres. Joseph Curran announced that two groups of shipowners, affiliates of the American Merchant Marine Institute and the Tanker Labor Service Committee, have agreed to place the life rafts aboard their vessels "as expeditiously as possible."

Earlier the NMU had written the two associations of ship owners warning that failure to provide life rafts "makes your ships unsafe and is a violation of our working agreements."

The union said its two-year campaign for use of rafts to supplement life boats has been spurred by a recent series of "disasters and near-disasters" in which lifeboats either were destroyed or could not be launched.

White House Rail Talks Bring Progress Report

agreement on overtime, paid holidays, expenses away from home, shift differential pay and other contract improvements.

The unions said they had exhausted all the procedures of the Railway Labor Act and were free under a 1963 Supreme Court decision to "exercise self-help."

Rail managements retorted that they would put into effect rules changes that would slash wages, undercut established working conditions and abolish jobs. The five unions said they would have no recourse except to strike those roads where members' jobs were threatened.

Johnson intervened and named five mediators to meet with the principals—Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Assistant Sec. James J. Reynolds, Chairman Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., of the National Mediation Board, and two private mediators, Prof. George W. Taylor and Theodore W. Kheel.

The dispute goes back to 1959, when rail managements demanded changes in the rules governing working conditions of operating employes. The unions urged appointment of a presidential board and hearings began, with no agreement on a contract since then.

Two of the issues in the dispute were the subject of an arbiter's award under special congressional legislation last Aug. 28. The unions appealed the award in court and the other issues remained unsettled.

Gen. Maas Dies; Led Handicapped

The death of Maj. Gen. Melvin J. Maas, USMC Ret., was "a great loss to all the nation and especially the handicapped," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a message of condolence to his widow and family.

Maas, 65, died in Washington on the 10th anniversary of his appointment as chairman of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped. Blinded since 1951 by injuries suffered in World War II, the former Minnesota GOP congressman who fought in three wars continued to work for the handicapped until his final illness.

"His devotion to the cause of the handicapped." Meany said in his tribute, "has molded a memorial to Gen. Maas that will never be forgotten."

Pres. Johnson said "all the land grieves the passing of one of America's true heroes." Congressional leaders also saluted his memory.

New NLRB Decree Ordered:

Appeals Court Case Checks Sweep of 'Hot Cargo' Rulings

an opinion written by Judge J. Skelly Wright:

- On refusal to cross a picket line, the "protection rights" clauses are valid when the workers' employer is picketed in a "primary" labor dispute—either by the union involved in the contract or by some other union. The court notes that the NLRB concedes this.
- When the picket line is in promotion of a "secondary" strike or boycott, however, employes cannot be protected in refusing to cross the line. The union cannot salvage the legality of the clauses by arguing that they protect only "individual refusals" and not "union-induced" refusals. To the extent the abuses seek to do this, the NLRB correctly ruled that they are an unfair labor practice.
- The labor board was wrong in holding that employes cannot be protected in refusals to cross a picket line at another employer's place of business, if that picket line involves a primary dispute and not a secondary boycott or dispute. (In the construction and garment trades, an express exemption in the Landrum-Griffin Act softens the impact of secondary boycott restrictions, both the court and the NLRB note.)

Disciplining Curbed

On clauses seeking to relieve employes of discipline for refusing to "work on" or "handle" struck goods:

- A refusal to "handle" clause is a clear violation of the L-G "hot cargo" section and an unfair labor practice.

This clause is not "saved," the court held, by a provision that the employer "shall, when necessary," continue to handle struck products by using "other employes" including supervisory personnel, even though "individual" union members refuse to handle them.

- A refusal to "work on" struck goods may be legal if a struck employer farms out work to an "ally," a firm performing services that normally would be done by the strikers themselves. The court agrees with the NLRB that the language of such a clause may be "impermissibly broad," in effect purporting to legalize a secondary boycott, but noted: "We refrain from defining the exact limits of the ally doctrine." The limits should be spelled out only gradually in specific cases, the court ruled.

On clauses limiting the scope of an employer in subcontracting with others:

- A union effort to demand that all subcontractors be "signatories" to a union contract would be illegal as "secondary" in nature.
- However, a clause merely requiring that subcontractors "meet the equivalent of union standards," thus protecting the work standards of the employes, reveals a "vital distinction," and the NLRB was incorrect in ruling such clauses illegal.

The court said there was no merit in the union claim that exemption of the construction and garment industries from the Landrum-Griffin "hot cargo" prohibition made the provision "arbitrary and unconstitutional."

On the NLRB decree setting forth "appropriate relief" for contract clauses and situations it said were improper, the court described the decree as "ambiguous."

Wright's opinion observed that a section of the NLRB decision suggested that "entire [contract] clauses as written should be struck down" even though they might be partially valid.

'We Do Not Agree'

"If this is the board's view, we do not agree," he said.

A new NLRB decree should be drafted to condemn the challenged clauses only in light of the court's rulings, he wrote.

The court set aside the NLRB's condemnation of a "hazardous work" clause, involving picket lines, on the limited ground that the section was contained only in a preliminary agreement and was deleted and "repudiated" by employers and unions before signatures to the final contract. The board could take up the issue again if it felt further proceedings were necessary, the court said.

PROCLAIMING Apr. 20-26 as Labor Education Week in Detroit, Mayor Jerome P. Cavanagh tells Wayne County AFL-CIO education committee members at signing ceremony in mayor's office that "vast majority" of U.S. citizens "owe some part of their high standard of living" to labor. With Cavanagh, right, are Vice Pres. Alex Fuller, left, and Michael Kerwin of committee. Education Week events include films, dinner-lectures, and second annual labor education assembly.

'Modest' Family Budget Hits $125 in New York

New York—A "modest but adequate" standard of living for a family of four in New York City requires an income of $125.51 per week or $6,527 per year, the Community Council of Greater New York said.

The figures were disclosed by the council's Budget Standard Service which compiles the price survey for use by welfare agencies in New York to measure ability to pay for social and health services and as a guideline in counseling on financial management.

"The guideline budgets . . . are considered satisfactory standards of living but not for building a backlog to meet family emergencies or crisis requirements," said James W. Fogerty, executive director of the council.

The council's budget for a family of four was first figured on October 1963 prices and taxes which indicated a weekly income of $128.29 and an annual figure of $6,671. The recently enacted federal tax cut produced the lower income budget of $125.51 and $6,527.

The basic budget covers a breadwinner, a housewife, a 13-year-old boy and an 8-year-old girl. There are others covering representative family types including an elderly couple, for which the council estimates earnings of $62.14 a week or $3,321 per year are needed to live at the "modest but adequate" standard.

The cost of goods and services in 1963 for a family of four, the study showed, increased 2.4 percent over the 1962 standard.

The council explained that although the Dept. of Labor's Consumer Price Index showed an annual increase of only 1.1 percent, the higher increase in the council's figures stems from specified standards compared to the average experience of all families in the CPI at widely differing standards of living.

Cost of clothing, housing, recreation, education, city taxes, medical costs and other areas all moved upward during the year.

The mix of expenditures differs greatly with families of different composition, the council noted, pointing out that on medical care the costs for the elderly averaged three times the costs for children from 6 to 17.

In terms of differing family sizes and ages, the council showed a range in annual costs before tax adjustment of from $2,044 for an elderly unemployed woman living alone to $7,947 for a family of five with three children from 10 to 13 and parents under 40.

CSA Parley to Explore Fund-Raising Practices

Voluntary giving for community health and welfare services will be up for intensive examination by labor, government and private agency personnel at the ninth annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services May 3-7 at Miami Beach.

Dir. Leo Perlis of the federation's Community Services Activities said the conference was called to examine current fund-raising practices, to probe the reasons for giving and to evaluate services supported by voluntary giving in thousands of American communities.

Speakers at principal sessions include Perlis, Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), Pres. Charles Harris of the Florida AFL-CIO, and John J. McManus, public welfare commissioner of Nassau County, N. Y., along with noted experts in the health and welfare field.

The conference will be climaxed May 7 when Mrs. Nancy Kefauver, widow of the late Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.), receives the annual Murray-Green award, won by her husband, from Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, who is also chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee.

After registration May 3, conference delegates will take part in a program that includes speakers, films, round table discussions and workshop sessions.

Keynote by Perlis

Perlis will give the keynote address May 4, and Dir. Earle G. Lippincott of the national budget and consultation committee of the United Community Funds & Councils of America will discuss standards and criteria for voluntary support of community health and welfare agencies. Welcoming addresses are scheduled by Pres. W. J. Owens of the Dade County AFL-CIO, Mayor Melvin J. Richard and Harris.

Speakers Listed

May 5 speakers include Rabbi Balfour Brickner, director of the interfaith activities commission, Union of American Hebrew Congregations on the philosophical and religious basis for voluntary giving; Dr. Mortimer Feinberg, associate professor of psychology at the Bernard Baruch School of the City College of New York, on the psychological motivations of voluntary giving; and former Pennsylvania Gov. George M. Leader, 1964 national crusade chairman of the American Cancer Society, on independent drives.

At the May 6 session, Board Chairman Winslow Carlton, National Social Welfare Assembly, will discuss local support of national services, and Dr. S. M. Miller, professor of sociology at Syracuse University, public responsibility of the voluntary agency.

The final day's speakers are Exec. Vice Pres. W. Earl Prosser of the Michigan United Fund; Executive Dir. Lyman S. Ford of the UCFCA, and McManus.

Growth in 1963 Hailed By Union Labor Life

Baltimore—The Union Labor Life Insurance Co. had one of its best years in 1963 with assets, premium income and insurance in force all showing substantial gains, Pres. Edmund P. Tobin reported.

Tobin told more than 300 shareholders attending the annual meeting and luncheon of the labor-founded company that assets rose 18.7 percent last year to more than $51 million.

During the same period, premium income increased 25 percent and insurance in force rose 11 percent to nearly $1.37 billion. Payments to beneficiaries and living policyholders totaled $70.4 million.

Referring to the growth statistics of what he termed "labor's own company," Tobin declared:

"From a company that was founded primarily to provide group life insurance benefits for the organized working men and women of America, we have extended our coverage so that our policy portfolio now includes all types of life, annuities, accident, health, hospitalization, surgery, laboratory, X-ray and major medical insurance."

During 1963, he said, operations were extended to Kansas, Texas and Georgia—for a total of 31 states and the District of Columbia. New regional offices were opened in Atlanta, New Orleans and Miami.

Curb on Polygraphs Made Law in Alaska

Juneau, Alaska—Gov. William A. Egan (D) was in Anchorage directing earthquake disaster relief measures when a bill prohibiting the use of polygraphs and other lie-detecting devices became state law without his signature.

The bill, which Egan favored, outlaws lie detector examinations as a condition of employment except in the hiring of policemen.

Apprentices Get Course in Unionism

San Francisco, Calif—The Bay Counties District Council of Carpenters has inaugurated a broad program of trade union education under which apprentices are attending mandatory classes on the history, traditions and current programs of organized labor and material keyed to the building trades and the Carpenters.

The course consists of one two-hour session one night a week for 10 weeks and is in addition to regular classes in craft training, with sessions in San Francisco, Oakland, San Mateo and San Rafael. In charge is Harold Rossman, research and education director for the district council.

Mrs. FDR Foundation Given $345,000 by UAW

New York—A gift of $345,000 from the Auto Workers was announced at the first anniversary luncheon of the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation.

The money is in addition to $100,000 the union had previously contributed to the foundation, which is perpetuating Mrs. Roosevelt's efforts for human rights and international good will.

The gift was announced by Ambassador Adlai E. Stevenson, foundation chairman, who read a telegram from UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther to 2,500 luncheon guests who included Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson.

Reuther is vice president of the foundation. He and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Pres. David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers and Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers were named founding trustees by the late Pres. Kennedy when the foundation was chartered by Congress.

Keenan is chairman of an AFL-CIO committee which already has raised nearly $1 million in voluntary contributions from union members.

Small Business

THE DECLINE of small business as a factor in American life stems from two developments—the automation and technological revolution and the sluggish economy of the past decade.

These factors, plus others, have contributed to a drop of almost 30 percent in the total number of proprietors in the U.S. Proprietors include both farm and non-farm businesses as well as those with professional practices. From 69.3 per 1,000 population in 1948 the number of proprietors fell to 50.6 in 1962.

A sharp decline, of course, has taken place in agriculture where the number of farms per 1,000 population plunged from 29.8 to 14.2, a decline of over 50 percent. But even in the non-farm area there has been a drop of about 9 percent.

The decline among non-farm proprietors and a similar drop among the number of business firms per 1,000 population may not seem terribly important. But it means there has been no compensatory increase in small businesses in the towns and cities to offset it.

The technological revolution has had a sharp impact on small business, especially in the farm and manufacturing areas. There are prospects, however, that new opportunities may be opened up in recreation, maintenance and repair and other areas.

But the problem of a continuing sluggish economy represents a special hardship for small business. The smaller firms can prosper and develop only in an atmosphere of a rapidly expanding economy; they cannot develop or maintain their present position in an economy operating below full potential with a high and persistent rate of unemployment and idle capacity.

Small business has an important role to play in modern America, not as large, perhaps, as in the development of the nation's western frontier, but a role of providing new opportunities for the energetic, the creative and the inventive. If it is to fulfill this role, the first consideration must be an expanding economy based on maximum use of facilities and manpower.

Guideposts

IT IS ADMITTEDLY difficult to measure the annual rate of productivity increase of business executives and college professors, but a quick reading of the 1963 salary trend for these groups should send the Council of Economic Advisers scuttling to the defense of their wage-price guideposts.

Business Week reports that an early sampling of reports filed with the Securities & Exchange Commission "reveals that 1963 was a banner year for top executives," with salary increases averaging about 11 percent. These pay boosts "apparently are pegged to rosy profits enjoyed by many companies and industry groups," the magazine comments.

The American Association of University Professors points with concern to the overall pay increase of 5 percent registered last year and calls strongly for a 7.2 percent annual increase in salaries and fringe benefits to double 1960 payments by the year 1970.

There is no question that faculty salaries, starting at a notoriously low level, are still not increasing swiftly enough in terms of the tremendous educational job facing the nation and the need to recruit competent faculty. We wish this "union" of professors well in their struggle for a decent salary level and hope that they can convince one of their dues-paying members—Dr. Walter Heller, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers and author of the guideposts—of the soundness of their case and that of all Americans who work.

'How Does Our Garden Grow?'

Labor Wants Safeguards:

Future of Developing Countries Tied to 2 Geneva Trade Parleys

By Bert Seidman

ABOUT 1,500 representatives of some 120 countries are meeting in Geneva, Switzerland, at the United Nations Conference on Trade & Development (UNCTAD). The conference, which began on Mar. 23, will continue until mid-June.

On May 4 the Kennedy round of tariff negotiations will get under way in the same city under the auspices of the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade (GATT). The U.S. is represented in both meetings.

Although the two meetings will deal with trade problems, they are separate and distinct. The GATT negotiations will focus mainly on exchange of tariff reductions among industrialized countries, especially between the European Common Market and the U.S. The less developed countries will also get the benefit of these reductions but will not be asked to make compensating cuts.

UNCTAD is dominated by the developing countries and is emphasizing their problems. These are the 75 nations in Latin America, Asia and Africa with backward economies and very low living standards. Their common enemies are hunger, sickness and ignorance. Many of them are trying to raise themselves by their own bootstraps but they need help and cooperation from the developed countries. This is what they are asking in the UN Conference at Geneva.

The conference is aimed at helping the poorer countries develop their economies by expanding their trade opportunities. There is little quarrel about the goal but there are many, sometimes conflicting, ideas about how to reach it.

The developing countries have traditionally depended on selling primary commodities, such as agricultural products and minerals, to advanced countries in order to be able to buy manufactured goods and, at times, food as well.

Until recently the prices of these products have been falling while the prices of the manufactured products the developing countries buy have been going up. In addition, the share of the developed countries in primary commodity sales has increased at the expense of the developing countries. The result is that their export earnings on primary commodities has fallen short of their development needs.

To meet this problem, the developing countries want to do two things. First, they want to improve their traditional trade in primary commodities by getting higher prices for what they sell and expanded market outlets. Secondly, they want to diversify their exports, especially by selling industrial goods, so that they aren't so dependent on the frequently fluctuating markets.

TO MEET these demands, participants in the conference have come up with many proposals. Although they are diverse and detailed, these ideas can be grouped in a few main categories:

1 Proposals to deal with primary commodity problems. Here there seems to be a consensus that international commodity agreements provide the best answer. These attempt to set prices fair to both consumer and producer, assure access to markets and deal with disposal of any surpluses. There are already such agreements for wheat, sugar, coffee, olive oil and tin, and it is felt that more should be worked out for other commodities.

2 Preferences for manufactures and semi-manufactures of developing countries. The basic idea here is that until the "infant industries" of the developing countries can become truly competitive with industries in the advanced countries, tariffs on their industrial exports should be lower than for exports from developed countries. With the notable exception of the U.S. delegation, most countries, developed and developing alike, subscribe to the principle of preferences for the developing countries.

One group of countries, notably those in or associated with the European Common Market, want "selective" preferences with the advanced countries having the right to pick and choose as to both countries and products receiving preferential treatment. Most other countries want generalized or universal preferences.

The U.S. delegation opposes preferences as violating the traditional "most favored nation" principle in trade, that is that all countries should get equal treatment in tariff levels. This principle is embodied in our Trade Expansion Act.

Organized labor is not dogmatic about preferences for the developing countries. They should be considered if they will help to improve the economies of developing countries and advance their living standards without adversely affecting higher wage workers in industrialized countries.

Labor has therefore urged that they be surrounded with certain safeguards including establishment of fair labor standards in the developing countries and assurances against a sudden flood of imports causing market disruption, and effective adjustive assistance measures.

Morgan Says:

Peace Corps Found Generating The Spirit that Moved Pioneers

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

ONE OF THE MORE remarkable contradictions of our time, surely, is the fact that despite the alarming delinquency we blame on teenagers, despite the beatniks and the squealing passion for the Beatles, despite the anxiety of the elders about the softness of the younger generation and what it may or may not be coming too, there is a hard core of determination in a hopeful number of our coming crop of citizens that puts them almost in the class of our hardy American pioneers.

Morgan

And speaking of hard cores of determination, the Peace Corps is still with us and flourishing.

Campaigning in New Hampshire last month, New York's Gov. Rockefeller told a questioner he thought the Peace Corps was a great achievement—possibly, he added, succumbing to partisan temptation, the only achievement the Kennedy Administration had registered. Astonishingly enough, the corps, under the adroit and restless management of Sargent Shriver, has won such strong bipartisan support that a $115 million authorization to double its size to 14,000 volunteers sailed through Congress a month ago without a penny cut from the Administration's request.

One of Congress' more penny-wise members, Republican H. R. Gross of Iowa, grumbled the figure should be reduced and the corps withdrawn from Panama, Ghana and Indonesia because those countries "are not cooperating with us." The Peace Corps does not go where it is not invited, however, and the more important point, which Gross and other critics seem to miss, is that the people of 46 countries are cooperating with the 7,000 energetic—and, yes, idealistic—workers in Shriver's army.

A year ago the archly conservative San Diego Union complained in an editorial that "the Peace Corps rests on the fundamental error that we are going to advance civilization and world peace by helping a handful of people on the edge of a sea of human want."

It may be that you can't sweep the tide back with a broom but if the job, which must begin somewhere, is started on the beach of poverty with simple tools it can dramatize the need and the sincerity of approach and thereby, to reverse the direction of the figure of speech, expand the beachhead. Furthermore such narrow criticism totally misses one of the Peace Corps' most valuable points: the deep, personal horizon-stretching experience it provides its volunteers. After their service on a grass roots level abroad, the young Americans returning home are not going to be content with petrified political and sociological patterns they come back to. They recognize the civil rights battle, for example, for what it is—a social revolution—and already returning veterans of the corps, both men and women, are plunging into that revolution themselves.

IT IS NOT LIKELY that five Peace Corps girls in their 20s who hitch-hiked 2,000 miles across the Sahara Desert from Monrovia, Liberia, to Algiers several weeks ago will be content with placid women's-club lives on Elm Street when their African hitch is over. There are, in fact, some exciting indications that this bold pioneering spirit which the Peace Corps is stimulating is seeping down to teenagers and out to the youth of other continents.

The other day, for example, I discovered a new monthly magazine of student opinion called Icarus, now modestly circulated among Washington area high schools, the brain-child of three lively teenagers at Madeira, a well-known ladies' prep school in Virginia. Ann Schatezel, Chrissie Schlesinger and Cia White, bright daughters of a State Dept. official, a historian and a columnist, respectively, launched this project by themselves.

This issue I received is loaded with provocative material ranging from an essay on classroom cheating to a sardonically sophisticated account of a professional wrestling match. It provides far more refreshing reading than most of the slick stuff—dated—you find in a dentist's or doctor's or diplomat's waiting room.

Most remarkable of all is a feature in the back of the magazine. Instead of offering a movie and TV guide or a list of impending junior proms, Icarus devotes four pages to volunteer summer job opportunities, ranging from baby-sitting to civil rights and political campaign work.

Here, I submit, is a demonstration of the combined awareness and involvement that is coming to the fore from the thinking men and women of tomorrow who are already bothering to think, today. A friend in the Foreign Service reports he notes similar manifestations in Europe. A dialogue between these young people and their elders should be encouraged and, perhaps more importantly, among these members of the coming generation themselves across oceans and continents. They have something to say, they have the bursting energy to do, and we older fogies would be well advised to stop, look and listen.

Washington Reports:

Legislation Demanded to Curb Interstate Piracy of Industries

THE PRACTICE of plant piracy must be stopped immediately by appropriate legislation, Representatives Henry Reuss (D-Wis.) and Florence Dwyer (R-N.J.) asserted in interviews on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

Mrs. Dwyer described the practice as one in which a manufacturing company "pulls up stakes from an established industrial community and moves to a less-developed area because of the availability there of non-union labor, lower wages, new buildings at reduced costs, local and state tax exemptions, free or reduced rates for public utilities and frequently some form of federal benefits."

Reuss gave as an example the planned removal from Milwaukee of the Cutler-Hammer Co., which has employed 800 skilled, well-paid workers, to Bowling Green, Ky., because Bowling Green will build a new plant and make it available at "a very low rental."

He said this removal will be arranged through the issuance of local tax-free municipal bonds, which can be sold at "a relatively low rate of interest."

Such a practice, he charged, is "unfair competition" and causes high unemployment and distress.

He has introduced a bill that would limit tax deductions of companies taking advantage of such a practice.

MRS. DWYER WANTS changes in the area redevelopment bill, now in the Rules Committee, to tighten existing provisions barring the use of federal funds in cases of plant piracy. She claimed that the removal of a Mack Truck Co. plant from Newark to Hagerstown, Md., was a case in point.

Reuss said he expected his bill to become law especially since it follows the recommendations of the Inter-Governmental Commission, whose members include congressmen, governors, members of the cabinet, mayors and county officials.

"The recommendation of the commission was based on the fact that unless we call a halt to the misuse of public funds in plant piracy, federal income tax exemption may be ended on such bonds altogether," Reuss said.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

ONCE AGAIN a Republican presidential primary has shown wide-ranging discontent with the party's avowed candidates, and no consensus at all on an alternative. It may sometime be appropriate to consider whether Sen. Goldwater of Arizona, despite unmistakable slippage from his once apparently formidable strength, might still be nominated simply because you can't beat somebody with nobody.

The Goldwater showing in the Illinois primary was only in degree an improvement over New Hampshire. In the GOP heartland, where his backers had such tight control of the machinery a few month ago that a slate of delegates favorable to Gov. Rockefeller of New York wasn't even entered, close to 50 percent of Republican voters going to the polls declined to support him.

Of the million Republicans casting ballots in the primary, half either voted for Sen. Margaret Chase Smith of Maine, who is in no sense a serious candidate, or wrote in the names of Ambassador Lodge or former Vice Pres. Nixon or others, or simply refused to vote at all for a presidential preference.

The Goldwater-proclaiming candidate for governor, State Treas. William J. Scott, was swamped by a candidate with alliances with the Eisenhower, eastern-internationalist wing of the party, Charles H. Percy.

Percy is now the leading figure among Illinois Republicans, the one who will lead the party in the November effort to recapture control of the state government from the Democrats. Goldwaterites assailed Percy as too close to Rockefeller financial and public interests, and they were able to make him disavow any private hankering to work for Rockefeller's nomination, but that is all they got.

ILLINOIS IS THE STATE which sent Taft delegates or John Bricker delegates to one Republican convention after another. Four years ago, Nixon rolled up 782,000 votes in a GOP primary; in 1952 the late Sen. Taft got 935,000, with 147,000 write-ins for Gen. Eisenhower.

Goldwater's total was barely above 500,000. It cannot be thought that the 200,000-plus votes for Mrs. Smith of Maine were expressing affirmative support. She is little known in the state; she made just two campaign speeches there. Yet her percentage was more than eight times as large as it was in New Hampshire, where she is both known and respected—but where the voters found other ways to voice discontent with the open candidates by write-ins for Lodge and Nixon.

This time—with no write-in drives organized and booming—a surprisingly large number of voters chose to mark Mrs. Smith's name. Lodge got a respectable write-in total of 46,000 and Nixon a write-in of approximately half that.

Once again—little comfort for any candidate in the general pattern, although Lodge backers are encouraged by polls saying their candidate is running far ahead of all others in Oregon, where the primary comes May 15.

THERE IS the remaining factor that Goldwater is expected to pick up official delegation strength soon from southern states, where Republican Party machinery is substantially in the hands of his people. He clearly has the lead for the first ballot in the July nominating convention in San Francisco.

Oregon is a showdown state and California's primary on June 2 is a showdown. But if Lodge really sweeps Oregon, it will further damage both Rockefeller and Goldwater before California. And Lodge is one Republican possibility who might have difficulty in hitting Pres. Johnson on Viet Nam and defense policy—the only themes Republican orators and publicists are mentioning these days.

The waiting game played by Lodge, by Nixon, by Gov. William W. Scranton of Pennsylvania is being prolonged. At some moment, presumably, Goldwater will reach a delegate strength letting him push on against undeclared rivals, or slip back sharply following the early convention ballots, and the real fight will open.

RUNAWAY PLANTS leave behind jobless men to walk the streets and economic chaos, Rep. Henry Reuss (D-Wis.), left, and Rep. Florence Dwyer (R-N. J.) declared in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

Labor Dept. Study Predicts Job Cutbacks

which curtailed railroad jobs.

The Labor Dept. report to the President's Committee said a total of 29.1 million people—half of all non-farm workers—are now employed in the 36 industries studied.

A total of 29.1 million people—half of all non-farm employment—is now employed in the 36 industries studied.

It means, in soft coal, an increased use of continuous mining machinery and such radical mine-to-market transportation advances as unit trains and slurry pipelines; the result will be production gains and job losses.

More Steel Production

It means, in steel, a wider use of oxygen injection which will boost output per man-hour substantially with little if any increase in jobs.

In air transportation, it means the wider use of jet cargo liners and compact passenger jets. In trucking, it means new engines twice as powerful as those now in use, the wider use of two 40-foot trailers behind a single tractor and a stronger and faster system of interstate highways and city by-passes which will bring industry expansion and job growth.

The study covers only those changes already being applied and not such developmental work as automatic check-out counters for supermarkets which will total and bag groceries mechanically.

Job declines are expected in these industries by 1970: aerospace; bakery products; soft coal; oil and gas; dairy products; footwear; iron and steel foundries; non-ferrous foundries; lumber and wood products; malt liquors; meat products; oil refining; railroads, telephones; textiles; tires and tubes; tobacco and waterborne transportation.

Some Growth Industries

In 14 industries with 19 million employes, a job growth is foreseen. These include aluminum, banking, cement, construction, concrete products, electronics, gas utility and pipeline, insurance, printing and publishing, synthetic materials, retail and wholesale trade and trucking.

The job outlook is uncertain for seven industries with 4 million workers: electric power, federal government, glass containers, iron and steel, auto, pulp and paper and cigarettes.

Wirtz Names Davis-Bacon Appeals Unit

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has named the three members of the newly-established Wage Appeals Board, set up to review prevailing wage determinations made under the Davis-Bacon Act and enforcement procedures involving penalties against government contractors who violate the act.

The board members, who will act as the representative of the Secretary of Labor in reviewing decisions of the department's solicitor, were nominated by the three largest government procurement agencies—Defense Dept., Atomic Energy Commission and General Services Administration.

Oscar S. Smith, the chairman of the new board, is director of labor relations for the Atomic Energy Commission. GSA designated Stuart Rothman, former general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, and the Defense Dept. chose a retired Army colonel, Clarence D. Baker, who has served as an industrial relations consultant for private firms.

All-Union Slate Sweeps 'Potash Basin' Elections

Carlsbad, N. M.—An all-union slate of candidates all but swept the boards in the Apr. 7 municipal election here, reversing results of the election four years ago which the U.S. Chamber of Commerce hailed as proving the value of its "practical politics" course for businessmen.

The union slate, running on the Citizens Ticket, elected the mayor and three of four city council members in an extraordinary turnout of 8,070 voters—more than 63 percent of the registration.

The businessmen's "practical politics" victory of 1960 was won with a then "all-time high vote" of 6,172—52 percent of registration.

Impetus for organization of the labor community in this heavily union town is attributed to emotions aroused two years ago, when major employers forced a long strike on a group of unions resisting a concerted drive against long-established contract arbitration protections.

The Citizens Ticket was backed by the central labor body and its semi-monthly newspaper, the Pecos Valley News, and officers of local unions helped generate rank-and-file enthusiasm in this "potash basin."

Elected mayor was Henry G. Hutson, a member of the Machinists. City council victors were Andrew Gordon of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Cecil Bostick of the Machinists, and Don R. Miehls of the Retail Clerks. Only losing Citizens Ticket candidate was Haskell Wright of the Carpenters, who trailed slightly the top candidate of the opposition slate.

Defeated for re-election was the incumbent mayor, for 30 years a supervisory employe of the Intl. Minerals & Chemical Corp. Also defeated was a proposal for city purchase of a U.S. Borax & Chemical Corp. office building.

Reported the U.S. CofC in a Nation's Business article on the election four years ago: "Some townspeople insisted . . . businessmen were too idealistic and too inexperienced to play the game of politics and win." But they learned "for sure" that "politics as practiced by these Carlsbad business leaders does pay off."

Slogan of the Citizens Ticket this year was: "It's time for a change." The council changeover is expected to have an impact on entrenched local officials, including the city manager and city attorneys, and possibly to stir wider labor political activity at state levels.

Meany Asks New Push For Health Care Bill

economic security for all the elderly—both those who are still in active life and those who have retired. And this, in turn, demands a fair measure of protection against the high cost of illness—the greatest remaining threat to their dignity and independence.

"We know that you are vigorously supporting a program that would meet that threat by extending the proven principle of social security to include hospital insurance for the aged. This proposal has been subjected to congressional scrutiny over a period of many years and we agree with you that the time for action has come.

"We are also sure you share our feeling that the most meaningful observance of Senior Citizens Month would be the enactment of such a measure by Congress."

Posters advertising Senior Citizens Month and reproducing the President's proclamation were distributed to AFL-CIO affilates along with Meany's letter for posting in union halls in "a real effort to focus attention on the problems of the elderly."

The AFL-CIO president noted that the King-Anderson bill, which adopts the social security approach to old-age hospital insurance, is again up for consideration by the House Ways & Means Committee.

"The need now," he declared, "is to get the measure to the floor for a vote."

He urged a strong labor "counter-attack" during May to the "new array of costly and totally misleading advertisements" sponsored by opponents of the King-Anderson bill to denounce it.

USWA Dist. 6 Adds Nearly 4,500 in Year

Toronto, Ont. — Steelworkers Dist. 6, which extends from the western border of Quebec to British Columbia, added nearly 4,500 members to its rolls and organized 45 new units in the 11 months ending Feb. 29, according to a report by Dist. Dir. Larry Sefton.

No Dent in Unemployment:

March Factory Jobs Show Gain of 49,000

By Robert B. Cooney

The job situation in March showed "continued strength—continued firmness—in manufacturing employment and hours of work," a Labor Dept. spokesman reported.

In its detailed monthly report, the Labor Dept. said the factory sector gained 49,000 jobs in March to top 17 million—the highest total since the summer of 1957, before the past two recessions. Manufacturing jobs rose by 277,000 over March 1963.

Earlier, a summary job report revealed that the steady job gain since the first of the year has failed to dent the unemployment problem. In March, some 4.3 million persons were unemployed, with the key seasonally adjusted jobless rate remaining at 5.4 percent of the workforce.

In a separate report, the Labor Dept. said the removal of San Jose, Calif., from the list of major job centers suffering "substantial unemployment" lowered the total to 40 in March. The monthly survey of 150 major centers had shown a steady uptrend from last November's total of 37 areas with 6 percent or more jobless.

Harold Goldstein, the Labor Dept.'s manpower expert, said the significance of the employment report rested in the continued strength in factory employment and hours.

The workweek in manufacturing edged up to 40.4 hours in March, the report added. On a seasonally adjusted basis, the average workweek of production workers is at its highest level since late 1955, the report said. Factory overtime stayed at 2.7 hours, a total as high as has been recorded since such figures were first collected in 1956.

Overall, total non-farm payroll employment was up by 300,000 to 57.3 million, the report said. This total was up by 1.6 million over a year ago.

The February-to-March gains, in addition to factory jobs, were mainly in these industry sectors: construction, up a little less than seasonally by 61,000 to 8.7 million; services, up more than usual by 63,000 to 8.4 million; state and local government, up by 25,000 to 7.5 million.

On the unemployment side the situation further improved for adult men, from a jobless rate of 4.3 percent in January to 4.1 percent in February to 3.9 percent in March. But the jobless rate for adult women stayed at 5.6 percent.

As a result, said the report, the decline in unemployment—from 4.5 million to 4.3 million—was as expected and the overall jobless rate remained at 5.4 percent. This means 54 of every 1,000 persons in the workforce were actively seeking work in vain.

The longterm unemployed—those jobless 15 weeks or longer—had their ranks increased by 150,000 to 1.3 million. This group has gradually increased from a plateau of 900,000 in the last half of 1963.

'Foes of Democracy' Pamphlet Available

The enemies of democracy—on right as well as left—are put under the microscope in a new AFL-CIO pamphlet, Labor Fights the Enemies of Democracy, which is intended to make union members more effective fighters against those who attempt to discredit and subvert American institutions.

Its definition of labor's role in relation to the Communists, the John Birchers and others of either stripe is extracted from a speech by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany before the Conference on Extremism in Los Angeles.

Labor Fights the Enemies of Democracy is AFL-CIO Publication No. 134 and can be ordered from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Div., Dept. of Publications, 815 Sixteenth St., N. W., Washington, D. C., 20006. Price is 10 cents each or $7.50 per hundred.

UAW Hits 'Immoral' Overtime As Factor in High Jobless Rate

"Immoral" scheduling of overtime by employers has contributed to the nation's "intolerably high" unemployment, the Auto Workers told Congress.

UAW Pres. Leonard Woodcock cited plant-by-plant examples of this in the automobile industry as he urged a House Labor subcommittee to require employers to pay doubletime for overtime work, instead of the present time-and-a-half rate.

He named four Ford assembly plants—in Dallas, Louisville, Norfolk and St. Louis—where the workweek during most of the period between August 1962 and March 1964 was 58 hours.

It would have been "easy," Woodcock said, to shift the plants from one shift to a two-shift operation and employ additional workers.

In the auto industry as a whole, Woodcock said, elimination of only three-fourths of the overtime worked over the course of a year would add 47,000 full time jobs, approximately one-third of the number which have been eliminated as a result of automation during the past eight years.

"It is immoral," he said, "to require presently employed workers to work overtime while others, capable of doing the work, are denied the opportunity."

Asked if union members would be willing to give up overtime so that workers on layoff could be recalled, Woodcock told the subcommittee that a poll taken for the UAW by Lou Harris in 1961 as a preclude to contract negotiations came up with "only one surprise."

That, Woodcock said, was the "substantial feeling of shame" felt by UAW members who were "working overtime while their neighbors were unemployed."

Woodcock sharply attacked earlier testimony by auto industry representatives against the higher overtime proposal, declaring they were repeating the same arguments used against shorter hours 30 years ago.

The UAW officer recalled that in 1933 he worked 84 hours a week at 45 cents an hour for the Detroit Gear Co., but after the National Industrial Recovery Act codes came into effect, his hours were cut to 40 and his wages went up to 60 cents.

Woodcock charged that the industry "sees disaster in every social improvement which is forced upon it." He predicted that "if the overtime penalty is increased, the companies will discover that a lot of allegedly 'unavoidable' overtime is in fact quite avoidable, and in some future hearing spokesmen for the industry will be pointing with pride to their accomplishments in reducing overtime and spreading employment since 1964."

Strike Time Ratio Unchanged Over Year

Approximately 125,000 workers were involved in work stoppages in February for 1.13 million man-days, or 12 one-hundredths of 1 percent of all scheduled working time, according to a preliminary report by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The lost time ratio was the same as in February 1963 and compares with a rate of one-tenth of 1 percent in January. About 225 stoppages, involving 80,000 workers, started during the month and another 150 continued from January.

Budget Request Cut in House:

Labor and Welfare Given $6.9 Billion

The House voted an increase in appropriations for labor, health, education and welfare programs but the total was less than the Administration had sought.

The omnibus money bill—combining funds for the Labor Dept., the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and related agencies including the National Labor Relations Board and the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service—totaled $6.9 billion. This is $1.1 billion more than the 1964 fiscal year appropriations, largely because of money earmarked for new education and training programs, but $654 million less than the President had sought.

Most of the money requests knocked out of the bill were supplemental appropriations sought for the balance of the present fiscal year, ending June 30.

Rep. John E. Fogarty (D-R. I.), who steered the measure to 344-21 passage, termed the Administration's budget request "one of the most conservative that has been submitted to Congress in recent years."

Except for new programs voted by Congress last year, he said, "it was a hold-the-line budget . . . and, in many cases, even cut back from the level of operation provided for by the 1964 appropriations."

Cuts May Need Revision

Fogarty stressed that some of the cuts—such as a $100 million reduction in public assistance grants to states—dealt with mandatory obligations and "if the committee's estimate proves to be too low" will have to be made up in a supplemental appropriation.

He also invited the Administration to come back with an additional request if it finds that the $83 million cut in manpower training funds is holding back the program.

The new or expanded programs for which increases were granted include $300 million for manpower training, $464 million for higher education construction aid, $37 million for defense education programs, $85 million for aid to medical and other health-profession schools and students, and $35 million for construction of community mental health centers.

The House made no changes in the Appropriation Committee recommendations, which had bipartisan support.

Private employment agencies lost out in their effort to bar the U.S. Employment Service from registering applicants who are already employed. They have charged this is government "competition" with private, fee-charging businesses.

The Appropriations Committee granted the full amount sought for operation of the federal-state employment offices and merely said the USES should give "priority" to finding jobs for the unemployed.

The NLRB was given $24 million, an increase of $1.54 million from its 1964 budget but $1.25 million less than the Administration had asked. Both the Mediation & Conciliation Service and the National Mediation Board received the full amount requested, modest increases above the current year's spending.

A section of the Appropriations Committee report dealt a setback to labor-supported efforts to provide expansion of federal safety inspection under the Walsh-Healey Act by urging greater use of state inspection for this purpose.

NEW YORK CITY Central Labor Council sponsored this enthusiastic rally for passage of civil rights bill. Among the speakers who addressed the 4,000 union members at Manhattan Center was Donald Slaiman, at right, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights.

Job Equality Labor Unit Appoints Executive Aide

Thomas McNamara, for nine years executive secretary of the Detroit Building Trades Council, has been appointed executive secretary of the Labor Advisory Council working with the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

McNamara, who will work in Washington, will assist with the development and administration of programs by the advisory council, made up of presidents of 16 AFL-CIO international unions.

His appointment, made on the recommendation of the labor advisers, was announced by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, who is also vice chairman of the President's committee, and Hobart Taylor, Jr., executive vice chairman.

The function of the Labor Advisory Council is to advise the equal employment committee on union matters and assist in implementing union fair-practice programs.

In statements signed Nov. 15, 1962, the President's committee and 117 AFL-CIO national and international affiliates pledged to push for equal opportunity in all aspects of employment in which unions are involved and in union membership and facilities.

The 16-member Labor Advisory Council was set up last month in a White House meeting and named as its chairman Pres. John H. Lyons, Jr. of the Iron Workers. Lyons and three other union presidents—Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers, Max Greenberg of Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Workers, Anthony J. DeAndrade of the Printing Pressmen—form a subcommittee to formulate recommendations for the advisory council.

McNamara, a union official for more than a quarter of a century, served as general organizer for the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and business manager of Detroit Pipe Fitters Local 636. He will meet with the subcommittee at its next session scheduled for Apr. 27.

He is a brother of Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.).

ICFTU Hits Trial Of Apartheid Foes

Brussels, Belgium — World labor protests the failure of South Africa to halt a trial on "sabotage" charges of widely known leaders who oppose the apartheid racial segregation policy, Gen. Sec. Omer Becu of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions has cabled the South African government.

Becu also asked the intervention of United Nations Sec. Gen. U Thant in getting the Verwoerd government to carry out a 1963 resolution of the UN General Assembly urging abandonment of the trial, and the release from restraint of all apartheid opponents. The nine men on trial at Rivonia, South Africa, could "well face the death penalty," Becu said.

Court Upsets Pennsylvania Gerrymander

are currently before the high court.

Labor contended, and the court agreed, that the redistricting legislation was weighted heavily in favor of rural counties to the disadvantage of urban areas and was "gerrymandered" in an "arbitrary and capricious" manner.

Key to the union argument, State AFL-CIO Pres. Harry Boyer said, is the contention that "the vote of one citizen cannot and should not have a greater value than the vote of another."

The successful suit was brought in the names of three Pennsylvania AFL-CIO officers—Exec. Vice Pres. Michael Johnson, Sec. Harry Block and Vice Pres. Frederick B. Hughes—plus Pres. Henry P. Groton of the Delaware County AFL-CIO and Pres. Eugene J. Considine of the Greater Wilkes-Barre AFL-CIO.

In addition to challenging the unequal representation, the suit attacked the policy of "lumping together a number of representatives in a single large district." This, the union leaders contended, "dilutes and weakens representative, democratic government."

The court, headed by Senior Judge Albert B. Maris of the 3d Circuit Court of Appeals, retained jurisdiction of the case and said the injunction against proceeding with elections on the basis of the new law would be reimposed if the state did not file its appeal to the Supreme Court within 15 days.

Organizer Feted On Retirement

Philadelphia—Frank D. Vrataric, veteran AFL-CIO staff representative and organizer in the Scranton-Wilkes-Barre area, was guest of honor here at a retirement party marking the close of more than 30 years of union activity.

Born 65 years ago in Croatia, now part of Yugoslavia, Vrataric migrated to the United States as a young man and became active in the Mine Workers. He became an organizer for the Clothing Workers in 1937, joined the staff of the former CIO on Mar. 6, 1944, and the AFL-CIO staff following the merger.

House Panel Clears Union Bonding Change

A House Labor subcommittee has approved legislation eliminating a Landrum-Griffin Act requirement which has sharply increased the cost of bonding union officers and employes.

Surety companies jumped the premiums on bonding of union officials by 50 percent after passage of the Landrum-Griffin Act, which required that coverage include an undefined "faithful discharge of duties."

Subsequently, when a committee headed by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler assembled proof that the bonding companies had encountered no claims which would not be covered under the normal honesty bonds, the surcharge was reduced to 25 percent.

Even this, the AFL-CIO contended, was unnecesary and the federation at its convention last November called for modification of the provision. The delegates charged it "has unnecessarily increased bonding costs and has provided surety companies with a windfall in the form of increased premium payments for a risk that experience over the past four years has proved to be inconsequential."

The House subcommittee, headed by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), voted to strike out the "faithful discharge of duties" language and substitute the standard requirement that the bonds "provide protection against loss by reason of acts of fraud or dishonesty," language which is already in the Welfare & Pension Plans Reporting Act.

The subcommittee bill also includes labor-supported provisions which would:

- Permit unions to obtain bonds from companies other than those on an approved Treasury Dept. list, providing the Secretary of Labor gave his consent, or to adopt forms of self-insurance meeting with Labor Dept. approval.
- Compel surety companies issuing bonds required by the Landrum-Griffin or Welfare & Pension Plans acts to file an annual report with the Labor Dept. describing their bonding experience and reporting premiums, claims and expenses.

Amendment Talk Marks Rights Fight for civil rights in a church near the Capitol, with prominent clergymen from all over the nation conducting the services.

Humphrey and Kuchel warned in a statement against civil rights demonstrations that cause inconvenience and hardship to others.

"Illegal disturbances, demonstrations which lead to violence or to injury, strike grievous blows at the cause of decent civil rights legislation," the two Senate rights leaders cautioned.

The Senate has been discussing civil rights since Mar. 9, although it was not until Mar. 30 that formal debate opened on the bill. The earlier period was taken up with the preliminary maneuvers to bring the measure to the floor.

After one embarrassing experience, when a Saturday session had to be suspended because a quorum couldn't be obtained, civil rights supporters have been able to produce the 51 senators necessary for the Senate to do business.

Quorum calls have pulled senators away from speaking engagements, dinners and on the opening day of the baseball season members who had taken the afternoon off to see the baseball "Senators" were called back to the Capitol after the 3d inning.

D. C. Rights Staff Increase Sought

Increases in the staff of the Commissioners' Council on Human Relations in the District of Columbia have been urged on Congress by the D.C. Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

Chairman Ben D. Segal of the Subcommittee on Equal Employment Opportunity told a Senate subcommittee that the work of the council in recent months has contributed effectively to improving the climate of race relations in Washington. Illinois Total 51%:

Big Smith Vote Dims Goldwater Victory

By Willard Shelton

Chicago—Sen. Barry Goldwater picked up most delegates to the Republican National Convention in the Illinois GOP presidential preferential primary and his campaign managers claimed a "great triumph," but the victory was interpreted by political observers here as something less than smashing.

These oddities were cited:

- Sen. Margaret Chase Smith of Maine, the only rival candidate named on the ballot, won 25 percent of the total GOP presidential vote. This is considered an extraordinary showing for the New England senator in an inland state, where she campaigned only slightly, in contrast to the trivial 3 percent she won in New Hampshire's Mar. 10 primary.
- An avowed Goldwater supporter, State Treas. William J. Scott, was overwhelmed more than 3 to 2 in the Republican gubernatorial primary by Charles H. Percy, Chicago industrialist strongly identified with the "Eisenhower wing" of the GOP.
- More than 175,000 Republicans of about 1 million who voted in the contest for governor left their ballots unmarked in the presidential preference race, declining to vote for either Goldwater or Mrs. Smith and refusing to write in the name of any other candidate. Goldwater got about 51 percent of the GOP total.

Another oddity was that Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama, southern Democratic segregationist, got more write-in votes in the Republican primary than Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York, an avowed candidate who felt that Illinois was so clearly "Goldwater territory" that he did not enter his name.

Nearly complete unofficial returns showed that Goldwater won about 63 percent of the vote among approximately 800,000 Republicans who marked their ballots in the presidential column, rolling up a total of 512,616.

Sen. Smith had 205,690 and the major write-in votes showed 46,472 for Henry Cabot Lodge, U.S. ambassador to Viet Nam, and 23,083 for former Vice Pres. Richard Nixon. Neither had a hard campaign organized for write-ins.

The tabulation showed 1,920 write-ins for Rockefeller, 384 for Michigan's Gov. George Romney, 1,379 for Pennsylvania's Gov. William W. Scranton—and 2,248 for Wallace. Counting write-ins for Wallace on the Democratic ballot, the Alabama governor totaled more than twice as many as Rockefeller.

In the GOP fight for nomination for governor, Percy got 615,686 and Scott 383,462.

Incumbent Democratic Gov. Otto Kerner was renominated without opposition in a placid primary.

Some 40 of 48 GOP delegates elected were announced Goldwater supporters, with 10 additional delegates to be chosen at a state convention. The preferential primary is considered as indicating pre-convention sentiment in Illinois, but in fact is not binding.

In the most hotly-contested congressional race, incumbent Rep. William L. Dawson (D) won by a 2-1 margin against a 45-year-old challenger, A. A. Rayner. Rayner, the first serious opponent in years in Dawson's 1st Congressional District, ran as a militant civil rights supporter in the heavily Negro area.

Eighty-five-year-old Rep. Thomas J. O'Brien (D) was renominated in the 6th District but died during the day after a long illness. O'Brien was long the acknowledged leader of the Illinois Democratic congressional delegation.

Scott forced Percy to repeated public statements of benign neutrality on presidential candidates, declaring he preferred "no other candidate above Goldwater." In the election, however, Percy submerged his rival, the indication being that he had successfully kept his gubernatorial candidacy from being entangled in ill-tempered and inconclusive presidential rivalries.

COPE Film Ready For Sale or Rental

The Work Ahead, a new film shown at this year's COPE area conferences, is now available for purchase or rental from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education film division.

Prepared for union use in the coming political campaign, the film portrays the Kennedy-Johnson team on the 1960 campaign circuit and guiding the New Frontier program through its first three years. In the final segment of the 13-minute film, Pres. Johnson restates his Administration's commitment to the Kennedy program and lauds COPE workers for their contributions of time and effort.

The film sells for $25. It may be rented for $3 with reservations urged at least three weeks in advance and alternate dates given.

MICHIGAN LEGISLATORS were guests of Detroit business and labor on recent three-day visit. About 125 of state's 144 legislators saw sights and heard explanations of city's advantages and needs, also told about their own problems in considering legislation. Shown at reception for visitors, left to right: Pres. Al Barbour of Wayne County AFL-CIO; Speaker Allison Green of State House of Representatives; Pres. August "Gus" Scholle, Michigan AFL-CIO.

Oklahoma Candidates Hit 'Work' Proposal

The three leading contenders for the Democratic nomination for U.S. Senator from Oklahoma have gone on record as opposed to efforts to outlaw the union shop.

Incumbent U.S. Sen. J. Howard Edmundson has two principal competitors in the May 5 primary election, State Sen. Fred Harris and former Gov. Raymond Gary. On the same ballot is a proposed "right-to-work" amendment to the state constitution which, if enacted, would prohibit the union shop.

The National Council for Industrial Peace reported that Edmondson has told newsmen he has not changed the position he took in 1958.

At that time he declared his opposition to any law "that infringes upon freedom of contract between employer and employe organizations." Opposing a "right-to-work" bill then before the legislature, Edmundson said the right to enter into contracts providing union security is "fundamental."

Harris sharply criticized the proposed "right-to-work" amendment on the ballot and declared:

"As a state senator I voted against the 'right-to-work' law . . . and I will vote against it as a citizen on May 5. Its passage would not help Oklahoma or its people."

Gary, the third major contender, has also spoken out against "right-to-work," the industrial peace council declared.

Earlier the state's senior U. S. senator, Mike Monroney (D), warned that a ban on union shop agreements would bring industrial "strife" to Oklahoma and announced that he will vote against the "right-to-work" amendment.

In another development in the campaign over the "work" referendum, the president of the Kansas State AFL-CIO, Floyd Black, sharply challenged claims made by a Kansas manufacturer in a speech at Oklahoma City.

L. E. Weiss of Wichita, head of the Kansas "right-to-work" organization, was reported to have claimed in an Oklahoma City speech that union membership in Kansas has increased since "right-to-work" was adopted in 1958, and that wages have risen faster than the national average.

Black said the ban on union security agreements has in fact brought a drop of 35,000 in union membership and wage increases "have lagged far behind" the average for states which do not have a "right-to-work" law.

He quoted a report to the legislature by the governor on the loss of thousands of manufacturing jobs in the years following enactment of "right-to-work" and noted that a number of leading Kansas newspapers have called for the law's repeal.

Cranston, Hall Backed By California COPE

San Francisco—More than 500 delegates to the California Council on Political Education endorsed State Controller Alan Cranston for Democratic nomination to the Senate in the June 2 primary and former Gov. Fred Hall of Kansas for the Republican nomination.

The COPE executive council the previous day had interviewed Cranston, Hall, Pierre Salinger, former press secretary to the late Pres. Kennedy who had entered the contest on the final filing date, and a spokesman for incumbent Democratic Sen. Clair Engle. A 13-member advisory committee also heard the candidates.

For the state's 38-member congressional delegation, the council endorsed 31 Democrats including 21 incumbents, left six districts open (making no choice between candidates). In the remaining district it specifically voted no endorsement.

For the state senate, where 20 districts are up, the council endorsed 13 Democrats including 12 incumbents and left seven districts open. For the state assembly, it endorsed 51 Democrats and three Republicans, left 21 districts open, passed a "no endorsement" judgment in seven others.

Among a dozen incumbent state legislators denied endorsement was Assembly Speaker Jesse M. Unruh, who previously has had labor's support.

The delegates rejected an open endorsement in the Democratic senatorial race before voting support to Cranston. On Engle, the incumbent senator, the executive council and advisory committee reported a "consensus" that the senator's illness made him unable to serve. Despite "sincere compassion" for him both as an individual and senator, the council said "it was impossible to accord him an endorsement without paving the way for an ultra-conservative to capture the seat."

The council pointed out that Hall, seeking the GOP nomination, had "steadfastly opposed 'right-to-work' legislation while strongly supporting workers' rights." Running against Hall are two ultra-conservative Republicans.

Council Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts said the temperament of the meeting revealed "a clear indication that the labor movement is tightening up its endorsements to make them count, and that it is fed up with politicians who speak out of both sides of their mouths in courting working people while serving the special interests."

Grand Jury Indicts Teamsters' Aide

Charles L. O'Brien, business agent of Teamster Local 299 in Detroit, was indicted by a federal grand jury in Chattanooga, Tenn., on charges of "indirectly" offering $25,000 to a juror in the trial of Teamsters' Pres. James R. Hoffa to swear falsely that Hoffa did not get a fair trial.

Deputy Atty. Gen. Nicholas Katzenbach said the asserted offer was not completed and that the juror, Mrs. Callie Key, reported it to the court. O'Brien was released on $15,000 bond pending later arraignment. The jury convicted Hoffa on jury-tampering charges, and he has said he will appeal.

2 AFM Locals In Chicago Told to Merge

New York—The merger of two Musicians' locals in Chicago has been ordered by the executive board of the international parent union, Pres. Herman Kenin announced.

Local 10 is largely made up of white musicians, Kenin pointed out, and Local 208 is preponderantly colored. The international moved to direct the merger, he said, only after nearly a year of negotiations to effect a voluntary agreement, with the parent union providing legal and accounting services and official supervision to speed the process.

Talks Failed

The international acted after voluntary merger negotiations had failed to produce a "final solution of comparatively minor items" by Apr. 1, the date set last year for agreement.

Equal rights for each member of both locals are guaranteed, Kenin said, with "specific safeguards for individual and property rights." Former members of Local 208 are "assured representatives of their exclusive choice for a period of six years after complete merger." A joint executive advisory board was ordered to launch the processes of final merger.

Kenin continued:

"Both locals have a long and honorable history . . . and have shared in advancing the cause of musicians . . . The jurisdictions of the two locals are identical and their objectives are the same. Their continued separation is founded only on the unfortunate circumstance that their constituencies reflect the color of their members."

Safety Council Awards Won By Labor Units

The AFL-CIO, one union local and four trade union publications were among recipients of the 1963 National Safety Council Public Interest Awards.

The awards, begun in 1948, "recognize leadership, initiative, and originality in promoting accident prevention." The trade union awards were for promotion of the Labor Day Safety campaign.

In addition to the AFL-CIO, winners included Retail Clerks Local 324 of Buena Park, Calif., the Mine Workers Journal, the Federation News of Chicago, the Voice of the Cement Workers, and the NMU Pilot.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, when informed of the award to the federation, was told:

"We at the council are very much aware of all you have been doing for safety, and we are delighted that the judges agreed.

"We hope you feel, as we do, that the greatest dividends from your safety efforts is not the award but the knowledge that you have helped prevent many accidents."

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan was chairman of the 1963 Labor Day Safety Campaign. Vice Pres. O. A. Knight is chairman of the 1964 campaign..

White House Parleys Yield Basic Railroad Agreement

President Asks Action On 5 Bills

Pres. Johnson gave Congress a priority list of five major bills and told newsmen he hopes they will be enacted before the political party conventions this summer.

Two of the President's "Big Five" measures have already passed the House—civil rights legislation and the food stamp bill.

The others on the list, still before House committees, are a revised federal pay raise bill, old-age social security hospital insurance and the Administration's anti-poverty package.

The Republican convention opens July 13 and the Administration's legislative timetable is obviously dependent on the duration of the civil rights battle, which has occupied the Senate since Mar. 9.

Johnson, answering questions at a televised news conference, had this to say about his priority bills:

Civil Rights: "The bill now pending in the Senate is a good bill . . . we ought to get it passed as early as we can so that before school begins next year we'll have this law on the books."

Emancipation of the Negro, he said, "may be a proclamation, [but] it is not a fact until education is blind to color, until employment is unaware of race." Congress, he added, should "act promptly."

Food Stamps: The President termed the House-passed bill "very important" to consumers, producers and businessmen alike. The measure would adapt an existing

Bargaining Ends Long Stalemate

By Eugene A. Kelly

A basic agreement on the terms of a new collective bargaining settlement between five railroad brotherhoods and 200 U.S. railroads was achieved after 13 days of intensive negotiations at the White House level.

The agreement, which must be submitted to union bodies for ratification, was characterized by a union spokesman as a "significant achievement."

Pres. Johnson, whose appeal for continuing talks headed off a rail strike scheduled for Apr. 24, called the settlement "a victory for collective bargaining."

The agreement, details of which still must be spelled out in contract language, came as a 15-day no-strike truce was nearing its expiration. Both sides made concessions to settle the dispute over working rules and wage adjustments that had defied solution for nearly five years.

The settlement was reached with the help of Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and four other mediators named by Johnson—Assistant Labor Sec. James J. Reynolds, Chairman Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., of the National Mediation Board, and two private mediators, Prof. George W. Taylor and Theodore W. Kheel—and with the almost daily intervention of the President himself.

The negotiators agreed on the following terms affecting some 200,000 operating employes represented by the Conductors & Brakemen, Firemen & Enginemen, Switchmen, Engineers, and Railroad Trainmen:

- Seven paid holidays for all hourly-paid employes.
- Wage increases providing a new flat rate of $3.10 an hour for yard foremen (conductors) and

Common Issue Seen Binding U.S., Canada

By Gervase N. Love

Montreal — Canada and the United States have mutual problems and face the same fundamental challenge in providing "jobs for all" who want to work, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph Keenan told the Canadian Labor Congress at its fifth constitutional convention here.

"Here we have no differences, except in degree," Keenan asserted, "for your society, like ours, is based upon private enterprise on the one hand and political democracy on the other.

"The question we both face," said Keenan, who is secretary of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, "is whether such a society

$5 Billion U. S. Spending Hike Needed to Drop Jobless Rate

A $5 billion-a-year boost in federal spending for public needs is necessary to put America's idle manpower to work, a Senate Labor subcommittee declared after an 11-month investigation into "the most pressing domestic problem—unemployment."

Subcommittee Chairman Joseph S. Clark and his five Democratic colleagues called for both new and expanded federal programs to bring the unemployment rate down to 3 percent by a Jan. 1, 1968 target date. The three Republican members of the Employment & Manpower subcommittee went along with part of the recommended program but balked at the "aggressive expenditure policy" outlined by the majority.

The 104-page majority report endorses many of the programs long urged by the AFL-CIO and warns that short-term, half-measures will not be adequate "to absorb the combined pressures of labor force growth and productivity increases."

Following are highlights of the subcommittee's recommendations:

- The accelerated public works program should be "extended, expanded and made permanent. . . . A special program of direct employment should be undertaken in poverty-stricken rural and urban areas which will permit the hard-core unemployed to work on projects which will alleviate the physical deficiencies of their own en-

NIX WEIS is a Pennsylvania Dutch way of saying "Don't patronize the Weis Markets," a 50-store chain in Pennsylvania whose Meat Cutters have been on strike for nine months. Pickets Donald Armpriester, left, and Kenneth Luppold are two of the 40 members of Meat Cutters Local 195 who have been taking turns informing the public in Reading, York, Lancaster and other towns in central and eastern Pennsylvania.

Meat Cutters Firm In 9-Month Strike

York, Pa.—Nine months of walking a picket line through blizzards and heat waves have not broken the spirit of 40 members of the Meat Cutters, on strike against 50 stores of the Weis Markets scattered from Pennsylvania Dutch territory to the coal regions.

Weis Markets, based in Scranton, Pa., is known to the supermarket world as one of the largest independent chains in the East without a union contract. So it was news when meat department employes in four stores here and two in Lancaster voted overwhelmingly last year for representation by Local 195 of the Meat Cutters. Talks on a first contract broke down over union security, however, and the employes walked out Aug. 13.

Two months after the strike began negotiations were resumed and a settlement seemed in sight when Weis announced it would not reinstate any of the strikers and that replacement employes had been hired as strikebreakers. The union then appealed to central labor bodies in 13 Pennsylvania cities and launched a consumer boycott campaign.

Strikers' morale remains high though Weis, the union said, has tried every legal maneuver known to strangle the walkout. It has secured injunctions against mass demonstrations in six counties, filed libel suits against union members and harassed pickets in other ways, according to Local 195.

The union's most persistent problem, according to Vice Pres. Leon Schachter of the international union, has been how to use pickets most effectively against stores scattered through central and eastern Pennsylvania. Labor support throughout the area has helped meet this problem to date.

Dutch Motif

After six months of picketing and handbilling, the union regrouped its forces and launched a new drive for public support with a campaign that had a Pennsylvania Dutch motif. Pickets carried round signs with the slogan "Nix Weis," in red and yellow letters—a colloquial way of telling the public "Don't Shop Weis."

Leaflets and handbills peppered Weis's self-created image as a benevolent employer. The fact is, the union noted, that Weis wages are $25 to $35 a week below union wages for the same work.

Pres. Fred Rauser of Local 195, in Philadelphia, charged the firm with harassing pickets to stir trouble and create incidents through which the union could be charged with violating court injunctions. But the pickets, walking peacefully but purposefully, are counting on the public, and fellow unionists, to help win reasonable contract terms, Rauser said.

IAM Offers Labor-Keyed Radio News

Sponsorship of a new weekly radio news program designed to tell U. S. communities "what the labor movement does and what it stands for" has been announced by Pres. A. J. Hayes of the Machinists.

The program, called the World of Labor, is available for sponsorship by IAM groups on local stations. Hayes said that because the content is "frankly pro-labor," program time may have to be paid for on some stations. Cost figures reported to date range from $6.50 a week in Biloxi, Miss., to $35 on Long Island.

The programs consist of reports from Washington, D. C., by the staff of The Machinist on news of importance to union families.

Few Against Many

In a letter to affiliated unions and IAM districts, Hayes noted that right wing extremists broadcast 6,000 radio programs weekly in the U.S. The new IAM program represents another practical way to help set the record straight, he said.

Sponsors of the World of Labor recommend the use of smaller independent stations. The best broadcast time, the IAM has found, is during the morning hours when most union members are driving to work.

Intent of Congress Key:

L-G Informational Picketing Upheld by Supreme Court

By Willard Shelton

The Supreme Court has ruled that the Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959 does not prohibit peaceful, non-coercive union picketing that appeals to customers not to buy a struck product sold in a store.

In a second case the court ruled that the law does not bar a union from appealing to store managers not to sell a struck product and informing the managers that a peaceful consumer handbilling campaign would be directed against the struck product.

The decision in each case was given by Associate Justice Brennan, who carefully spelled out the court's interpretation of the impact of the law on union handbilling or picketing.

Congress specified that a union could not "threaten, coerce or restrain" a neutral employer by picketing designed to prevent his doing business with a struck employer, the court noted.

But in the two cases before the court, Brennan wrote, there was no effort to mount a consumer boycott of the second employer in toto, or persuade employes not to report to work, or interfere with or restrain deliveries. He cited a congressional practice of dealing "explicitly" with "isolated evils" that might exist in "the sensitive area of peaceful picketing," and pointed out that "a broad condemnation of peaceful picketing," which might "collide" with the free speech guarantees of the First Amendment, "has never been adopted by Congress."

An intention to do so in the 1959 Landrum-Griffin amendments to basic labor law "is not revealed with that 'clearest indication in the legislative history' which we require," he declared.

The decisions came in two cases originating with the unaffiliated Teamsters in which the AFL-CIO filed a brief with the Supreme Court stressing the significance of the issues.

The federation brief was filed by General Counsel J. Albert Woll, Robert C. Mayer and Theodore J. St. Antoine, and Associate General Counsel Thomas E. Harris.

In the first case, the union placed a limited number of pickets with signs asking customers of Safeway stores in Yakima, Wash., not to purchase apples sold to the store by 24 struck fruit packers and warehousemen.

The store managers were informed in advance that the union intended this appeal to customers and that pickets were instructed to stay away from delivery entrances, not to interfere with Safeway employes, and not to ask customers to refrain from patronizing Safeway generally.

A three-member National Labor Relations Board panel held that by "literal language" and "interpretative gloss," Congress had forbidden such consumer picketing. The Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia reversed the decision but said the NLRB could reopen the case for "affirmative proof that a substantial economic impact" on Safeway "had occurred or was likely to occur."

Justice Brennan was joined by Chief Justice Warren and Justices Clark, White and Goldberg in reversing both the Appellate Court and the NLRB.

Brennan's opinion said that on the facts of the case, an "economic loss" by Safeway, even one that "might lead Safeway to drop the item as a poor seller," would not of itself establish union action, to "threaten, coerce or restrain" within the terms of Landrum-Griffin.

"Peaceful consumer picketing to shut off all trade" with the second employer unless he aids the union against the struck employer "is poles apart from such picketing which only persuades . . . customers not to buy the struck product," he said.

Justice Harlan dissented in an opinion joined by Justice Stewart, saying "nothing" in the Landrum-Griffin Act supports a "fine distinction . . . between general and limited" second employer picketing.

Justice Black in a separate opinion agreed with Harlan that Congress did intend to forbid all informational picketing of a "neutral" employer but said that this was a violation of union free speech rights and should be struck down as unconstitutional.

In the other case, the court was unanimous in upholding the right of a union to appeal to managers of retail stores not to stock and sell certain struck products. There was no effort to get the managers to cease their work for the stores, Brennan wrote, but to make a "managerial decision," a legal activity prior to Landrum-Griffin and not made illegal by the law.

The managers were notified that the union intended to handbill consumers asking them not to buy "named items" the court noted. Union publicity "for the purpose of truthfully advising the public" of the distribution of struck products specifically is protected by a Landrum-Griffin provision, the court ruled, noting that it arose from "a profound Senate concern that the unions' freedom to appeal to the public . . . be adequately safeguarded."

The decision reversed the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and upheld the NLRB which had previously dismissed the employer's complaint.

15 Days of Bargaining Produce Rail Compact After Long Stalemate

$2.90 for yard helpers (switchmen), with commensurate increases that the unions said will mean a 4 percent increase for engineers and firemen-helpers on a five-day-week basis.

- The mileage schedule, on which pay is figured will remain unchanged—a point the unions considered a major one.
- Until Jan. 1, 1968, any negotiated increase in wages will be applied only to the basic mileage unit of work and not to miles in excess of that unit.
- Railroads will offer "suitable lodging" or an "equitable allowance" for all road employes, except those in commuter service, who must lay over between runs at away-from-home terminals. One meal allowance of $1.50 will be given per layover.
- With certain exceptions, no operating employe will be used on self-propelled equipment. Any employe displaced by this change will be given severance pay and job retraining.
- A study committee from both sides will consider adopting new national rules governing the use of road crews in more than one railroad division. The study will not be final or binding on either party—the only issue so exempt.

The unions agreed to withdraw requests for overtime pay for road employes after eight hours, and for a nightshift pay differential. The carriers withdrew the major portion of their request involving combining the work of road and yard crews, but procedures were spelled out for applying a new yardstick in taking off the last engine in a yard.

The President, who announced the settlement, called the terms "just and fair". The agreement, he said, is "American business and American labor operating at its very best" and showing a "face of industrial democracy that we can proudly show to the entire world."

Union Signers

The union announcement of the pact was signed by Grand Chief R. E. Davidson of the Locomotive Engineers, Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Firemen & Enginemen, Vice Pres. George Harris of the Conductors & Brakemen, Pres. Charles Luna of the Railroad Trainmen and Pres. Neil F. Speirs of the Switchmen.

While the agreement, they said, falls short of satisfying all the important demands of the employes, "we recognize that significant gains have been made." Chief among these, they noted, are "the reaffirmation of the 100-mile unit of work, wage adjustments for yard employes, and expense allowances for away-from-home crewmen.

"The groundwork for collective bargaining in the railroad industry has been reestablished," the union heads declared. "We hope it will promote true cooperation and meaningful communication between labor and management."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged Congress, in testimony last summer, to encourage the freer use of collective bargaining in the rail dispute because, he said, it has "not been exhausted" and in fact had only recently succeeded in narrowing the issues in dispute.

He urged Congress to direct the parties to resume bargaining with Wirtz and the National Mediation Board assisting and declared:

"I have a lot of faith in collective bargaining."

Young Democrats Assail 'Work' Laws

Norfolk, Va.—So-called "right-to-work" laws are "contrary to the principles and policies of the Young Democratic Clubs," the national committee declared at an organization meeting here.

The resolution cited the consistent opposition of the YDCA to such laws and took note of the fact that the Young Democrats of Oklahoma, where a "work" proposal will be voted on at the primary election on May 5, have taken a strong stand in opposition.

Darlington Case:

High Court Review Set in Mill Closing

The Supreme Court has agreed to hear arguments on whether a nationwide textile firm with 102 plants was legally justified in closing one of its plants and discharging 500 production workers without bargaining with the Textile Workers Union of America.

The court, in granting a review petition filed for the National Labor Relations Board by U.S. Solicitor Gen. Archibald Cox, cleared the way for a decision on an issue of major importance to unions and management.

The board, ruling on a union charge, decided by a 3-2 margin in October 1962 that the Darlington Mfg. Co., owned and controlled by South Carolina "right-to-work" leader Roger Milliken and his family, was ordered to close one day after the TWUA won an NLRB election at the cotton print mill in Darlington, S.C., to avoid bargaining with the union.

Last December the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, refusing to enforce the labor board's decision in the case, ruled in another 3-2 decision that the law had not been violated and that Darlington had the "absolute prerogative" of going out of business under the circumstances.

It is this latter decision that the high court agreed to review.

The mill closing has, according to the union, had a harmful impact on its organizing campaigns in the textile industry. Posters of closed mills have been used to discourage union membership in an industry hoping to follow the example of the Milliken firm, which has successfully kept unions out of most of its plants for many years, the TWUA said.

In the petition for review, Cox said the questions to be put before the Supreme Court are these:

- Whether an employer who owns several plants violates the National Labor Relations Act when he "permanently discontinues operations in one plant and discharges its employes" to avoid bargaining with a union "and to retaliate against the employes for their union activities."
- Whether the NLRB has the power to order that the fired workers be employed again or placed on a preferential hiring list for hiring at other plants, and be given back pay equal to their lost income.

Also involved in the suit is the assumption that Darlington and the Deering-Milliken chain are to be treated as a single employer with several plants. The NLRB held that they are, but the 4th Circuit judges reversed that ruling.

The appeals judges said "power to command an employer to stay in business indefinitely, or assess him with damages for permanently going out of business, is not an NLRB prerogative." Two judges in a minority opinion said Milliken's conduct "not only violates the basic policies" of the labor act but is literally forbidden by the act.

Rail Shopcraft Unions Press Bargaining Goals

Chicago—A three-pronged drive for wage increases and other improvements got unanimous support of more than 300 delegates to the 13th convention of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept. here.

The department is composed of six railroad shopcraft unions—the Boilermakers, Railway Carmen, Machinists, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Sheet Metal Workers and Firemen & Oilers.

The convention reaffirmed backing for:

- A wage increase of 10 percent, plus 14 cents an hour to eliminate inequities, in addition to a subsequent wage boost of 3.5 percent and cost of living adjustments.
- Holiday, vacation and health and welfare improvements.
- Job stabilization (an issue now before a presidential emergency board).

Dept. Pres. Michael Fox and others who addressed the convention stressed the importance of all three objectives to the more than 160,000 railroad shopcraft workers. In every instance, Fox said, railroad workers lag behind employes doing similar work in other industries.

Fox and Eli L. Oliver, consulting economist to the shopcraft unions, described unemployment as the most serious problem faced by rail workers. While railroads were piling up unprecedented profits, they said, shopcraft employment was down to 160,080 in 1962 from 387,374 in 1945—a loss of more than 13,000 jobs a year.

Oliver charged that these slashes in employment had come at a time when maintenance of equipment had been curtailed drastically on many railroads. Defects, many in violation of federal regulations, have caused serious accidents on a number of lines, he said.

In a strong appeal for stepped-up action on the political front, Fox asserted that "we have far too few friends in the halls of Congress now."

Pres. Russell Berg of the Boilermakers warned the delegates that they faced "the most momentous problems ever to confront railway labor. If we ever needed a united front it is now. And, we need such unity at all levels in our organizations."

Solid support of striking Florida East Coast Railway workers was voted by the convention, which unanimously adopted a motion urging the federal government to take over the railroad until a fair settlement is consummated.

Other resolutions called for:

- A six-hour day and a five-day week.
- Time off for voting in elections.
- An end to discrimination in all forms.
- An increase in income tax exemptions to $800 or $1,000 from the present $600.
- A moratorium on all mergers until a comprehensive study of transportation industry problems can be made.
- Pension and seniority safeguards for workers affected by mergers and consolidations.

Fox and Sec.-Treas. Howard Pickett were reelected by unanimous action of the convention.

IBEW Editor Named To Defense Panel

Marie V. Downey, managing editor of the Journal of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, has been appointed by Pres. Johnson to the Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services.

Wirtz Heads Manpower Committee

Pres. Johnson has established a high-level committee, headed by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, to evaluate the nation's manpower needs and the impact of federal programs.

He directed the group, to be known as the President's Committee on Manpower, to "formulate recommendations to insure the wise and full use of all of our manpower resources now and in the years to come."

The 11-member group, set up by executive order, includes five other Cabinet members, the secretaries of Defense, Interior, Commerce, Agriculture, and Health, Education & Welfare, plus heads of selected other government agencies.

Johnson said he was establishing the committee to carry out manpower evaluation functions under the Manpower Development and Training Act and to help "match the need for jobs with the need for skills."

In remarks at a White House signing ceremony, the President noted that the federal government is "the nation's largest employer" and its actions "often shape the manpower decisions of our private groups."

One of the initial problems to be tackled by the group is that of providing enough scientific personnel to meet the needs of both government and private industry, without depleting the ranks of teachers needed to train new scientists.

Garment Workers Win Blouse Anti-Trust Case

New York—The Ladies Garment Workers Union won a five-year battle to protect labor-management machinery in the blouse industry when the Dept. of Justice secured dismissal of an indictment and a civil anti-trust suit on the grounds that there was insufficient evidence for proceeding.

The indictment against three blouse industry associations, Local 25 of the ILGWU and industry and union officials was handed down in March 1959. Earlier this year the Justice Dept., asking for dismissal, told a federal court that there was not even a prima facie case against the union.

U.S. Judge Edward Weinfeld granted the dismissal application on April 15, and answered the objections of one group of employers to dropping the case—the Slate Belt Apparel Contractors Association of Pennsylvania—that the purpose of an indictment "is not to aid the private interests of a party engaged in controversy with others."

Justice, the official publication of the ILGWU, declared editorially:

"Five years ago the Republican politicians aimed a crushing blow at the ILGWU. It crashed down on the heads of the Slate Belt bosses last week, ending their dream of crippling the labor-management machinery that has banished the sweatshop from the garment industry."

The aim of the indictment, said the paper, "was to discredit clean unionism," and "its true target was the heart of collective bargaining not only in the blouse industry but in the women's garment industry."

The indictment charged that the union local and others were conspiring to fix prices and allocate contracting work in the blouse industry in the New York area in violation of the anti-trust laws.

ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky said at the time of the action that it was a "political indictment of the most sinister kind."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, pledging full support to the ILGWU at the time, said "the timing and nature of this indictment, which points an accusing finger at the ILGWU, a union recognized as clean and honest fully confirms the concern of the labor movement as to the real intent of those forces attempting to revive the use of the anti-trust laws against the unions."

Musicians Local Wins Round in Court Battle

New York—Musicians Local 802, with 28,000 members, won what it called an "important victory" in a ruling by the U.S. District Court for Southern New York denying an injunction to nine orchestra leaders who also are union members.

A petition for a preliminary restraining order was filed for the band leaders by Godfrey Schmidt, attorney who formerly served as a monitor of the ousted Teamsters.

The court here refused the petition on the ground that in this case, as in previous lawsuits filed by the band leaders, they have "failed to show irreparable harm to themselves" and that granting the injunction probably would result in widespread hardship to others.

A union source said the ruling means that Local 802 may continue to conduct a stable collective bargaining relationship with New York hotels, restaurants and night clubs.

In the latest of a series of lawsuits the leaders charged they were subjected involuntarily to terms of labor contracts over which they have no control because the contracts are negotiated by the union for players who are largely "sidemen" or employes of the leaders.

The court decision noted that the union has negotiated with two employer groups for more than 20 years and said the complainants had acquiesced in the practices complained of. The other charges, it said, have not been ruled on in other courts.

Woodworkers Aid Victims Of Quake

Port Alberni, B.C.—Members of the Woodworkers have voted to donate an amount that may reach $10,000 within a month for the relief of earthquake disaster victims in the Alberni valley.

Most West Coast cities escaped serious damage from tidal waves caused by the Good Friday quake in Alaska but the twin cities of Alberni and Port Alberni, on the west side of Vancouver Island, became a major disaster area.

Damage to homes and business places was put at more than $5 million, not counting the payroll loss or the damage to waterfront paper and lumber mills caused by the rush of tidal waves through the inlet.

Members of IWA Local 1-85 voted to donate $4,000 in local union funds and have authorized employers to withhold additional amounts from their pay to help those who lost homes, furnishings and autos.

Local 1-85 has for years been active in civic affairs, including a scholarship program for high school graduates. Members have been elected to the city councils of the two cities, one is a veteran member of the B.C. Legislative Assembly, and a former local officer is serving in the Canadian House of Commons.

LABOR SCHOOL sponsored by the Florida State AFL-CIO drew more than 50 union representatives from all over state to Daytona Beach for five-day training institute. Instructors at school sessions are, left to right: seated, Sec.-Treas. William E. Allen of state central body, and Robert Flaherty of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities; standing, Frank Fernbach, assistant director, AFL-CIO Dept. of Research; Executive Vice Pres. Arthur Hallgren, State AFL-CIO; George T. Guernsey, assistant director, AFL-CIO Dept. of Education; Walter Lightsey, Florida State Dept. of Vocational Education, and Daniel Rosetti of state central body.

Florida Institute Opens Summer School Season

Daytona Beach—A business agents' workshop and an up-to-date clinic on modern labor problems in Florida featured a five-day institute here attended by 50 delegates from unions all over the state.

Sponsored annually by the Florida State AFL-CIO, the program, designed to train union leaders, marked the start of the AFL-CIO summer school season. The one here was the first of more than 35 union schools which will be staffed by the federation's Dept. of Education.

State Pres. Charlie Harris, Miami, addressed the opening session and other central body officers were on the teaching staff—Sec.-Treas. William E. Allen and Executive Vice Pres. Arthur Hallgren.

Others on the faculty included Robert Flaherty of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities; Assistant Dir. George T. Guernsey and Stuart Brock, staff representative, AFL-CIO Dept. of Education; Assistant Dir. Frank Fernbach, Dept. of Research; Education Dir. Alfred L. Wickman of the Oil Workers, and Dan Rosetti of the state federation staff.

Walter Lightsey, member of the Florida Industrial Commission, was chairman of the workshop sessions for business agents and, with Guernsey and the state AFL-CIO officers, helped plan the institute.

One institute session was highlighted by a report from Chairman A. Worley Brown of the Florida Industrial Commission on current labor problems.

Delegates discussed labor's legislative goals in the state and on the national level, and the need for continuing register-and-vote campaigns. Evening sessions featured educational films, including two dramatic documentaries—the CBS film on migratory labor, "Harvest of Shame," and the NBC film on the radical right wing. "Case History of a Rumor."

Oakland Bakery Local Votes to Join ABC

Oakland, Calif.—Bakery & Confectionery Workers' Local 125, with 1,200 members, voted at a standing-room-only membership meeting here to affiliate with the American Bakery & Confectionary Workers, AFL-CIO. Only one dissenting vote was cast.

The meeting, best attended in the history of the local, voted to withdraw from B&CW, which was expelled from the federation in 1957 on findings of domination by corrupt elements. After the vote, ABC Executive Vice Pres. John DeConcini gave the local a new charter designating it as ABC Local 125-A.

The big bakers' local was the second to leave the expelled B&CW for ABC in the past 80 days. In January Local 452, largest U.S. candy workers' local with 4,500 members, took similar action at a meeting in New York City.

Presiding at the Oakland meeting was Pres. Bill Tumath of Local 125. Sec.-Treas. Henry Simpson made a report on the attempt of B&CW to impose a trusteeship on the local and to take over the union's building and other assets.

Following the lopsided vote for reaffiliation, Exec. Sec. Robert Ash of the Alameda County AFL-CIO welcomed the local and pledged "complete support" of the central body. Other messages of support were given by ABC Rep. Patrick D'Angelo, Sec.-Treas. Edward Kemmitt of ABC Local 24 in neighboring San Francisco, and DeConcini, who brought greetings from ABC Pres. Daniel E. Conway and Sec.-Treas. Curtis R. Sims.

Virgil Cummings, Local 125 business agent, congratulated members on their vote and on the record attendance.

Cummings said B&CW Vice Pres. Albert Mayer had been invited but did not appear. Mayer previously had been named as trustee of Local 125 by B&CW Pres. Max Kralstein and sent letters to all members announcing that the meeting had been canceled.

The answer was a hall packed with bakers and speckled with signs calling for support of the ABC and a return to the AFL-CIO.

Court Upsets Pricing Plan On Gasoline

The Supreme Court has ruled that a consignment plan set up by the Union Oil Co. of California to control gasoline prices paid by the consumer was a violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.

In a 5-3 decision, with Justice John M. Harlan abstaining, the high court reversed a decision of the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, which had ruled that a service station proprietor had failed to prove anti-trust violations by Union Oil in a suit for damages.

Case Sent Back

The case was sent back to the lower courts to determine the extent of damages, if any.

Under Union Oil's consignment system it maintained legal ownership of gasoline dispensed at service stations, setting the retail price and paying a commission on each gallon pumped.

The suit arose when Richard S. Simpson, a station operator in Fresno, Calif., was unable to renew his lease with the company after a local price war during which he sold gasoline at 2 cents a gallon lower than Union Oil specified.

Justice William O. Douglas, in the majority opinion, said the court was not outlawing consignment plans as such but that in the Union Oil case, "by reason of the lease and 'consignment' agreement dealers are coercively laced into an arrangement under which their supplier is able to impose non-competitive prices on thousands of persons who otherwise might be competitive. . . ."

Justices Potter Stewart, William J. Brennan and Arthur J. Goldberg dissented. They maintained that the issue of antitrust violations, as well as the question of damages should be determined by trial.

Entertainment Unions Plan World Parley

Brussels—Plans for a world conference of unions in the entertainment field were developed at a meeting here of a preparatory committee attended by representatives of performers, film, radio and television unions in the United States, Great Britain, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Sweden and Belgium.

The committee set up four technical subcommittees whose research in specified areas will be coordinated by Alan Forrest of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions' secretariat.

In Oklahoma Fight:

Censorship Charged To R-T-W Publisher

A radio and a television station in Oklahoma City have been charged with using "arbitrary and harassing tactics" to bar from the airwaves statements by prominent Americans opposing so-called "right-to-work" laws.

The national Council for Industrial Peace has asked the Federal Communications Commission for an immediate investigation of "censorship" imposed by Stations WKY and WKY-TV. Both stations are owned by E. K. Gaylord, a leading "right-to-work" supporter and publisher of Oklahoma City's only two daily newspapers.

Oklahomans will vote May 5 in a statewide referendum on a proposed constitutional amendment which would outlaw union shop agreements in the state. The Oklahoma affiliate of the industrial peace council had purchased time on the Gaylord stations, as well as other stations throughout the state, for spot announcements and special broadcasts urging a vote against the "right-to-work" proposal.

NCIP Dir. John M. Redding said the Gaylord-owned stations had barred the use of quotations from Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (R-N. Y.), UN Ambassador Adlai Stevenson, former Pres. Harry Truman, the late Pres. Kennedy and the late Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt.

Redding said the station management's ruling that the material could not be used without a specific, written waiver from each person quoted "would strike at the base of the concept of free speech and discussion."

He charged that opponents of "right-to-work," after having scheduled and paid for the air time, "are in fact being censored . . . in our effort to present our case to the people of the state."

Redding noted that Mrs. Roosevelt, whose statements were rejected, was one of the founders of the industrial peace council and co-chairman at the time of her death.

He told the FCC that the station also refused to run a statement by Sen. J. Howard Edmondson on the ground that he is a candidate for renomination in the Democratic primary and initially refused to air television spots featuring the state's senior senator, Mike Monroney. The latter decision was finally reversed, Redding noted.

Redding also charged that the station had refused to permit a filmed scene showing a group of children playing on a carousel.

"They are at such a distance that recognition is not possible," Redding commented. "Yet WKY and WKY-TV say this shot cannot be aired until we have waivers from each and every child in the picture."

He noted that a filmed scene by "right-to-work" advocates was permitted even though it shows scores of people crossing a bridge.

Other radio and television stations in Oklahoma have aired the material furnished by opponents of "right-to-work" without objection, Redding reported.

In view of the nearness of the election, he said, the FCC should hold "immediate hearings" on the dispute.

N.Y. Printers Adopt Plan On Non-Discrimination

New York—Union printers and commercial printing shops here have agreed to a specific plan for apprentice selection and training to implement the non-discrimination clause in their current contract.

The program was announced by Theodore W. Kheel, impartial chairman of the Joint Industry Board of the Printing Industry, who said it was "the most extensive and meaningful" so far devised for selecting apprentices.

Pres. Bertram A. Powers of Typographical Local 6 and Sec. Matthew A. Kelly of the Printers League joined Kheel in his announcement of the agreement. Powers said he had recommended that a similar agreement be worked out in the newspaper industry. The commercial shops employ about 5,000 journeyman printers and 600 apprentices; several thousand others are employed by newspapers.

The apprenticeship agreement provides that beginning next October, selection of individual candidates drawn from a pool of 1,000 miscellaneous composing room workers will be based on tests devised and administered by the New York State Employment Service and the School of Printing.

Apprenticeship applicants in October will be received from the miscellaneous employes between the ages of 18 and 26 who have a high school diploma or its equivalent, who have been employed for six months, and who are physically able to perform the work.

Credit for experience will be granted in the selection process of about 100 apprentices a year, Kheel said, but "competitive examinations and interviews conducted by independent agencies will now be the determining factor."

Powers said that about one-third of the present miscellaneous composing room employes are Puerto Ricans or Negroes. Kheel pointed out that Local 6 has never given any particular preference to relatives of members in apprenticeship selections.

The new method of selection will produce a "higher level of skill" among apprentices, who because of chances for more rapid advancement will feel less temptation to leave the industry, he said.

By removing the testing process from both management and union, he added, the parties will fulfill their contract obligation to base apprentice selection on qualifications and aptitude "without regard to race, creed, color, sex or national origin."

Kheel was named as arbitrator of any disputes arising from challenges to examination results or complaints of discrimination in the original hiring of miscellaneous composing room employes who form the pool for apprentices.

Fire Fighters March To Protest Low Pay

St. Joseph, Mo.—Some 50 members of Fire Fighters Local 77 staged a march on city hall to protest low wages and poor working conditions. They distributed leaflets showing firemen here average $75 to $145 a month less than their counterparts in Kansas City, Springfield and Independence.

'Used as Mental Blackjack':

Congressional Panel Probes Wide Use of Lie Detectors

By David L. Perlman

Four out of five polygraph operators—persons who give and interpret lie detector examinations—do not meet professional standards of training and education, a congressional subcommittee was told.

The estimate came from a leading defender of the use of polygraphs, Prof. Fred E. Inbau of the Northwestern University School of Law.

A House Government Operations subcommittee, undertaking the first investigation ever made into the federal government's previously hush-hush use of polygraph examination, received an even more damning criticism from a psychiatrist who has made a study of lie detector examinations.

Dr. H. B. Dearman wrote the subcommittee that "the polygraph is used mainly as a mental blackjack to obtain a confession." He charged that its use violated the U.S. Constitution's 4th Amendment, barring "unreasonable searches," and the 5th Amendment protection against self-incrimination.

Even when consent is given, Dearman said, the person being examined does not realize that his "unconscious thoughts will also be delved into and consequently . . . he will be giving automatic responses to thoughts of which he is totally unaware."

The growing use of lie detectors by private employers—to interrogate both job applicants and persons already on the payroll—has brought a demand for state laws to bar such practices. Labor-supported legislation has been enacted by Massachusetts, California, Oregon and Alaska prohibiting polygraph examinations as a condition for employment or continuation of employment.

The subcommittee on government information, headed by Rep. John E. Moss (D-Calif.), opened public hearings after a preliminary investigation which disclosed that 19 government agencies use polygraphs.

Excluding the Central Intelligence Agency and the National Security Agency, which admitted routine polygraph examinations of all job applicants but refused on security grounds to furnish statistics, government agencies last year gave more than 19,000 polygraph examinations, the study showed.

The non-secret agencies said they owned 512 polygraphs and had on their payrolls 639 employes authorized to conduct polygraph tests. The training and qualifications of polygraph operations, Moss reported, "differ substantially from agency to agency." In addition, Moss said in an opening statement, "serious questions have been raised by responsible persons as to whether the polygraph is, indeed, an instrument which should be used for any purpose."

The opening witness before the subcommittee, Rep. Cornelius E. Gallagher (D-N.J.), related the case of a 17-year-old daughter of a constituent who, applying for a $70 a week clerical job in a government agency, was interrogated in "embarrassing . . . humiliating" detail about her sex life.

Although the episode took place several years ago, the girl has not yet fully recovered from the shock, Gallagher said. He added:

"If we are concerned with an increasing tendency to invade the privacy of our homes through wiretaps and other electronic instruments, let us be doubly concerned with the widespread use of techniques . . . to invade the privacy of a man's mind."

Inbau, while asserting that "in competent hands" the polygraph technique "works with a very high degree of accuracy," acknowledged that there is no effective regulation of polygraph operators.

He said Illinois, one of the few states with licensing legislation, meets professional standards by requiring a college degree, six months of internship training and both written and practical tests—but has a "grandfather clause" which exempts operators already in the field. By contrast, he noted, Kentucky requires only a high school diploma and a six-week course.

At least one high-security government agency has largely abandoned use of the polygraph, the subcommittee was told.

The Atomic Energy Commission, in 1953, dropped polygraph examinations except under rare conditions personally approved by the AEC general manager. The decision was made on the basis of a study which found that the lie detector at best results "in only a marginal increase in security." The AEC added:

"Against such marginal increase . . . it was necessary to weigh not only the dollar cost of the lie detector program, but also the intangible cost in employe morale, personnel recruitment, labor and public relations. . . . It was concluded that these costs outweighed the benefits."

During the last fiscal year, the AEC reported, the polygraph was used in only one out of a total of 29,300 cases involving security clearance.

Inbau and other members of a panel of experts told the subcommittee that only a three-part polygraph which measures respiration, blood pressure and galvanic skin responses is considered reliable.

Referring to the single reaction lie detector, measuring only skin reactions, Inbau said such a detector "is practically valueless." It would be "foolhardy" to rely on it, he stated, although acknowledging that a number of such units are currently in use.

Even the most reliable polygraph, Inbau said, "is of no value, in fact it may be a very dangerous thing, in the hands of someone who is not trained in the technique of making the diagnosis." In addition to intelligence and training, Inbau said, an operator must have "maturity" and be "respectful of the rights of the individual."

IAM Victory Shatters Anti-Union Intimidation

Orangeburg, S. C.—Orangeburg County has the first union in its history now, thanks to a group of workers who refused to yield a second time to intimidatory tactics by the county's "most important" people.

Workers at the Kelsey-Hayes Co.'s Utica-Herbrand Tool Div., repudiating a powerful anti-union campaign by top management and community leaders, voted for the Machinists by an emphatic majority in a National Labor Relations Board election. The score: for the IAM 356, against 85.

The union victory wiped out an earlier loss, 171-245, in a February election. That vote was set aside by the NLRB because massive community pressures "exerted a coercive effect upon the employes' free choice" and "created an atmosphere of fear of reprisal and loss of job opportunity," the board found.

Pres. Albert J. Hayes of the IAM, in a congratulatory message to the workers, said their victory is "encouraging proof that the traditional anti-union weapons of fear and intimidation can be overcome by giving workers the facts."

Hayes also expressed thanks to the AFL-CIO Industrial Dept. for "valuable help in cutting through the curtain of anti-union propaganda" in Orangeburg. The IUD currently is conducting a coordinated organizing drive in the Carolinas with the IAM and other unions.

Closed Utica Plant

Kelsey-Hayes opened its Orangeburg plant after closing out its tool manufacturing operations in Utica, N. Y., where employes had been represented by the IAM.

When the firm's Orangeburg employes petitioned for IAM representation last year, a campaign of intimidation followed, led by town business leaders and politicians and paralleled by the in-plant efforts of management, the union charged.

Civic leaders visited the homes of workers to warn against voting for the union, the IAM said, and a saturation campaign by radio and newspaper sought to link the union with violence and loss of jobs.

One employe of the firm reported that his family doctor came to the house, called him outside and said he was visiting workers and asking them to vote against the IAM. Another said two Orangeburg policemen talked to him in their car about the danger that the plant might move.

After the election, the union filed unfair practice charges and a three-member NLRB panel ruled that employer statements at Orangeburg went "far beyond permissible limits" of free speech.

The board also found that the "massive campaign conducted by third parties" embellished the message that strike action would be necessary for the union to make any gains in collective bargaining and helped coerce the workers.

The case was notable also for the use, for the first time on record, of a printed version of the movie "And Women Must Weep"—a distorted account of an IAM strike in Princeton, Ind., which pictures union members as thugs and goons.

The day before the election, "Dear Mom" booklets with the "Weep" message were placed in all Orangeburg banks for free distribution. The NLRB has set aside five elections at plants where the "Weep" movie was shown.

Industrial Engineering Institutes Set for July

Four AFL-CIO Union Industrial Engineering Institutes will be held at the University of Wisconsin this summer, offering both basic and advanced training for full-time union staff members.

The two-week institutes, all scheduled for July 20-31, are sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research and the University of Wisconsin School for Workers.

Bertram Gottlieb, industrial engineer on the AFL-CIO research staff, described the goal of the institutes as "to help union representatives protect union members faced with management's use of industrial engineering techniques."

This will be the seventh year the institutes have been held.

Basic courses are offered in the fields of time study and its application in wage incentive systems, and in job evaluation and related problems.

Union staffers who have had training in stop-watch time study are eligible for the institute on synthetic work measurement systems.

The institute on collective bargaining of industrial engineering problems is an advanced course for those who have completed other AFL-CIO Union Industrial Engineering Institutes in previous years. It will be given in two sections, one for those who have completed the job evaluation institute, the second for those who have completed both the time study-wage incentive and the synthetic work measurement institutes.

Labor's position on industrial engineering techniques, as expressed in a 1961 AFL-CIO convention resolution, is one of historical opposition to the use of time study, piece work and wage incentive systems—both because of abuses by management and basic inequities in the systems.

"When these management schemes exist," the federation said, "unions must be prepared to negotiate maximum contractual protection . . . But contract language is not enough. Unionists must be as fully informed as possible to cope with the 'traditional' as well as the 'modern' industrial engineering techniques."

Tuition is $70 plus the cost of housing and meals in the university dormitory and dining facilities. Deadline for registration is June 22. Additional information may be obtained from Gottlieb at the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, 815 16th Street, N. W., Washington 6, D. C., or from Norris Tibbetts, University of Wisconsin School for Workers, 825 Extension Bldg., Madison 6, Wis.

A. W. Motley To Leave Labor Dept.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has announced the resignation of Arthur W. Motley as director of the Bureau of Labor Standards, and the appointment of Nelson M. Bortz to succeed him.

Motley, a career public service official since 1920, has headed the bureau since 1958. Among a number of special assignments which he carried out for the Labor Dept. was the establishment of an emergency employment classification program for 18,000 Hungarian refugees after the 1958 revolt.

Bortz has been a deputy assistant secretary of labor since 1959 and previously served as associate director of the Bureau of Labor Standards.

The Labor Dept. also announced the appointment of Mrs. Laura Hart Harris, an officer and bargaining committee member of Lodge 12 of the Government Employes, as executive secretary for the department's Incentive Awards Committee.

Ohio State Labor Editors Organize

Columbus, Ohio—The Ohio Labor Press Association was organized by labor editors at a meeting here "to improve and enhance the prestige of the legitimate labor press" of the state.

It will undertake to work for improvement of the labor press, encourage the publication of more union papers, establish a clearing house for exchange of ideas and information and help advance the program of the Ohio labor movement, the delegates agreed.

They were addressed by Pres. David Kane and Sec.-Treas. Robert D. Bollard of the Ohio AFL-CIO; Irving Fagan, field secretary of the Intl. Labor Press Association, and John T. Grupenhoff of Ohio State University's Labor Education & Research Service.

A. I. Davey of the Cleveland Citizen was elected president; Robert H. Fox of the Cincinnati Chronicle vice president, and Public Relations Dir. Don Smith of the Ohio AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer. Chosen for the executive board were David Course and Edward Bracken, Rubber Workers Local 2 News, Akron; James Gedling, Lorain Labor Leader; Paul Crunkilton, Auto Workers Local 14 Union Progress, Toledo, and John Anderson, UAW Local 128 Beacon, Troy.

Aid to Education

MORE THAN one-half million dollars in scholarship aid will have been distributed by unions to the high school Class of 1964 by the end of the current school year—aid to qualified students who lack the funds to secure college educations.

The annual award this week of the AFL-CIO merit scholarships is symbolic of this ever-increasing effort by organized labor to make higher education available to those qualified but who because of their financial status are denied the opportunity to develop their capabilities.

The trade union movement's scholarship aid role is an expanding one. But the scope of the problem is far beyond the means of the labor movement or any other organization. The problem is national and the solution must be national.

THE FIRST SESSION of the 88th Congress came up with three education measures that constituted major progress. Federal aid for higher education, an important upgrading and revision of federal aid for vocational education and federal aid for medical, dental and allied education are all on the statute books.

In the current session there are proposals to improve the federal aid to higher education programs by providing various forms of scholarship, loan and grant assistance to qualified students who would otherwise be barred from going on to college.

Student aid is vital if the federal aid program is to achieve its objectives, and it is a job that can be most effectively done on a national basis with a national program.

BUT PERHAPS more basic is the question of federal aid to elementary and secondary schools, a question that has been on the legislative agenda for nearly 20 years and has become more acute as the educational problems of the nation have neared a crisis state.

The passage of the three federal aid bills in the first session of the 88th Congress is evidence enough that the present session should be able to draft legislation to meet the intense need at the basic school level. If aid to elementary and secondary schools is postponed much longer, the programs for federal aid in other educational areas will be hindered and limited as the quality of schools and their graduates decline.

Concerted state and local action to date has failed to solve the school problem. There has been a rise in per pupil expenditure, teachers' salaries have increased and classroom construction has proceeded at an unprecedented rate.

But all of this effort has not been enough to meet the real need. School construction has not kept up with the growing school age population. Teachers are still among the lowest paid professional workers. Youngsters faced with overcrowded conditions and overworked and underpaid teachers lose interest and tend to drop out of school.

The AFL-CIO is committed to the need for quality education for all American young people, wherever their homes may be, however rich or poor their parents, whatever their race or nationality background.

To make that kind of education universally available to every child and young person in the nation will require the best efforts of communities, states and the federal government. It will require a much larger financial commitment to education than we have yet made, but it is a commitment which the nation can and must afford.

Hearings, Books Reveal:

Invasion of Personal Privacy Growing into Booming Business

EVIDENCE IS ACCUMULATING that the right of individuals to privacy is becoming less and less sacred.

A subcommittee of the House Committee on Government Operations, for example, recently held hearings on the use of the lie detector, or polygraph, in government agencies.

Under the chairmanship of Rep. John Moss (D-Calif.) the subcommittee queried 39 federal agencies on their practices and policies in the use of lie detectors. Although both the preliminary study and the actual hearings of the subcommittee were moderate in nature, the results were not conducive to bringing any comfort to those concerned about the invasion of privacy.

The agencies reported that in 1963 they gave 23,122 lie detector tests, and this figure did not include the tests given by the Central Intelligence Agency, since the CIA refused to divulge any information.

The tests were given for the following reasons: security, criminal history, misconduct, personnel screening, and medical information.

Hearings brought to light many extremely dubious uses of the polygraph, such as detailed questioning of young girls on their sexual history. What is of particular significance is that the subcommittee believes "serious questions have been raised regarding the reliability of the device and the propriety of its use."

Even though some federal agencies have strict requirements covering personnel given the tests, some agencies reported that only five days' training was given to those administering tests.

Writing in a national book review supplement recently, Rep. John V. Lindsay (R-N. Y.) gave other examples:

- In connection with an important criminal trial, the Justice Dept. was found keeping a 24-hour surveillance on all defense witnesses, using shortwave radio and other devices.
- In another trial, the prosecution was discovered keeping a check on all mail being received by the defendant and his lawyer.
- Hiring and promotion are frequently done on the basis of "ersatz" psychiatric examinations. Private agencies engaged in work-checks on people and personnel record-keeping are booming into million dollar businesses.
- Manufacturing plants all over the country, competing for government business, find it helpful to have security managers. The "background check" has become routine.
- The New York State legislature this year passed a "frisk" bill which provides that a police officer may stop any person in a public place whom he, alone, "reasonably" suspects of crime or of being dangerous and may, without warrant or any other question, submit the person to personal check.

LINDSAY'S ARTICLE was a review of two recent books concerned with this problem: "The Naked Society," by Vance Packard, and "the Privacy Invaders," by Myron Brenton.

"The books," writes Lindsay, "describe a glacial advance of big, robot systems which make it acceptable, even popular, to strip and expose the privacies of people and invade their homes."

The two authors give example after example "of forms and techniques used by the corporate 'Peeping Tom' to test the worth of their employes, associates, or competitors," Lindsay says. "It seems that eavesdropping techniques have been perfected to such an extent that it is no longer necessary to plug in in order to bug a conversation. Machines have been invented which can pick up a quiet conversation in the middle of an empty beach from a safe, undetected distance."

"We should be grateful to these two authors for lifting the lid off this fetid underground," Lindsay writes. "They've given us a wide look at some fearsome things and if fear is catching, I hope it is in this case."—(PAI).

Morgan Says:

College Students Volunteering In Summer's Civil Rights Fight

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

BOSTON—This hub of New England is loaded with history and pulsing simultaneously with the portent of events yet to happen.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts has just celebrated Patriot's Day, the 189th anniversary of the battles of Lexington and Concord which began the American Revolution. But this respectful, ritualistic observance of great moments past is overshadowed, in a way, by the concern of a high concentration of college and university students in Boston and Cambridge and environs for the future.

Morgan

This change of emphasis may not be so noticeable on the surface. The rites of spring were being customarily followed along the banks of the Charles River. Young lovers leaned dreamily against a tree while sailboats moved silently behind them, their canvas standing out like snowy napkins against the dark spread of water. An athletic type from Boston University in sweatshirt and trunks did push-ups on a park path while strains of hootenanny drifted back from the riverbank where a foursome squatted on the grass, their ears bent to a guitar. Across the bridge a thin sun warmed Harvard Square and there was a kind of Left Bank flavor to the newsstand above the subway station where people milled about riffling the pages of French-edition paperbacks and exchanging morsels of non-academic gossip.

But behind these surface spectacles there was an atmosphere of brooding, at least among the undergraduate population. At Harvard and MIT, at Radcliffe and Wellesley, at Boston College and Brandeis University, students were speculating about the summer ahead and many of the more serious-minded ones had concluded that their work was already cut out for them, dictated, as it were, by circumstances. Caught up in the turmoil of the social revolution that the civil rights battle has become, a number of students, both men and women, feel they have no choice but to spend their vacation fighting it.

This involves painful personal dilemmas not apparent off the campus but vital to the participants and important to the course of the battle itself. Consider, for example, the problem of an upperclass staffer of the Harvard Crimson. From Ivy League schools and elsewhere, substantially more than a thousand college students are expected to converge on Mississippi this summer to join the Negroes' fight for first class citizenship in a variety of ways—ranging from assistance in voter registration to a repertory theater project in Jackson, the state capital. But there are many civil rights battles to be won in the North, too, and furthermore this young Harvard man has a third possible alternative—a teaching job in Birmingham. He has decided, however, "for deep personal reasons," to go to Mississippi, in part, perhaps, because from the standpoint of safety and friendly atmosphere the assignment looks least inviting. "I don't want to be embarrassed," he says, self-consciously, "when 20 years from now my kids ask me, 'Dad, where were you in the summer of '64?' "

THE DEEP PERSONAL commitment of such young people, minority of their own generation though they may be, is impressive. Moreover they are convinced that the civil rights struggle is a sociological cataclysm, not just an unpleasant neighborhood nuisance, which may well peak in violent demonstrations in the next few months.

Even more impressive is their awareness, and that of many of their teachers also involved in the movement, of the real dangers in the fluidity of the situation. One wonders, anxiously, if the White House, the Justice Dept., the leaders of Congress are anywhere nearly as well briefed as they are on the explosive elements of the problem. Their almost G-2 type of intelligence, for instance, flashes the alarm involved in the irresponsible but furious efforts of Negro extremists to wrest the leadership of the civil rights drive from the moderates who for months have been warning that they were sitting on a volcano and would be dislodged if the cry of "freedom now" weren't treated more seriously than a football victory chant.

As frustration mounts, these young white volunteers are awake to attempts by extremists of the far left to infiltrate the civil rights movement—attempts whose subversive potential is far less dangerous than the setback the movement itself may suffer in the public eye if an investigating committee flushes even one Communist fellow-traveler from the ranks of demonstrators.

Indeed an observer can't help but wonder whether the threat of coming chaos could not be better controlled and the significant progress in civil rights already made better protected, if "the establishments" of power in our society were as sensitive to and intimate with the dynamics of this social revolution as many of the younger generation are.

Washington Reports:

Hartke Higher Education Bill Seen Boon to Able but Needy

A BILL introduced by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) could provide higher education opportunities for 100,000 to 400,000 students graduating in the upper third of their high school classes who now are financially unable to attend college.

That estimate of the bill's potential results was given by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) as he was interviewed along with Hartke on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program now heard on 700 radio stations.

Hartke's bill would provide loans guaranteed by the federal government, similar to Federal Housing Administration loans, repayable after the student has finished his education. It would also include 37,000 scholarships annually and work-study programs enabling needy students to help pay for their education through jobs on campus.

Both senators stressed the need of a college education today, noting that job opportunities are no longer for the unskilled, but for the technically skilled and well educated. The present denial of college educations to able but needy students, said Javits, is a vast waste of our potential resources.

Hartke termed education an investment for the individual and the nation, and said without it the United States "may forfeit its leadership in the world." The Indiana senator pointed out that a college education today costs at least $6,000, and may go as high as $12,000 at a private institution, "which means that you have to be ready when you walk into the college doors to have $1,500 or $2,500 on hand. You know, people who are earning a respectable income every year often find themselves hard-pressed to come up with that kind of money."

JAVITS POINTED OUT that Negroes are especially handicapped by the cost of a college education. He noted that 12 percent of the white population has completed college, but only 5.4 percent of the Negro population.

He said that both scholarships and loans, although provided with need as a consideration, must be based on "talent and capability."

The two senators pointed out that the Hartke bill provisions will supplement the loans under the National Defense Education Act, which is restricted to courses in science, mathematics and other "subjects important to the nation's defenses."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE ONLY CLEAR TEST VOTES involving the strength of the House conservative coalition in confronting the Johnson Administration came on the food-stamp bill and cotton-wheat bill, which went to the floor the same day. The coalition took a narrow beating on one, a more decisive beating on the other; the Administration won two victories.

The key to House support of Democratic Administration bills for many years has been simple: The President has had to cut down the number of southern Democrats voting against him from the maximum (at present) of 99 to something like 30 to 50, or he has had to obtain enough liberal Republican votes, over the fierce opposition of GOP Floor Leader Charles A. Halleck, to offset Democratic defectors.

The late Pres. Kennedy sometimes lost as many as 75 to 80 southern Democratic votes, and won precious few Republican votes, on important bills early in his term. But then he was able to whittle down southern opposition to as little as 25 or 30 members. That is how he won the minimum wage bill and area redevelopment program, how he got through the manpower training bill and the expanded-trade measure. He gradually won over enough votes to produce a body of affirmative legislation laying the foundation for progress in education, in the upgrading of work skills, on which the nation will build for many years.

The usual tactical maneuver of the conservative coalition is to offer a carefully drafted substitute for an Administration measure or, sometimes, to try to kill it by sending it back to committee.

On the food-stamp bill, the coalition was beaten down 223 to 195 on a motion to recommit. Only six Republicans voted against the motion and 170 in favor of it, but the House Democratic leadership held almost a maximum of its potential vote. Democrats lined up 217 to 25 against the GOP maneuver. Southern Democrats voted 76 to 23 against it, and the leadership lost only 2 northerners.

On final passage, seven more Republicans joined to give the GOP 13 in favor of the program and the Democrats held their strength approximately level, casting 216 votes in favor.

On the wheat-cotton bill, the only rollcall showdown was on passage—up or down for acceptance of Senate amendments to a more limited bill previously cleared by the House—and it was a cliffhanger all the way. The bill carried by a 211-203 margin, with some Democrats having drifted away presumably because they preferred not to be recorded.

Republicans voted against it 167 to 10. Northern Democrats voted in favor by a 113-25 margin, southern Democrats by an 88-11 split.

THE TWO HOUSE LEADERS who produced and shepherded through the bipartisan civil rights bill, Chairman Celler of the Judiciary Committee and Rep. McCulloch, the ranking Republican committee member, were honored at a dinner given by the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a grouping of many organizations backing a strong bill. Both McClulloch and Celler spoke words worth recording.

Said Celler, a veteran from a Brooklyn district: "I consider the bill an expression of liberty—a payment of debt on a promissory note which we call the Constitution of the United States."

McCulloch, whose Ohio district contains few Negroes or members of other minority groups, addressed his audience as "friends of liberty," and said:

"Many months ago I reached the firm conclusion that we in America were confronted with a noble cause, and that it was the duty of everyone concerned with human liberty to do something about it.

"The least I could do was to nobly use or meanly lose the chance to do what I could for 180 million people in our country."

EVERY ABLE young man or woman, no matter how limited financially, would have the opportunity for a college or technical education under a bill introduced by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), left, who was interviewed with Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.), right, on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

Senate to Probe Growing Gap Between Food Costs, Prices

By Sidney Margolius

THE U.S. SENATE is going to take a long cool look into why you have to pay as much for food as you do, Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), chairman of the Senate Anti-Trust Subcommittee, revealed at a recent legislative conference of the Cooperative League of the U.S.A.

If the investigation is as thorough as Sen. Hart's hearings on deceptive packaging, the public is going to get a useful lesson into why food prices are high, and what it can do about it. The same senator's "truth - in - packaging" bill, which would require more informative packaging, still is before the Senate Commerce Committee. Unfortunately, senators are getting more letters from food manufacturers' personnel opposing the bill than from consumers urging its passage.

But meanwhile, consumers learned from the hearings about the need to look for the net weights of contents even if they are half-hidden on the packages, and to compare weights of different packages even if they appear to be the same size.

The forthcoming hearings on food are needed urgently. Despite the U.S. Agriculture Dept.'s constant efforts to tell the public that "food is a bargain," food is a major expense problem to working families and should and could cost less than it does.

A number of senators and the Administration especially are concerned that while livestock prices dropped sharply this winter, retail prices of beef went down relatively little, and on some cuts, not at all. The big worry now is that since retail prices dropped little in a time of heavy supply, they may rise sharply during the season of reduced supplies this summer.

If you don't have to work as long for a pound of meat or loaf of bread as your father used to, as the Agriculture Dept. argues, it is only because farmers are subsidizing the marketing system by producing more at lower cost, as Jerry Voorhis, executive director of the Cooperative League, points out, and also because unionization has managed to raise hourly pay rates. The fact is, the spread between farm and retail prices is getting wider all the time. The farmer used to get about 50 cents of every dollar you spend for food. By 1957-59, he was getting 40 cents. In 1962, he got 38 cents. Last year, the latest period for which figures are available, he got 36 cents.

In other words, the Agriculture Dept. has failed at its chief mission, which is to reduce the spread between what the farmer gets and what the consumer has to pay.

The department often tends to act as an apologist for food processors and distributors. Most recently, Assistant Sec. of Agriculture George L. Mehren, who, ironically, is the department's "consumer representative," told the National Institute of Animal Agriculture that "today's consumer is served by a new, bright, rapidly evolving system of supply, production and processing—and a far greater battery of governmental protective services than most people realize. . . . This kind of consumer is not the captive for her neighborhood grocery stores as her mother was. She has her choice of a number of large supermarkets—each of which is striving to outdo the other to please her."

Actually, the supermarkets Mehren praises are overrated in their effectiveness in reducing food prices. As supermarkets have become larger and elaborate, their margin (the slice of your dollar they take) has increased from 16-18 percent, to 20-22 percent.

OFTEN TODAY, when it comes to basic staples, the consumer's choice among supermarkets boils down to a choice of which offers a limited amount of specials but otherwise charges the same 27 cents for a package of cornflakes, out of which the farmer gets 2.7 cents for the corn. Often the only real choice consumers have today is a choice of different colors in trading stamps.

In the coming period of rising food prices, you need to watch food spending carefully to avoid paying even more than you now do.

Union Seminar Told:

Alcoholism Rated Major Job Hazard

CHICAGO—"ALMOST 4 PERCENT of all time lost from work is directly related to drinking; in this sense, one might say that alcoholism is an occupational hazard for a significant number of workers," a psychologist reported at a union counseling course on community service activities for three locals of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Dr. Arnold Abrams, assistant professor of psychology at the Chicago Medical School, cited estimates that alcohol is consumed to excess during the course of a year by some 40 million Americans of whom there is a hard core of 2 million intemperate drinkers whose major problem can be defined as alcoholism.

He described excessive consumption of alcohol as "a form of self-medication for the person who can't handle his worries successfully."

"These people have in common the unfortunate discovery of a mode of escape from stress," he said. "It is a mode of escape that is self-destructive and profitless."

Dr. Abrams said that for extreme cases, an index to discovery of the alcoholic might be tardiness, absenteeism, poor work performance and difficulties in getting along with other persons on the job.

He emphasized the importance of early detection of the problem.

"To cover it up is, in the long run, a disservice to the individual worker, his family and the other workers," he said.

"Most of all, it is important not to create an atmosphere of intimidation, but rather one of encouraging the individual to seek help for his problem."

DR. ABRAMS SAID the most difficult task is that of getting the individual to see the destructive nature of his problem and to want to obtain help.

"In this respect," he said, "there is no substitute for a one-to-one warm friendly relationship between the counselor and each person that he is responsible to."

The psychologist pointed out that a formidable problem area is detecting in the early stages the pattern of a potential chronic drinker.

"Perhaps it is safe to say that nobody can do this better than somebody who has been through the mill; a member of Alcoholics Anonymous can much more readily pick out the individual with this problem than somebody who has not suffered from alcoholism," he said. "It may be of some value, then, to enlist the aid of former alcoholics in the prevention and uncovery of early cases."

Dr. Abrams noted that the counselor must recognize his limitations as well as his abilities.

"The intemperate alcoholic is a person who is in need of professional care," he said. "The counselor can provide a monumental service by uncovering and directing the alcoholic to the proper service. Where industry itself maintains a service for such people, the worker is most fortunate."

From Soup to Nonsense:

Jump Out of the Smoke Ring Into the Conversation Circle

By Jane Goodsell

THIRTEEN DAYS, five hours and 26 minutes ago, I quit smoking. And now, thank goodness, I've got withdrawal symptoms just like everybody else. I've got something to talk about.

Before I gave up cigarettes, I was a social dud who had nothing to contribute to the conversation. I'd sit lonely as a cloud, disconsolately blowing smoke rings while everyone else swapped withdrawal symptoms and compared notes on how much weight they'd gained since they quit smoking.

I'd remember wistfully what parties used to be like back in the days when people smoked cigarettes and talked about other things, rather than vice versa. Sometimes I'd make half-hearted attempts to switch the conversation away from smoking.

"Uh, by the way," I'd say, "has anybody seen the movie Tom Jones? I understand it's simply marvel—"

I'd stop because nobody was paying any attention to me. They were all listening to a girl named Muriel who was analyzing the value of lemon drops as an oral substitute.

A man across the room would express his opinion that licorice whips worked better because they were shaped like cigarettes. You know, long and thin.

Then a lady in a blue dress would say she didn't think an oral substitute was as important as finding something to do with your hands. She'd tried needlepoint, but found that those little puzzles, the ones you shake back and forth to get the ball into the hole, were more therapeutic.

The remainder of the evening would be devoted to a discussion of the toughest-time-not-to-smoke, opinion being equally divided between not smoking after meals and not smoking while talking on the phone.

SOONER OR LATER someone would always remark that what really drove him nuts was being in the same room with somebody who was smoking. Everybody would look at me, and I'd light another cigaret to cover my embarrassment.

I began to feel like a social outcast. When I realized that I, too, was looking down on other smokers, I knew I had to quit. I didn't want to belong to a group made up of old-fashioned eccentrics like me, who hadn't kept up with the times.

So, 13 days ago, I quit. Oh, I won't promise I'll never smoke another cigarette as long as I live. As a matter of fact, I'm not even sure I can get through the next five minutes. But even though I'm just about out of my mind, I'm back in the conversation.

I can top anybody's withdrawal symptoms. If we happen to meet, remind me to tell you about them. In fact, just try and stop me.

Keenan Tells CLC:

Job Needs Common To U.S. and Canada

can provide jobs for all. The plain fact is that, unless a society can find useful, rewarding work for its people, it has failed. You and I, and the way of life we represent, cannot afford to fail."

CLC Pres. Claude Jodoin, in a keynote address to the convention, assailed those who sought to use a labor dispute on the St. Lawrence Seaway and the Great Lakes "as a lever to create differences between national and international unions" and emphasized that "this is not an issue in this dispute."

His reference was to differences involving the Seafarers which led to the imposition of Canadian government trustees on all five waterfront unions in Canada and the trustees' removal from office of Hal Banks, the SIU's Canadian district president. An agreement between the trustees and SIU Pres. Paul Hall for restoration of the autonomy of the SIU in Canada was made public recently.

The CLC Executive Council referred to the pact in a statement read to the convention and sent to the Committee on Officers' Reports. The council pointed out that it was not a party to the agreement and added:

"However, the Executive Council, having studied the terms of the understanding and having received assurances from the trustees that they fully intend to carry out their mandate under the trusteeship legislation, believes that they are sincerely endeavoring to work out a course of action designed to bring industrial peace and democratic unionism to the maritime industry in Canada."

One incident of the CLC's largest convention was the defeat by a 3-1 margin of proposals by a small but vocal minority of delegates for "complete autonomy" of Canadian locals in international unions.

In his speech Jodoin also sharply challenged "separatists" seeking to exploit national differences between French-speaking and English speaking Canadians, saying "it is time for those of us who believe in a strong and united Canada to speak out."

Jobless Action Stressed

Jodoin called for "top priority" on unemployment, which stood in February at 467,000 or 4.6 percent of the labor force on a seasonally adjusted basis, despite improvement in the past year. Joblessness in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces is considerably above the national average.

"We have new knowledge, we have new skills, and we have new equipment," he said. "It is an important part of our job to see that the benefits of these advantages are shared by all and not just used for the profit of a few."

Jodoin pledged that the CLC will continue its efforts for "a real Canadian pension plan," for an effective health care plan, and for more low and middle-cost housing.

He also promised to fight "at every opportunity" increasing legislative attacks on labor's freedom and to step up the CLC's political activity.

Pearson Sees Progress

Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson, who told the delegates that a few years ago he might have "made it" to the convention "on my own" as a member of the Newspaper Guild, said he was no more satisfied than Jodoin with the continuing level of unemployment and will not be "until the figure reaches the irreducible minimum."

He cited recent advances and declared that "present indications point to continuing strong gains in the months ahead."

Minister of Labor Allan MacEachen, who spoke briefly, announced that the government plans to ask Parliament soon to set federal standards in a number of areas, notably minimum wages, maximum hours, and some working conditions.

Keenan stressed the factors that the U.S. and Canada have in common and put "jobs for all" at the head of the list.

"This is basic to both of us," he said.

Fred Hayday, fraternal delegate from the British Trades Union Congress with Robert Main, won enthusiastic applause with a flat prediction that "by the end of the year we will have a labor (party) government in office" in Great Britain.

Resolutions passed by the convention:

- Adopted a policy calling for a minimum of doubletime for overtime.
- Directed the officers to "bring all legitimate trade unions in Canada" into the CLC.
- Instructed the officers to try to get a Canadian trade union pavilion built for the 1967 World's Fair here and use it later as a permanent labor college.
- Called "with urgency" on federal and provincial governments to act to assure equality of opportunity for Canadians of Indian, Eskimo and Metis extraction.
- Condemned anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union.

ALASKA RELIEF check for $15,000 is given by Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers to representatives of the Salvation Army who will use it to help victims of the Good Friday earthquake and tidal wave. Left to right, Business Mgr. Russell Conlon of IUOE Local 302, Seattle, and M. F. Alewine of that local's Anchorage, Alaska office; Brig. Donald Berry and Maj. Lawrence Smith of the Salvation Army, and Wharton. The donation was voted by the IUOE executive board at a San Francisco meeting, which also transferred $100,000 in union funds to Alaska banks for loan purposes.

Operating Engineers Kick Off Organizing Drive in New Plants

San Francisco—An organizing drive in newly emerging industries was given a top priority by the Operating Engineers as the union concluded its 27th convention here by voting the first increase in per capita in 24 years.

The increase, from $1.10 to $1.50 per month, will maintain and expand the union's organizing campaign and its research, education and apprenticeship programs. A first step will be to expand a new consolidated department of organizing, research and education for increased services to locals.

A special post-convention session of delegates from locals of stationary engineers discussed organizing opportunities covering potentially tens of thousands of jobs in new industries and plants developed in the past decade.

The planned campaign will cover the entire stationary jurisdiction with special reference to nuclear power, salt water conversion and automated industry.

The convention re-elected Pres. Hunter P. Wharton and all other officers without opposition.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the convention that the Administration's war on poverty is a step forward but that "there are still many other things that must be done." The real problem, he said, "is the question of jobs, jobs for all of the people who are available and able and willing to work."

Public Works Urged

The federation president stressed the need for accelerated public works, extension of the federal minimum wage to millions now uncovered, double time for overtime legislation, health care for the aged through social security and a 35-hour workweek.

On the then pending railroad dispute, Meany said that if railroad workers were denied the right to strike "because of a paramount public interest in order to protect the private profit of the other citizens, then the only answer is public ownership of the railroads.

"I hope it doesn't come to this," he added. "I don't believe in it, but if they insist on destroying the rights of their workers to strike because of a public interest, then, the public interest must be so great that the public should own the railroads."

A spontaneous drive among locals and individuals for Alaska quake relief, in memory of Joseph J. Delaney, the late IUOE president, neared $50,000 as the convention closed. The international had previously donated $15,000 for Alaska aid and transferred $100,000 in union funds to Alaska banks to be available as loans.

Minimum Wage Bill Wins in Michigan

Lansing, Mich.—Solid Democratic support saved a state minimum wage bill from a legislative graveyard for the first time in 25 years as the Michigan Senate last week approved a $1-an-hour pay floor to go into effect next Jan. 1.

The bill increases the minimum to $1.15 on Jan. 1, 1966, and to $1.25 Jan. 1, 1967.

It previously had passed the House with little difficulty but ran into two days of heated debate in the Senate where some Republicans sought to tack on restrictive amendments which supporters said would kill the bill's chances for passage.

Originating in the House with bipartisan support, the measure is a high priority item on the legislative program of Gov. George W. Romney (R), who saw a similar bill die in the House a year ago. Other minimum wage bills have regularly gathered dust in committee pigeonholes since the late thirties.

Republicans hold a 58-52 edge in the House but enjoy a strong 23-11 majority in the Senate where the bill almost floundered in the current session. Romnev needed Democratic votes in both Houses to secure passage.

The crucial Senate vote was 22-9, with 13 Republicans and nine Democrats providing a comfortable margin above the 18 votes necessary for adoption. The nine votes aganst the bill were all by Republicans.

The Republican opponents of the bill sought to freeze the pay floor at $1 and to exclude farm workers plus persons under 22 and over 61.

Approved was coverage of workers between the ages of 18 and 65, including farm laborers, restaurant employes and others not covered by the federal minimum wage law. Coming under the act will be employers of four persons or more. It is estimated 100,000 to 300,000 workers will be affected by the law, depending upon the extent of seasonal employment. Because of exemption of the first 13 weeks of employment, some students and summer employes will not have minimum wage protection.

Authorized are deductions up to 40 percent of the wage floor, for gratuities, board, lodging, apparel or "other items or services supplied by the employer." A "wage deviation" board is established to determine such deductions and to set lower rates for physically or mentlaly handicapped workers.

The House quickly approved two minor Senate amendments and Romney is expected to sign the bill when it reaches his desk.

Michigan AFL-CIO Pres. August Scholle said the bill was "a start in the right direction but still does not put people above the abject poverty level."

Earlier, a concerted labor campaign killed Republican efforts to write further restrictions into the state's unemployment and workmen's compensation laws. The restrictive measures were pigeonholed only after a massive publicity campaign by the Auto Workers and the Michigan AFL-CIO.

Deck Officers Outline Major Retraining Plans

Miami Beach—The Masters, Mates & Pilots unveiled plans for an up-grading and retraining program for licensed deck officers in conjunction with government under the Manpower Development & Training Act.

The program was reported by Alfred Ciano, transportation representative of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training, to delegates attending the union's 56th convention here.

Reporting on discussions with MM&P Pres. Charles M. Crooks and officials of the union's largest single-port local in New York, Ciano said that the joint government-union training program now awaits approval from the Labor Dept.

Under the program, a school would be established to prepare 200 licensed deck officers to sit for the Coast Guard examination leading to the next higher license grade. The officers would participate in a six-weeks training program covering labor relations as well as navigation and related technical subjects required by ship's officers.

Administration of the program by the New York local of MM&P would require an administrator, two instructors, a secretary, certain texts and training aids. The government would reimburse the union approximately $50,000 under the Manpower Training Act.

"Government's role," Ciano observed, "is to promote and to stimulate management and labor to get together to establish training programs to meet not only the current needs, but the projected needs of their industry." Technological change, automation, foreign-flag competition and attrition through retirement, disability or death were immediate factors cited as demanding development of skills among the union's work force.

Capt. Lloyd W. Sheldon, president of the New York local, said the curriculum will be based on guidelines set by the Coast Guard, but not exclusively limited to it. Other studies will be incorporated to help members "keep abreast of the increasing scope of deck officer knowledge that will be necessary for masters and mates in the automated future," he added.

Crooks later indicated that the union would explore the possibility of establishing similar up-grading and retraining schools in West Coast, Gulf, Great Lakes and inland ports.

Businessmen Back Poverty Bill, CofC Gives It 'Jerrybuilt' Label

Three businessmen gave strong individual endorsement to Pres. Johnson's "war on poverty" program and the Administration bill to launch it as a special House committee sought to wind up hearings on the measure and obtain clearance in the parent House Education & Labor Committee.

Republican demands to present opposition witnesses persuaded Chairman Adam Clayton Powell, Jr. (D-N. Y.) to extend hearings from Apr. 22 to Apr. 28, although Powell said he would seek final committee approval by May 1.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, saying the nation "has excelled in reducing poverty," also told the special committee that "further study" was necessary before "any grandiose anti-poverty plans are enacted."

The Administration bill, sponsored by Rep. Phil M. Landrum (D-Ga.), "was jerrybuilt as a political showpiece," said CofC Economist Carl H. Madden, and "little more than a last-ditch effort to resurrect—under a new label—four other Administration-backed proposals" that have been stalled in Congress—area redevelopment, youth employment, the national service corps and accelerated public works.

In constrast Ralph N. Besse, president of the Cleveland Commission on Higher Education and an electric utilities executive, told the committee that "without the help" of federal tax dollars under something comparable to the anti-poverty bill, a city public school system "is unlikely to do more than it is now doing" to invest the requisite funds for "special and expensive solutions of poverty-area problems" that often center in Negro areas.

"It seems clear that only a massive national effort can solve the poverty problem," Besse said.

Thomas Nichols, executive committee chairman of the Olin Mathieson Co., said the Administration bill "outlines a reasonable beginning" that needs "the full resources of labor, business and the agencies of federal, state and local governments" in support.

For large groups of citizens "economic opportunity has receded badly for reasons beyond their control," he told the committee. "We have within our grasp the opportunity to banish blight and the brooding patches of despair that darken the lives of perhaps one-fifth of our fellow Americans. But we must act, because it is morally right."

Virgil Morton, president of the Chicago department store, Carson-Pirie-Scott Co., described a Ford Foundation program in which high school dropouts are employed half-time and go back to school half-time. "The financial cost of such a program," despite its values, "is quite beyond the normal resources available to a local school board," he told the committee.

The bill has been supported by a wide-ranging group of labor, church, education, social work and agricultural witnesses.

$5 Billion U. S. Spending Hike Needed to Drop Jobless Rate

vironments."

● The economic shock to communities from reductions in defense spending should be minimized by advance planning and early warning from the Defense Dept. of contract cancellations and closing of bases. Special federal adjustment assistance should be made available to help workers, communities and industries affected by shifts in military programs.

● Federal standards for unemployment insurance should be promptly enacted to provide benefits equal to at least 50 percent of weekly wages for at least 26 weeks, with a permanent program of extended federal benefits during recession periods or in states with above-average joblessness.

● The U.S. Employment Service should be strengthened and the experience rating provisions of unemployment insurance should be adjusted to reward employers who agree to list all job openings with the public employment service. Listing should be compulsory for government contractors.

● A regional approach to the problems of the depressed areas should be developed wherever practicable and this should be encouraged by the Area Redevelopment Agency.

In other areas, the subcommittee urged a major expansion of education and training programs and declared:

"It should be our national goal to guarantee a broad general high school education, with sufficient specialized skill or technical training or higher education beyond high school to every American youth so that he may be assured of a gainful place in our society. Free public education should include vocational and technical education, or the first two years of college."

The subcommittee added that "scholarships, loans and work-study assistance should be available to remove finally and irrevocably personal financial standing as an obstacle to higher education."

Greater flexibility in tax policy was urged by the subcommittee, which noted that it was three years between the time it was generally recognized that a broad tax cut was needed and the enactment of legislation. The subcommittee majority, however, was divided on whether the President should be given discretionary authority to adjust rates to reflect changing economic conditions or whether Congress should retain control but develop machinery for faster action.

The subcommittee also urged prompt consideration of proposals to allow each President to appoint the chairman of the Federal Reserve System's Board of Governors for a four-year term corresponding with the President's own term of office.

The subcommittee unveiled a major new proposal to meet the special problem of older workers—in the 55 to 64 age group—who are forced into "early, uncompensated retirement" if they lose their jobs.

It recommended a program of older worker allowances—of approximately $2,000 a year—until eligibility for social security benefits. The allowances, the subcommittee said, could be conditioned on continued availability for work, retraining or special work projects.

In its recommendation which drew the strongest opposition from the Republican minority, the subcommittee declared that "federal expenditures must increase by at least an average of $5 billion a year to provide enough demand to keep pace with labor force growth and productivity improvements."

This, the report said, would enable "idle manpower" to be utilized "in an attack on accumulated unmet public needs."

In a sharp dissent, Republican Senators Winston L. Prouty (Vt.) and Len B. Jordan (Ia.) warned that this would lead to "serious inflation."

They laid down a limited series of alternative proposals including tax credits for employers providing retraining for workers about to be displaced by automation, extra payments to persons receiving unemployment benefits who actively seek work in areas far from home, higher minimum social security benefits and blanketing in of persons not covered who do not receive a pension from any public source, and modification or repeal of excise taxes.

In a separate statement, Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) said he agrees with many portions of the majority report but "could not concur" in others "because of an overdependence on government and government expenditure and control in meeting the nation's manpower problem."

Report Urges Steps To Spur Appalachia

A broad-ranging state-federal program in the 10-state Appalachia region has been proposed to "create the foundation" on which a revitalized economy can lift the area's 15.3 million people from chronic joblessness, poverty and neglect.

Citing Appalachia as "a region apart, geographically and statistically," sharing a poverty deeper than the rest of America, a regional commission named by the late Pres. Kennedy reported these facts:

● The Appalachian unemployment rate is 7.1 percent as compared to 5 percent in the other 40 states.

● Almost one of three families lives on an income of $3,000 or less compared to one family in five in the rest of America.

● There are obvious spot areas of high incomes but "Appalachia is more striking in its homogeneity than in its diversity . . . its subregions share an unhappy distinction: rural Appalachia lags behind rural America; urban Appalachia lags behind urban America; and metropolitan Appalachia lags behind metropolitan America."

The report, handed to Pres. Johnson by Commission Chairman Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., was worked out by federal and state members and developed regional programs endorsed by eight of the governors of the states involved. A ninth governor endorsed the objectives but challenged one proposal for financing the projects.

The commission itself, with the backing of the eight governors, pointed out that federal investment in Appalachia in the past "has not been proportionate to its population or its needs," citing fiscal year 1963, when the region containing 8.5 percent of the nation's population received 4.9 percent of general federal expenditures.

It called for a permanent Appalachia Regional Commission, composed of state and federal representatives, to receive project proposals from local development groups and set them in motion. Recommended expenditures for the fiscal year beginning next July 1 would be $252 million.

Appalachia has "natural advantages" in coal and timber resources, in abundant rainfall and mountain streams, which could form the base "for a thriving industrial and commercial complex," the commission reported. But it is split into isolated areas without adequate highways and other communications, its rich mines are lying substantially underworked, its water, timber and recreational facilities are only partially developed.

The commission therefore called for a stepped-up application of existing federal programs—in small business, in area redevelopment, in highway and airport construction—plus the development of additional state and local programs financed by "a federally-chartered mixed-ownership corporation."

Low income, lack of urbanization, low educational achievement, unemployment and a relatively low standard of living are problems that "beset" the region, the commission said. Its recommended program listed these highlights:

● A 2,189-mile road system, supplementing the federal interstate system, to provide access to isolated areas.

● A program to convert marginal farmland to pasture and a timber development and marketing program, with improved forest-land operation.

● "Heavy emphasis" on flood control, sewage treatment facilities and industrial and recreational water impoundments.

● Increased research on the uses of coal and other minerals.

● Substantial federal expenditures in health services, food-stamp, school lunch and housing services, and literacy training.

Gov. William W. Scranton (R) of Pennsylvania objected to the "mixed-ownership corporation," backed initially with federal funds, for local development projects. Eight Democratic governors pledged "separate and associated support" for the program in all aspects. These represented West Virginia, Maryland, Alabama, North Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky and Virginia.

Ohio, the tenth state in the region, did not participate. James A. Rhodes (R) is governor.

Reuther Proposes Poverty Crusade

Detroit—Discussion and exploration of a national citizens' crusade against poverty has been proposed by Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther to enlarge Pres. Johnson's program.

In letters to hundreds of citizens, many of whom head large organizations, Reuther said the UAW executive board had authorized a $1 million pledge to the crusade when it is organized and an initial $100,000 "seed money" contribution to help launch the drive.

"Pres. Johnson has won universal commendation . . . for his call for an unconditional war against poverty," Reuther said. "What is needed is the full mobilization . . . and commitment of citizens groups."

6 Students Chosen For Scholarships

to his choice of accredited school and subject matter. The only proviso is that at least three of the scholarships be awarded to students having a parent who is an AFL-CIO union member.

For the purpose of providing broad coverage, the nation is divided into three scholarship zones and two winners are chosen from each. The amount of each student's financial assistance under the scholarship is determined by the actual costs involved and his private funds. Among AFL-CIO affiliates there are currently 873 students attending college on union scholarships.

Each winner was notified by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who wrote the youngsters that the scholarships are a demonstration of organized labor's interest in further educational opportunities.

"The AFL-CIO looks forward to the day when all young people will have the opportunity to develop the full measure of their capabilities, regardless of their financial status," Meany stated.

Meany noted that public education should be available to all for the two years beyond high school. "We also support legislation providing federally-financed college scholarships and other student aid to qualified high school graduates," he wrote.

Rubber Union Urges Action On Rights Bill

Akron, O.—The Rubber Workers executive board has called for swift passage of civil rights legislation with the declaration that "all of the legislative forces of our local unions" will be "committed to this battle."

The resolution added that "we join with Pres. Johnson in insisting that this piece of legislation, so truly needed not only by minority groups but by the nation, be enacted into law as the most worthy monument to the man who fought so hard for its achievement—Pres. John F. Kennedy."

The board also backed proposals for creation of a national Commission on Automation & Technological Change.

It stressed, however, that such a commission should go beyond studying the problem and seek remedies to the "disruptive and dislocating effects of automation on workers and their communities."

In another resolution, the URW called for expansion of federal public works programs.

USWA Teen Group Strong on Unionism

Forty-five teen-aged youngsters, who know that their fathers' union has meant security, leisure and dignity for their families, spent an exciting three days in Washington getting a first hand picture of their government in action.

The young men and women won the trip through an essay contest sponsored by Steelworkers locals in New Jersey. They were asked to tell what the union means to their families.
